[69] On the same day Edmond Smithwick, the brother-in-law of Harvey Devereux, brought to the house of William De Montmorency certain deeds of lease and release ready drawn and prepared for execution, the release bearing date the 18th of April 1829, and made between William De Montmorency of the one part and Harvey Devereux of the other part, whereby, after reciting that Sir William R. De Montmorency had directed and requested his son to give to Harvey Devereux the estate of Cooldrina, of the value of £100 per annum late currency, in consideration of his faithful services, and in full discharge and acquittance of all dealings or accounts, claims or debts, between Sir William Ryves De Montmorency and Harvey Devereux, it was witnessed, that in consideration of such direction and the premises, and in consideration of 10s. paid by the said Harvey Devereux, the said William De Montmorency conveyed the said estate of Cooldrina to Harvey Devereux, his heirs and assigns. Shortly after the death of Sir William Ryves De Montmorency there was a strong rumour prevalent in the county of Kilkenny that Lord Crofton, who was a relation of the testator, and Lord Crofton himself declared, that he intended, as heir-at-law, to lay claim to the testator's estates at Upperwood.

On the 2d of June 1829 Harvey Devereux proved the will in Dublin, and two witnesses proved that Harvey Devereux, accompanied by William De Montmorency in a carriage, on their return home addressed the tenantry, where 500 persons were assembled, in a speech, wherein he said that he alone was possessed of a secret which would disturb the appellant in the title to his estates, but it should remain with him; and [70] if any persons claiming any right to the estates should go to law, he would take care to defeat them, as he was always successful in all cases in which he was concerned. Another witness proved that Harvey Devereux had told him that he knew of circumstances connected with the estates that would ruin William De Montmorency's claims or prospects in respect thereto, of which no other person was aware but himself. He also added, that William De Montmorency was not using him well, but at the same time he never would injure him. Harvey Devereux acted as the plaintiff's agent from the month of April 1829 till the month of December 1830, when his agency for the plaintiff ceased. On the 5th October 1830 the accounts between the plaintiff and defendant were the subject of negotiation. Messrs. Montgomery and Aicken were employed on behalf of the plaintiff, and Maher, the partner of the defendant on his behalf, to enter into an investigation of the accounts between them. At first the inquiry was not confined to the accounts subsequent to the decease of Sir William Ryves De Montmorency, though they were afterwards confined to those subsequent to his decease, as appears by the following letters written by Mr. Aicken:—

“Dublin, 13th October 1830.

“My dear friend,—I wrote to you again by last evening's post; Mr. Smithwick, attorney, I hoped to have seen ere this; I think on his arrival the mortgage will be executed. It appears clearly that all interest to and for the 1st November 1827 was included in the bond of that date, amount £1570 16s. 8d.; surely it will be easy to calculate the interest from that date. [71] It is said that an account of same date was stated and settled between the parties, and that it is in your hands. Such would be satisfactory; bring it up when you come, also the conveyance to you of Cooldrina, in which, it is said, is embodied a general release as between you and the present Mr. De Montmorency. I pray of you by no means to omit bringing up this deed, and, in a word, all such other deeds, papers, and documents as relate to the accounts, which I think (as I heretofore mentioned) may be yet amicably and happily settled, on which occasion my honourable, honest, and kind offers shall not be wanting. I think it would be well if you consulted Nixon on the subject matter of the notice of which I sent you a copy in my letter of yesterday, and know from him whether he will consent to such submission of reference as therein mentioned being entered into and executed; if not, answers by you and Mr. De Montmorency must be immediately given in. If possible, let me know this by return of post, and in case of Nixon's refusal endeavour to get his consent for three weeks time for answering on the terms of appearing and rejoining gratis, and not suffering a conditional decree.—Most truly yours,

SAMUEL AICKEN.

"H. Devereux, esq.

"I pray you to lose no time in coming up."

"Hume Street, 12th November 1830.

"My dear Maher,—I am authorized to say, that as Mr. Devereux has agreed not to bring forward or make any charge against Mr. De Montmorency for any money trans-[72]-actions or dealings which were had or took place between Mr. Devereux and the late Sir William, and that same shall be for ever done away with, that he, Mr. De Montmorency, will accede to the arrangement proposed this morning; I therefore submit to you, that an entire new account should be prepared on the part of Mr. Devereux, and be confined to such money transactions and dealings as took place between Messieurs Devereux and De Montmorency since Sir William's death, which account, I should hope, may be made out, produced, gone into, vouched, and finally settled on the meeting appointed for to-morrow.—Most sincerely yours,

"John Maher, esq.

SAMUEL AICKEN."

After a laborious investigation of these accounts Mr. Montgomery, finding that they would occupy a considerable time, proposes to strike off above £500 from the defendant's demand, and thereby settle all matters between them. To this proposal the defendant agrees, and more than £500 is struck off from his demand; whereupon a deed, dated the 18th of December 1830, is made between Harvey Devereux of the one part and William De Montmorency of the other part, the draft thereof having been settled and being in conformity therewith, which witnessed, that all accounts of whatsoever nature or kind theretofore or then pending between them in relation to any dealings whatsoever had been and were then finally settled, as well those relating to such dealings or transactions as took place between Harvey Devereux and the late Sir William R. De Montmorency as those between Harvey Devereux and William De Montmorency; and that for peace [73] sake, as well as to avoid litigation and expense, William De Montmorency had agreed to secure to the said Harvey Devereux the principal sum of £2700 in full for the balance due on such accounts by two bonds, the one payable in three years at five per cent. per annum, and the other in five years at six per cent. per annum; and that the said Harvey Devereux thereby consented and agreed to accept said sum, it being, however, understood and declared that the said Harvey Devereux was to pay and discharge the amount of his two drafts or bills of exchange theretofore drawn upon and accepted by the appellant for the sums of £450 and £400, which two bills had been passed by the said Harvey Devereux to the Provincial Bank in Kilkenny, and had not been paid when same became respectively due, and were then in the hands of Messrs. Pierce and David Mahony as attornies for said bank, who had taken proceedings at law against William De Montmorency for the recovery of the amount thereof; and that said Harvey Devereux was also to pay whatever costs and charges might have been incurred upon said bills. And it was agreed by William De Montmorency that he would pay off and discharge all such just and legal demands upon the late Sir William R. De Montmorency as had not been discharged by Harvey Devereux, and credited to him in the accounts theretofore furnished by him to William De Montmorency, and examined by him and his solicitors; and that he would indemnify Harvey Devereux and his estates, real, freehold, and personal, against the payment of the same; and the said Harvey Devereux thereby undertook and agreed to save harmless and keep indemnified at all times thereafter the appellant of, from, and against all debts and other demands of [74] whatsoever nature or kind which were set forth in the said Harvey Devereux's account, as had been theretofore paid off by him for or on account of the said late Sir William R. De Montmorency or the appellant, and at all times thereafter to aid and assist the appellant, if it should become necessary so to do, in resisting the payment thereof, if any demand should at any time thereafter be made in respect to the same. And the said Harvey Devereux thereby undertook, by deed or other instrument, as counsel should or might advise, to assign and make over to the appellant all and every the estates and properties devised and bequeathed by the will of the said Sir William Ryves De Montmorency unto the said Harvey Devereux as trustee or otherwise, save and except the lands of Cooldrina otherwise Backweston, situate near Leixlip, in the counties of Dublin and Kildare, which the appellant had theretofore conveyed to said Harvey Devereux, and the conveyance whereof he thereby fully and absolutely confirmed. And the said Harvey Devereux thereby also covenanted and agreed to allow his name, either as personal representative of the late Sir William Ryves De Montmorency, or, if necessary, notwithstanding such proposed assignment, as trustee in his will, to be thereafter used in such manner and for such purpose as it might be necessary, and as counsel should or might advise upon, on immediately afterwards being indemnified, in such manner as counsel might advise, against the consequences of allowing his name to be used; and also to give and afford to the appellant all information in his power at all times touching or relating to the estates and properties of the said late Sir William Ryves De Montmorency or of the appellant; and that the said Harvey [76] Devereux should, on the perfection of said bonds therein-before stated and the execution of that deed, hand over to the appellant all deeds and papers relating to the estates, properties, affairs, or business of the said late Sir William Ryves De Montmorency or the appellant, of which the said Harvey Devereux had possessed himself, save and except those relating to the lands of Cooldrina, and likewise give his assistance to enable the appellant to recover payment of all arrears of rent then due and owing out of the several estates devised to the appellant by the will of the said Sir William Ryves De Montmorency, save and except the lands of Cooldrina, and also such parts of the arrears of rent as were due and owing out of the estate of Kilcreene at the time of the said Sir William Ryves De Montmorency's decease, and that then remained due and owing thereout.

The draft of the deed was approved of by Mr. Montgomery, but he declined witnessing the deed, because his own claims were not recognized, and because, the plaintiff not being satisfied with the arrangements, he thought by so doing he might bind William De Montmorency; and for the same reasons he prevented Mr. Malone, the then agent of William De Montmorency, from being an attesting witness. At the same time the deeds and papers in the hands of Harvey Devereux were, by the direction of William De Montmorency, handed over to John Robert Malone. In pursuance of the last-mentioned deed the bonds therein mentioned were executed by the plaintiff William De Montmorency. On the 16th November 1831 William De Montmorency writes to Harvey Devereux the following letter:—

[76] “Upperwood, 16th Nov. 1831.

“Dear Harvey,—Mrs. Darby, the widow of George Darby, called on me this morning for the balance of an account alleged by her to be due to her late husband of my father. By the deed executed between you and me you undertook the payment of all debts due of my late father except certain debts in and on the back of said deed excepted, and Mrs. Darby was not amongst those excepted. You will therefore please to let her know that I am not her debtor, if upon investigation any thing be really due to her, and believe me,—Truly yours,

W. DE MONTMORENCY.”

“Directed to H. Devereux, esq.”

And on 14th October 1832 another letter, wherein he says, “Upperwood, 14th Oct. 1832.

“My dear Harvey,—I understand that some evil-minded person has told you lately that I repented giving you Cooldrina. I can assure you I never did say so, nor either did I ever repent giving it to you; and whoever told you so told you a great falsehood. I should feel sorry that you should think for a moment that I should say so. I only wish that Cooldrina was better for your sake, and I wish it was able to produce you ten times as much as it is; and now believe me, my dear Harvey, yours obliged,

W. DE MONTMORENCY.

“Directed to H. Devereux, esq., Kilkenny.”

[77] In April 1833 Mr. Maher, who was the partner of Mr. Montgomery in the business carried on in the courts of Dublin, but not in business done by them individually in other matters, brought an action against the plaintiff William De Montmorency for a bill of costs, which included not only costs individually due to him, but costs due from the plaintiff's father to the partnership, and which had been released and settled by the deed of 1829. To this action William De Montmorency set up as a defence the deed of 1829, and got the benefit of the defence by being protected against those costs incurred in the lifetime of his father and due to the partnership of Devereux and Maher.

Under these circumstances William De Montmorency, on the 16th of April 1835, filed his bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland against the respondent Harvey Devereux, stating the will and deeds before mentioned, and that immediately after the death of Sir William R. De Montmorency a report was circulated, at the instance of Harvey Devereux, that Lord Crofton intended to set up a claim to Sir William R. De Montmorency's estates as his heir-at-law, and to institute proceedings to impeach his will; and that, the day after the interment of Sir William R. De Montmorency, Harvey Devereux had sent his brother-in-law Edmond Smithwick to Upperwood, to inform the plaintiff that Lord Crofton was in the neighbourhood inquiring for Harvey Devereux and John Smithwick his father-in-law, who had kept out of his way, but in the most earnest manner he advised the plaintiff to make a friend of his brother-in-law Harvey Devereux.

That upon the said last-mentioned occasion the said Edmond Smithwick produced ready prepared, a power [78] of attorney between William De Montmorency and Harvey Devereux, appointing him collector of his rents, and also a deed by which he gave him £200 a year in case he discontinued him as his agent, and also a conveyance of the 1st of April 1829.

That in consequence of the impression made upon his mind by the said Edmond Smithwick, that the said Harvey Devereux could either take from or leave the said estates with him, the appellant executed said power of attorney, and said annuity deed, and said conveyance, dated the 18th day of April 1829, so produced to him, without receiving any consideration whatever for the same.

That he was grossly deceived and imposed on in said transaction, and was prevailed on to execute said annuity deed and said conveyance of said lands of Cooldrina by unfair means and practices used by and on behalf of the said Harvey Devereux; and the said Harvey Devereux having assumed the possession of said estates of said testator, and being in possession of all the deeds, papers, and writings relating to said estates, and refusing to put the appellant into possession of said estates unless he would execute said several instruments; and that he never gave any directions whatever or instructions to any person to prepare said power of attorney, or said annuity deed, or said conveyance of said lands of Cooldrina, nor were the same or either of them prepared by any person employed by or on behalf of the appellant, but said power of attorney, annuity deed, and conveyance were drawn or prepared by or under the order or directions or from the instructions of said Harvey Devereux, and said power of attorney and annuity deed and conveyance [79] were brought and produced to the appellant by said Edmond Smithwick ready drawn and prepared for execution.

That after the execution of said instruments the said Edmond Smithwick declared that the appellant had thereby made a friend of the said Harvey Devereux, who immediately after, but not until said deeds were actually executed, gave possession of said estates and properties, except said estate in the county of Dublin, to the appellant.

That Harvey Devereux had addressed the tenantry in a speech to the effect before mentioned.

That he continued the said Harvey Devereux his agent for a year and a half, when he found it necessary to discharge him from his agency; and having done so, and thereupon a settlement of the said Harvey Devereux's accounts as his agent and on foot of various advances made for appellant having taken place, the appellant appeared indebted to the said Harvey Devereux in a sum of £2700; but such settlement of accounts was confined to those between the appellant and said Harvey Devereux as his agent from the time of the execution of the power of attorney so obtained as aforesaid to the discharge of said Harvey Devereux from the agency, and for sums of money received by the said Harvey Devereux since the death of said testator on account of rent due to testator in his life-time, but did not contain any account whatever on foot of the personal estate or effects of said testator.

That the said Harvey Devereux thereupon required the appellant to execute the two bonds before mentioned, and also required him to execute the deed of the 18th day of December 1830.

[80] That the said last-mentioned deed and bonds were drawn up at the office of Messrs. Aicken and Montgomery, appellant's solicitors, who, perceiving that there was no settlement of accounts on foot of the rents received by the said Harvey Devereux during his agency with the said Sir William Ryves De Montmorency, or on foot of the assets of the said Sir William, declined to witness the execution of said deed, and would not permit John Robert Malone, appellant's then agent, to witness same.

That although the said deed purported to confirm the said conveyance of 18th April 1829, yet appellant submitted that said deed of April 1829 was not in any manner confirmed by said deed of 18th of December 1830, or did not operate as a release to said Harvey Devereux as executor of said testator, inasmuch as appellant executed same under the impression that the said Harvey Devereux had the power to invalidate his title to said estates, and inasmuch as he appeared then indebted to him in a large sum of money, for the recovery whereof the said Harvey Devereux threatened to take legal proceedings, and refused to give up the agency until paid; and appellant was then in very embarrassed circumstances, and the said Harvey Devereux was in possession of all the title deeds, papers, and writings relating to appellant's said estates, and all which he retained in his possession, except the tenant's leases of said estates in the county of Kilkenny; and inasmuch as the said John Smithwick, who was the father-in-law of the said Harvey Devereux, was then a creditor of appellant to a large amount on foot of said judgments, and to further secure which he compelled appellant to execute to him a mortgage of said estates [81] in the county of Kilkenny on the same day with said alleged confirmation; and appellant submitted that said deed of the 18th of December 1830 should not be considered a release to the said Harvey Devereux as executor as aforesaid, inasmuch as no account was furnished previous thereto of the dealings between the said Harvey Devereux and the said Sir William Ryves De Montmorency in his lifetime, or on foot of the personal estate of said testator.

That the said Sir William Ryves De Montmorency was entitled to a life estate in certain lands called Kilcreene in the city of Kilkenny, with remainder to William Bayley, esq., and that a large arrear of rent of said lands of Kilcreene was due to the said Sir William at the time of his death from solvent tenants, but the said Harvey Devereux, being also agent to the said William Bayley as well as to the said Sir William, either neglected to receive, or, if he received the rents thereof, never accounted for same to appellant; and that had the said Harvey Devereux used due diligence he might have received the whole of said arrear of rent, and the more especially as the leases of said life estate were in the possession of the said Bayley or Devereux, and both of whom were fully aware of appellant's right thereto.

That the said Harvey Devereux also permitted the said William Bayley to retain a considerable portion of the land called Deckeland, held by the said Sir William Ryves De Montmorency under the corporation of Kilkenny for a long term of years, although the said Harvey Devereux well knew appellant's right thereto; but being the agent of said Bayley he either received himself for his own use, or suffered said Bayley to [82] receive, the rents of said last-mentioned lands since the death of the said Sir William in violation of the trusts reposed in him as the executor appointed by said will.

That having been so advised, he had lately paid off the said Smithwick the amount of said mortgage debt, with the view to his filing his bill to impeach said deeds, and which he could not sooner do under the circumstances therein-before stated.

That so well aware was the said Harvey Devereux of the impeachable nature of said transaction of the 18th of April 1829 that he had not made any claim on foot of said annuity of £200 to be paid him on his being discharged from said agency.

That he had caused various applications to be made to the said Harvey Devereux for all deeds, papers, and writings relating to the property of the said Sir William, and which said Harvey Devereux by said instrument of 18th December 1830 undertook to give up to appellant; and that he also caused application to be made to the said Harvey Devereux to come to an account with appellant on foot of the personal estate and effects of the said Sir William Ryves de Montmorency deceased, and to convey said lands of Cooldrina, otherwise Backweston; with all which applications the said Harvey Devereux had declined to comply.

That the said Harvey Devereux combining, etc. pretended that he had settled all accounts on foot of the rents of said estates or otherwise during the lifetime of said testator, and also as executor of said testator; whereas the said appellant by his said bill charged that the said Harvey Devereux never accounted with the said Sir William in his lifetime, nor with him, save as [83] therein-before mentioned; and the said Harvey Devereux pretended that the said conveyance of said lands of Cooldrina was a good and valid conveyance, and that he was entitled to the benefit thereof, whereas the appellant charged the contrary thereof to be the truth, for the reasons therein-before mentioned.

And it was by the said bill charged, that the said Harvey Devereux at other times pretended that the said Sir William in his lifetime was indebted to said Harvey Devereux in a large sum for costs, and that same formed part of the consideration of such conveyance of said lands of Cooldrina otherwise Backweston; whereas the said appellant charged that Messrs. Aicken and Montgomery were the solicitors and attorneys of the said Sir William in his lifetime, and that the said Harvey Devereux only acted as the attorney of the said Sir William in some trifling local matters; and that it was part of the agreement between the said Sir William and said Harvey Devereux that no charge whatever should be made by said Harvey Devereux for such costs, but that his acting as agent should be considered as compensation for same, and his salary was increased from £100 per annum to £200 per annum on that account.

And it was by the said bill further charged, that notwithstanding said agreement John Maher, who is the partner of the said Harvey Devereux as attorney and solicitor, in or about the 22d of March 1833 furnished a bill of costs, manifestly for business alleged to have been done for the said Sir William in his lifetime, and amounting to the sum of £576 or thereabouts, and afterwards commenced an action against appellant in His Majesty's Court of Exchequer for the [84] recovery of said costs; and said appellant paid unto the said John Maher the sum of £135 in discharge of said costs; and the appellant by his said bill charged that said costs were furnished and paid, and the said action was brought, with the privity and for the benefit of said Harvey Devereux.

And the said appellant further expressly charged, that if any costs were due to the said Harvey Devereux by the said Sir William in his lifetime, that same formed no part whatever of the consideration of said deed of 18th April 1829.

And the said bill prayed for an account of the personal estate of Sir William R. De Montmorency possessed by the respondent, and of all sums received by the respondent belonging to the said Sir William or his estate, during the lifetime of the said Sir William, as his agent, and of said testator's debts and funeral expenses, and for the application thereof; and that the clear residue thereof might be ascertained and paid to appellant; and that it might be declared that the said deed of conveyance of said lands of Cooldrina of the 18th day of April 1829 and said annuity deed were fraudulent and void; and that the said Harvey Devereux might be decreed to reconvey to appellant said lands of Cooldrina otherwise Backweston, and to come to an account of the rents and profits thereof received by the said respondent from the execution of said deed, and to pay over to appellant what should be found due to him upon the taking of such account; and that he might release said annuity; and that said deed of 18th of December 1830 might likewise be declared fraudulent and void so far as same purported to confirm said conveyance of 18th April 1829, or to release the [85] said respondent on foot of the accounts sought by the said suit; and that a receiver might be appointed to collect the rents of said lands of Cooldrina otherwise Backweston pending the suit.

Harvey Devereux by his answer stated, that the deeds were drawn up in conformity with appellant's directions, and were submitted by appellant before their execution to William Mannin, an attorney. He admitted that he gave to appellant no actual pecuniary consideration for the deed, but that in consideration thereof he consented to give up a claim to the amount of about £1600 for costs for business done as an attorney and solicitor for the testator in his lifetime, for which respondent had received no payment, and which he never afterwards claimed or charged in his accounts against appellant as residuary legatee or otherwise; but he denied that appellant was, as by bill most untruly stated, grossly or at all deceived or imposed on in said transaction, or that he was prevailed on to execute a letter by which he was appointed attorney and said conveyance of said lands of Cooldrina, or either of them, by unfair or any other means or practices used by respondent or by any other person, as he believed; and he admitted that he had acted as the attorney and confidential law adviser of Sir William R. De Montmorency in all local matters.

On the 7th of February 1837 the cause came on to be heard, when the Lord Chancellor of Ireland dismissed the bill, without costs. From this decree William De Montmorency appealed.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Pemberton for the Appellant.—All the accounts cannot be settled; the account between [86] the respondent and the testator from 1821 to 1829, and his account as executor and as agent to the plaintiff, are unsettled, and yet the bill is dismissed. He pretends to a knowledge of a secret which may dispossess the plaintiff of his property, and uses the influence which he obtains from the possession of this secret and his knowledge as an agent for the purpose of inducing the plaintiff to sign a letter by which he appoints him his agent, and to execute a deed by which he gives him part of his estate; and though the plaintiff only succeeded to £2000 a year out of £4700, he receives the same salary as the testator gave him, being at the rate of ten instead of five per cent., and is appointed for life.

The deed cannot stand: it was prepared by the defendant, and executed four days after the death of the testator. It is stated to be in discharge of all accounts between the testator and defendant, as if a balance were due from the testator, the presumption being the other way. Dr. Cullinan must be interested in favour of the defendant, he himself having received a gift from the plaintiff; and he mentions nothing of the settlement of accounts or of the appointment of respondent as agent. The defendant states, that he consented to give up £1600 costs, about which Dr. Cullinan says nothing, nor have they been proved to be due; and defendant states that the deeds were submitted for approval to Mr. Mannin, but he has not examined Mannin as a witness, nor has he proved that they were so submitted. Plaintiff executed the deed under an impression that the testator had enjoined him to do so, and that £1600 was due for costs. There is no attempt to prove either of these circumstances. In 1830 the plaintiff was involved in debt.

[87] The following cases were cited: The Earl of Chesterfield v. Janssen (1 Atkins, 354; 2 Vesey, sen. 158), Crowe v. Ballard (Brown's C. C. 117), Murray v. Palmer (2 Scholes and Lefroy, 486), Cann v. Cann (1 Pere Williams, 727), Cooke v. Settree (1 Vesey and Beama, 126), Horlock v. Smith (2 Milne and Craig, 495), Waters v. Taylor (2 Milne and Craig, 526), Lewis v. Morgan (4 Dow, 48), Roche v. O'Brien (1 Ball and Beatty, 340), Dunbar v. Tredennick (2 Ball and Beatty, 317).

Mr. Knight Bruce and Mr. Goldsmid for the Respondent.—This is a bill to open accounts, not alleging any error, or any discovery of any fact not known in 1830; pressure is the only objection stated to the deed of 1830. Defendant alleges that every account and voucher was delivered up in 1830, and yet not one is produced, and no error is alleged, nor is there any ignorance. The letters written by the plaintiff show that he was aware of the transactions; the speech was made in June after the first deed was executed. The defendant dismissed himself from the agency, and has never claimed nor does he now claim the annuity. In all the cases cited as to confirmation there was ignorance and pressure.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, this case has occupied so much time in the discussion, and has been discussed at such various intervals, that I have had an opportunity, since it was first opened, of carefully examining the whole of the proceedings and the evidence on each side. As the noble and learned Lord here present concurs with me as to the course your Lordships ought [88] to adopt, there is no advantage in taking any further time to consider the case.

It is very important, considering the order that we shall have to propose to the House, and for the benefit of those who may not be conversant with the proceedings of the courts of equity, as the bar of Ireland are represented as not being, (I believe without any foundation, for I see no ground to suppose that the rules of courts of equity are not attended to there with great fidelity. I believe that the decisions of this House and the rules of courts of equity regulate their proceedings;)—but it is very important that all parties should have their attention called to the various parts of this case, that there may be no misunderstanding as to the grounds upon which this House proceeds in affirming the judgment of the Court below.

The transactions of 1829 are transactions that I cannot hesitate for a moment to say were highly suspicious at least, and such as, without much more explanation of them than has been afforded by the evidence in this case, could not possibly be supported by a court of equity, if a complaint had been made before any acts of confirmation had taken place.

We find that on the 14th of April 1829 the original proprietor of this property died, and we find that so early as the 16th it is stated that a conversation took place, in which the plaintiff stated that he had determined to part with the estate in the way in which he afterwards did; but as early as the 18th, four days only after the death of the original proprietor, we find a deed executed by which an estate, part of the property inherited by the plaintiff, is conveyed over to Mr. Deve[89]-reux, who had been the agent, and who represented that he had also been the confidential law adviser of the testator,—we find that that deed conveyed all the estate in discharge of all accounts which had been pending between the testator and himself.

Now the objections to that are very obvious: in the first place, the great haste with which it was done, and the relative situation of the parties, the one the manager of the property,—perfectly conversant, therefore, with all circumstances connected with the property, and who procures this conveyance to himself. It professes to be as a settlement of all accounts, although it was perfectly impossible, from the nature of the case, and from the circumstances that took place, that there could have been any examination of those accounts.

Then there is another fact, not brought out very distinctly in the evidence, but, as far as the evidence applies to it, giving rise to a strong suspicion of influence of a very improper nature exercised by the defendant over the plaintiff at that time, namely, the supposed possession of a secret by which, according to the representations of the witnesses, he thought he had the power of depriving the plaintiff of his estate;—some secret with regard to the title, which, if revealed, would show that the plaintiff had no title. Now, if that really existed, and if that really was used for the purpose of obtaining the conveyance of the estate, it would be as gross a fraud, and as violent a breach of duty on the part of the agent Devereux, as any thing that can possibly be stated.

The case upon this point stands in a very singular position, and the evidence is of a very extraordinary character. There is no evidence of such a representa[90]-tion having been held out to the plaintiff; the evidence is of a speech made by this agent at a meeting of the tenants and inhabitants of the estate, upon the plaintiff making his entry and taking possession upon the death of the testator. He is there represented as having stated publicly that he was in possession of a secret,—that the heir-at-law would not succeed, who evidently had been making some inquiries, probably with a view of making some claim. The agent is represented as having stated publicly, that he was in possession of a secret by which the plaintiff's title might be defeated, but that that secret he would keep to himself; and that, as he was so fortunate as to succeed in all contests in which he was engaged, no danger could arise to the plaintiff. Now that is stated by witnesses; two witnesses speak to having heard the speech delivered, and another witness speaks to similar expressions having been used at different times.

My Lords, I do not see what possible motive there could be,—none has been suggested at the bar, and I am unable to suggest to myself any possible motive for that declaration. If, indeed, there was no foundation for it, of course, in addition to the objection of its being a falsehood, it was a gratuitous slur upon the title of his employer; because, if there was no objection known to him to the plaintiff's title, one cannot conceive any thing more absurd or injurious to the plaintiff's interest than proclaiming that there was, although nobody was likely to find it out. On the other hand, if he was possessed of this secret, and nobody else knew it, one cannot conceive any folly greater than to say, at a meeting of 500 persons, that there was an objection to the title, leaving all those persons to find it out;—an [91] objection which might probably become known to those who might be affected by the failure of the plaintiff's title. However, there is no distinct evidence of this having been used as a means of obtaining the deed, though there are strong suspicions that it might have been.

Now all these circumstances, although not amounting to positive proof of fraud, yet are so full of suspicion that, considering the situation in which the parties stood towards each other, and considering the haste with which the deed was prepared and executed, and considering what was stated to have passed, I think, if the transaction had been complained of within a reasonable time no court of equity could have hesitated in setting aside these transactions, unless a very different explanation had been given of them than that which has been afforded in this suit. But, however, it must be observed, that there is no positive evidence of fraud; there is no distinct evidence of misrepresentation, or of influence used by the possession of the secret, although there is very strong suspicion that each of these acts might have been brought to bear; as means of obtaining the deed in question.

All those facts, however, were of course known, or might have been known to the plaintiff himself; and that which appears extremely suspicious upon the face of the transactions as they stand might have been capable of explanation, or there might have been a knowledge of circumstances which would lead those who were acquainted with all the facts to a different conclusion from that to which they might have been led by the mere circumstances of suspicion to which I have alluded; for instance, the plaintiff must have known [92] whether the supposed secret as to his title was or was not used as a means by which the deed of 1829 was obtained. He knew or had the means of knowing, or those whom he employed had the means of knowing, what was the state of the account between the father and Mr. Devereux; and if they did not think proper to use those means in their power, those that suffer by their negligence ought not to be heard to complain.

My Lords, the subsequent transactions are of a character which seem to me to render it perfectly impossible for a court of equity to open the transactions of 1829, if there be such a doctrine in a court of equity as that confirmation will make that valid which in its origin was voidable (though not void) upon grounds for equitable interference.

My Lords, this deed was executed in 1829. It appears that this deed beyond all doubt operates, as long as it stands, as a conclusive settlement of accounts. Whether those accounts were investigated or not, is not material for the purpose, because the deed, so long as it stands, is a conclusion of all question of account anterior to the death of the father: such are the terms of it. It appears that so early as in the month of October 1830,—whether upon the application of the plaintiff, or whether by desire of the defendant, is matter of some doubt upon the evidence,—there was a negotiation going on between the defendant and the then solicitors of the plaintiff. The plaintiff was then represented by Messrs. Montgomery and Aicken; Mr. Maher, being the partner of the defendant, was the party negotiating on his part, and Montgomery and Aicken were the parties negotiating on the part of the plaintiff.

[93] My Lords, it appears that this was not done in haste; there was ample opportunity afforded of making inquiry into all the circumstances that were material to be inquired into as to the transaction of 1829. It appears that the negotiation commenced on the 5th day of October 1830, and the first object was an investigation of the accounts between the defendant and the plaintiff. In the first instance it does not appear that the inquiry was confined to accounts subsequent to the death of the father; there was a general inquiry how matters stood between the plaintiff and the defendant, and it is to be observed that, inasmuch as the plaintiff was residuary legatee of the testator, any item of account as between the defendant and the testator would be immaterial in a final settlement of account between the defendant and the plaintiff; because, whatever the defendant owed to the estate of the testator would, under the circumstances that have taken place, namely, the plaintiff being residuary legatee of the testator, be an item of account between the plaintiff and the defendant.

Now, Mr. Maher tells us, that in the month of October 1830 he, on behalf of the defendant, and Montgomery and Aicken, on the part of the plaintiff, came to this investigation of the accounts; and the letters, which are extremely important, of the 13th of October and the 12th of November 1830, which have been relied upon in reply on behalf of the appellant, appear to me to be extremely important evidence on behalf of the respondent. The first is the letter of the 11th of October, signed "Samuel Aicken," one of the parties acting for the plaintiff: he says, that Mr. Maher, who is the person acting on behalf of the defendant, had not been [94] able to come to any conclusion with respect to the accounts; these, no doubt, are the accounts between the plaintiff and the defendant, that leave it ambiguous, except that the accounts had been the subject of discussion between Aicken and Maher.

Then, on the 13th of October, the same person writes to the defendant himself, in which, after alluding to another matter with regard to the mortgage, he says, "Bring up with you the conveyance of the Cooldrina estates, in which, it is said, is embodied a general release as between you and the present Mr. De Montmorency. I pray of you by no means to omit bringing up this deed, and in a word all such other deeds, papers, and documents as relate to the accounts which I think (as I heretofore mentioned) may be yet amicably and happily settled; on which occasion my honourable, honest, and kind offers shall not be wanting."

Now, that of course accordingly must have been done; there is no evidence of its being done, but he asks for information, and we must assume that the deeds relating to the Cooldrina estate were produced, which it had become material, in the investigation of the account between the plaintiff and the defendant, should be brought up, in order that Mr. Aicken, acting on behalf of the plaintiff, might see how far it was material in that settlement of account which he was making on behalf of the plaintiff, and which settlement of account necessarily depended upon the state of the accounts between the defendant and the estate of the plaintiff's father. This, therefore, proves that the attention of the legal advisers of the plaintiff was distinctly called to that [95] deed, which deed is material for the present purpose, as it operates as a settlement of account up to the death of the father.

Now, it appears from the evidence of Mr. Montgomery that the account subsequently investigated was confined to the transactions after the death of the father. It naturally would be so, unless those who were then advising the plaintiff thought that there was a case for setting aside the transactions of 1829; because, from the fact of the transaction of 1829 barring all inquiry as to the antecedent accounts, if they had thought there was a case in which it was the interest of their client to open the accounts antecedent to 1829, then was the time, when it was their bounden duty to inquire into the transaction of 1829; and if they thought there was any case which justified them in advising the plaintiff to question those transactions, that was the period when proceedings ought to have been instituted for carrying that object into effect. Instead of which, being furnished with a deed that closed the transactions up to the death of the plaintiff's father, his legal advisers, with full knowledge of that deed of 1829, proceed to investigate the accounts subsequent to the death of the father, making no inquiry, as far as appears, as to the antecedent accounts as between the plaintiff and the defendant. It cannot be supposed that they were so negligent of their duty, or so inattentive to the interests of their client, that they did not inform themselves what the history of that transaction was, and what the nature of that account was. It was their bounden duty to do so, and we may presume that they did so. It is due to professional men to suppose that they did attend to the interests of their client, and that they satisfied themselves [96] that what they were doing for their client was what it was for his interest to do.

Then, in the subsequent history of these transactions Mr. Montgomery, acting for the plaintiff, goes on, and a laborious investigation of the subsequent accounts takes place. He then tells us, that, finding this extremely troublesome, and that it would occupy a considerable time, he said, "If you strike off £500 from the accounts, that will leave £2700 due from the plaintiff to Mr. Devereux; that it shall be taken as the final balance." That is accepted; and I assume, as there is nothing else to which it could refer, that that is the proposal referred to in exhibit M.,—a letter written by Mr. Aicken, in which he says, "I am authorized to say, that as Mr. Devereux has agreed not to bring forward or make any charge against Mr. De Montmorency for any money transactions or dealings which were had or took place between Mr. Devereux and the late Sir William, and that same shall be for ever done away with, that he, Mr. De Montmorency, will accede to the arrangement proposed this morning." Whether this refers to that proposition of Mr. Montgomery or any other, is not material. The subsequent account, it is admitted on all hands, is not matter of contest in this suit, but a certain sum was agreed upon as the final balance due from the plaintiff to Mr. Devereux; upon the assumption that the deed of 1829 operated as a final conclusion between the parties as to all transactions anterior to the death of the father.

My Lords, accordingly a deed was prepared, and we have the draft; and the draft of the deed, in conformity with that which had been settled, states, "That all [97] accounts of whatsoever nature or kind heretofore or now pending between them in relation to any dealings whatsoever have been and are now finally settled, as well those relating to such dealings or transactions as took place between the said Harvey Devereux and the late Sir William De Montmorency baronet, as those between said Harvey Devereux and said William De Montmorency; and that for peace sake, as well as to avoid litigation and expense, said William De Montmorency has agreed to secure to the said Harvey Devereux the principal sum of £2700, in full for the balance due on said accounts, by two bonds."

This is in October 1830, when there had been ample time to review the transactions of the preceding year, when there was no haste in the conclusion of the transaction, when the plaintiff had the advice of the professional persons whose names I have mentioned, when their attention had been drawn to the transaction of 1829; and, assuming they were not parties to any conspiracy against their client, which is not suggested, but that they were doing their duty towards the person on whose behalf they were acting, they had deliberately come to a ratification of that which had taken place in the preceding year, and Mr. Montgomery approves of that draft on behalf of his client. He therefore tells his client by that approval, I have done my duty towards you; I have investigated all the transactions which concern the account between yourself and Mr. Devereux, which necessarily included the transactions of the period anterior to the death of the father, as well as those subsequent; I approve of this draft on your behalf, and I, as your legal adviser, sanction your [98] executing that deed, which upon the face of it recites a settlement of all accounts, as well those anterior to the death of the father as subsequent.

Now, my Lords, if the transaction were actually void in itself, there can be no confirmation of a transaction void in itself. But a transaction voidable only from circumstances of suspicion, however strong, may undoubtedly be confirmed by a subsequent deliberate act of the party who might originally probably have succeeded in having it declared void. It was subsequently investigated; it was subsequently considered by the party's professional advisers, and with their assistance, and with all due deliberation, he came to the conclusion that it ought to be confirmed.

Now, that deed contains a confirmation in terms of the conveyance of Cooldrina; it is necessarily part of the transaction to confirm the agreement. At the same time it must be observed, that it is introduced in this deed as an exception from the undertaking to convey other estates. The defendant, being trustee of the estates, upon this final settlement for the cestuique trust having claimed security for what he conceived to be due to him, he undertakes to denude himself of the trust, and to put into possession of the legal title that cestuique trust for whom he held the legal estates; and he therefore covenants to convey the estate, excepting that estate of Cooldrina, and he agrees to give up the deeds, except the deeds of Cooldrina. It is not, therefore, foisted into the deed merely for the purpose of confirmation, but it is a necessary exception out of that covenant which the defendant was necessarily called upon to execute when he came to the final settlement between himself and the plaintiff. But there is not [99] only a settlement of the accounts anterior to the father's death, but the conveyance of the estate is now proved to be brought under the attention of the plaintiff's legal advisers, and with their concurrence and with their advice he confirms it.

My Lords, it would be extremely difficult under these circumstances, if nothing more had taken place, unless he had said, you Messrs. Montgomery and Aicken have conspired with the defendant, and you have imposed upon me, and induced me to execute this deed in confirmation of a prior transaction. If that had been the case he had attempted to make, one could have understood it; but how, with the concurrence of Messrs. Montgomery and Aicken,—how, coming forward with them and employing them as his legal advisers, he can repudiate this deed of 1830, has appeared to me from the first to be a matter which involved the plaintiff in a difficulty that was perfectly insurmountable.

But there is another circumstance which proves that this was not done behind the back of the plaintiff, or without his knowledge and concurrence, but that he was perfectly privy to what was going on under the immediate direction, no doubt, of his legal advisers,—but at the same time communicated to him, and his concurrence asked, and that is the tenor of the subsequent letters. It is not that any letters subsequently written can add to the validity of a transaction formerly entered into, as in that deed of 1830, but the value of these subsequent letters is, to show that the plaintiff clearly understood what he had done, and that for a considerable time after that period he never questioned the propriety of the transactions into which he had [100] entered. On the 10th of November 1831 he is called upon, (it being part of the transaction of 1830 that Mr. Devereux had brought certain debts to account in his transactions with the testator,) he was called upon to show that such investigation of those transactions had taken place as exonerated him from being liable to the payment of those debts. There were certain debts excepted, which he had not taken credit for, and other debts he had taken credit for, and was bound to see to the payment of them.

There is a letter of the 16th of November written by himself to the defendant, in terms not of hostility, but the contrary, and so far consistent with the case made by the appellant; and in this letter of the 16th of November 1831, which he addresses "Dear Harvey," he states that he has been called upon to pay a debt, and he states, "By the deed executed between you and me you undertook the payment of all debts due of my late father, except certain debts in and on the back of the said deed excepted." Therefore he tells him that he Devereux was to be looked to, and not the plaintiff, for the payment of that debt. Now, after this can it be said that he did not know what he had done, or that knowing what he had done he had no intention of confirming it?

The next letter is also undoubtedly open to the observation which has been made upon it; it may have arisen from the continued pressure of Mr. Devereux upon the plaintiff, but there is no such thing proved at that time. That letter in terms recognizes the transaction, but it also proves this,—indeed it is apparent upon the face of the whole transaction,—that it was not merely in consideration of the balance supposed to be [101] due at the time of the father's death, but that it was partly on account of the settlement of the accounts, and partly stated to be in consideration of a wish which the plaintiff's father had expressed that he would convey to Devereux the estate in question. He says, "some evil-minded person has told you lately that I repented giving you Cooldrina. I can assure you I never did say so; no, neither did I ever repent giving it to you, and whoever told you so told you a great falsehood."

My Lords, that brings it down to October 1832. Then there is a transaction which has been adverted to, and which is in evidence, of a later date, namely, the transaction of April 1833; because here we find the plaintiff and the defendant in opposition to each other. Mr. Maher, the partner of Mr. Devereux, brings an action for a bill of costs. That is not a very friendly proceeding, and it was not likely, therefore, that under those circumstances there should be any very kindly feeling between the parties; nor was it very likely that the plaintiff should be then acting in what he did under any influence of fear as to what the defendant might do with regard to the title of the estate. It might have been a very improper proceeding, and certainly was a very improper proceeding on the part of the plaintiffs in the action, because they were then claiming costs due to them from the plaintiff's father which had been the subject of arrangement long before, and their title to which they had deliberately relinquished. But who is it that sets up the benefit of the settlement of 1829? Why, the plaintiff himself. He says, You are calling upon me to pay costs, which costs by the transaction of 1829 you have waived all title to. He is the party who [102] in 1833 was claiming the benefit of this arrangement. Whatever ambiguity there may be in the language of Mr. Maher's deposition, the result, as I understand it, is, that the plaintiff, then the defendant, set up this defence, and got the benefit of this defence, and he was accordingly protected from all costs incurred in the lifetime of the plaintiff's father, and due from the plaintiff's father to Mr. Devereux and Mr. Maher. Whatever costs there might be due to Mr. Maher individually, is not the subject of the claim of Mr. Devereux, but that, so far as regarded the costs due to the partnership of Devereux and Maher, the plaintiff got the benefit of that defence. Having set up the arrangement of 1829, which he now impeaches, he got the benefit of it, and was relieved from the costs incurred in the lifetime of his father. That took place in 1833, and nothing more is heard of this complaint of the transaction of 1829 until a bill is filed in 1835.

My Lords, having gone through the history of this transaction, and shortly called your attention to the periods at which the circumstances of the case must have been matter of investigation by the plaintiff, and the mode in which upon those occasions he has dealt with these facts, showing that, in 1829, in every subsequent transaction he has recognized what had taken place, that he has confirmed it, and acted upon it in the years 1831, 1832, and 1833, and never complained of it till 1835; it appears to me that, although the transaction was questionable in its origin and suspicious in its commencement, it is not now capable of being complained of; that, therefore, it will be the duty of your Lordships to confirm the decision of the Court below.

[103] My Lords, the Court below dismissed the bill without costs; and I think they did right, because, however transactions may be confirmed, if they have their origin in circumstances so suspicious, as between a client and a solicitor, as these transactions were in their origin, I think that if the solicitor or agent ultimately escapes, by confirmation on the part of his client, in preventing those transactions being entirely set aside, he never can complain of being put to the cost of having those transactions investigated. The same ground, therefore, which induces me to think that the Court below did right in dismissing the bill without costs, induces me to submit to your Lordships that this decree should be affirmed, but that it should be affirmed without costs.

There is one other part of the case to which I wish to call the attention of the counsel for the appellant, which is, to that letter undertaking to pay a salary of £200 a year. It does not appear that that now is of any value to the parties. Whatever, therefore, your Lordships may think right to do with reference to that letter would not make any difference as to the costs; at the same time it is a contract which, under these circumstances, undoubtedly ought never to have been taken. It appears to have been left in the hands of Mr. Devereux; and, if the plaintiff therefore requires it, I will submit to your Lordships that the decree should direct the document to be delivered up. It can make no difference as to the costs below or as to the costs here.

Lord Wynford.—My noble and learned friend has gone so fully into this case that it is scarcely necessary for me to say more than that I concur with him. I will, however, trouble your Lordships with one or two [104] observations. There is no dispute here as to any question of law. There is no doubt that the transaction did not render the deed altogether void, but merely voidable, and being voidable it may certainly be confirmed by what took place afterwards. If the deed of 1829 was executed (which probably there may be some reason to suspect) under the supposition that the defendant was in possession of some secret which he might use for the purpose of defeating the plaintiff's title to the estate, a fear of that sort, arising from a threat on the part of the defendant, would invalidate any transaction that took place under the influence of that fear. I would state, however, that there is no evidence of any threat on the part of the defendant to make use of any knowledge which he might possess for the purpose of injuring the plaintiff; on the contrary, it is admitted on all sides that, although it is said by some of the witnesses that he boasted that he was in possession of this secret, he uniformly said that he would keep it within his own breast, and that he would never use it to injure the plaintiff.

My noble and learned friend has stated, that upon another occasion, besides what took place at the bonfire meeting, he alluded to this secret. What he said at the bonfire meeting is, as it is represented on the part of the plaintiff, very extraordinary, and it is scarcely possible to believe that it can be true. It is material to observe that the defendant gives a very different account of what he said at the bonfire meeting. On the part of the plaintiff it is stated, that the defendant said he could at any time, by disclosing the secret, defeat the plaintiff's title. What could possibly have induced him to say any such thing one cannot conceive, but, according to his own account, what he did say [105] was very different from what he is represented to have said by the evidence given on the part of the plaintiff, for he states in his answer that what he did say was: that it would be useless for my Lord Crofton to bring forward his claim as heir-at-law, as he was in a condition to disprove that claim. Now, if he said that, certainly it was sufficient to produce the effect which he says he intended to produce, to prevail upon the tenants of this estate not to be frightened at any claim set up by Lord Crofton. But notwithstanding this, unquestionably what my noble and learned friend has said is very true, that on the very day of the funeral of Sir William De Montmorency something at least very indelicate was said on the part of the plaintiff, if not exciting very great suspicion. in this affair, of his endeavouring to get possession of this estate conveyed to him, and also as himself being the attorney who was to prepare the deed himself, and writing that very extraordinary letter, by which £200 a year was to be secured to himself; and I quite agree with my noble and learned friend that if proceedings had been instituted to set aside this deed,—the deed which followed upon that conveyance,—it seems to me impossible that that deed or that that letter securing £200 a year could possibly have stood. Therefore I say, if the transaction had ended with the deed executed in 1829, it appears to me it could have been set aside. But the question is, has that deed which was only voidable, been confirmed by that which has subsequently occurred? Now, the deed of 1830 is certainly a direct confirmation of it, as strong confirmation as it is possible to be. In that deed it is stipulated that all securities belonging to Sir William's property should be delivered up, except the deeds relating to the estate [106] of Cooldrina. Why were they not delivered up? Because the estate of Cooldrina by the deed of 1829 had been conveyed by the plaintiff to the defendant. It would, therefore, have been improper to deliver up those deeds, because those deeds were the muniments of the property which had by the previous transaction, so confirmed by this, become the property of the plaintiff. But that is not all: then follow two letters in 1831 and 1832, and the subsequent transaction in 1833. By the first of those letters in 1831 he claims to take advantage of this very deed, which he now attempts to set aside; and then in the second letter in 1832 he says, he never since the execution of the deed of 1829 had said one word to the effect that that deed had been improperly obtained; quite the contrary, he never thought of it, and that that man must have spoken falsely who had ever conveyed to the mind of the defendant the idea that he ever thought that deed void.

Now, it strikes me, that, supposing an undue impression to be excited in a man's mind, it is often difficult to prove the precise time when that improper impression was got rid of. But a circumstance had taken place, before the writing of either of these letters, which clearly showed that that impression must have been got rid of before that time; both these parties were desirous of putting an end to the connexion with regard to the agency of the estates. Now, if that impression had continued in the mind of the plaintiff, that the defendant was in a condition to take that estate from him, or to enable any one to take that estate from him, whenever he thought proper, would he not, upon any terms whatever, have kept this person still in his employment? But it appears that the one was desirous of quitting [107] the employment, and that the employer was desirous of getting rid of him. Now, this clearly shows that all fear on the part of the plaintiff must have been got rid of at that time. Yet after this he writes the two letters which your Lordships have heard; therefore, whatever suspicion there may be with respect to that which took place in 1830, as to the continuance of this fear as to the title to the estate, it is clear that that impression must have been got rid of before the writing of either of the letters in 1831 or 1832, for before either of those letters was written all connexion whatever had been terminated between the plaintiff and the defendant.

But, I must say, with respect to the deed of 1830, it seems to me, that if that deed were to be set aside, as was very properly said by one of the counsel at the bar, I do not know what deed is to stand. There is no particular error pointed out; matters were investigated before this deed was executed; there was no want of legal assistance; it seems to me, on the contrary, that if there was any thing to complain of, there were rather too many present; there were a great number of attorneys present, some concerned for one party, and some concerned for another; and it is positively sworn that all parts of the transaction were minutely and thoroughly investigated before the deed was executed. It appears to me that if this were to be set aside, no transaction which takes place between man and man could be considered as final. but parties must be for ever exposed to have transactions ripped up in a court of equity, if these accounts are not to be considered as void, closed under this agreement which took place in 1829.

[108] I therefore, my Lords, agree with my noble and learned friend, that the decree of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland in every part ought to be affirmed. It is undoubtedly the practice, that where an appeal is made against a decree, and the judgment of the court below is affirmed, that appeal ought to be dismissed with costs; but I think, with my noble and learned friend, that this case forms an exception to that general rule,—that there is so much to blame in the conduct of this defendant, in the beginning and up to the year 1829, that the plaintiff was fully justified in appealing to the Court of Chancery in Ireland, and even in coming to this House, to have the matter thoroughly investigated. Under these circumstances it appears to me, that it would be hard and unjust to visit such a plaintiff, who is acting under such circumstances, with costs. I therefore concur with my noble and learned friend, in thinking that this appeal should be dismissed without costs.

With respect to that instrument to which reference has been made, undoubtedly it ought to be given up, though it was distinctly stated, as understood on both sides at the bar, that that instrument, wretched instrument as it is, was not intended to be carried into execution. I am glad that the party had so much modesty and moderation as never to attempt to carry it into execution; it never has been executed; nothing has been attempted to be obtained upon it, but the party is afraid that there may be bounds to that moderation, and that the period may come when he may be in danger of being called upon for the payment of that sum of £200 per annum; and it is certainly extremely proper that he should have full security against any danger of that sort.

[109] Mr. Tinney.—If your Lordships please, we would have an order to deliver up that instrument; I dare say the parties will give it us.

Mr. Goldamid.—If it is in our possession. We do not know that it is.

Lord Chancellor.—The decree will be varied by directing the letter of April 1829 to be delivered up, and the rest of the bill to be dismissed, without costs.

It is ordered, That the said decree be varied by directing that the letter of the appellant to the respondent, referred to in the proceedings in this appeal, and dated the 18th of April 1829, be delivered up by the respondent to the appellant, and that in all other respects the said decree be affirmed.

[110] FROM THE COURT OF CHANCERY, IRELAND.

DUDLEY PERSSE Esquire and FRANCES PERSSE otherwise BARRY his Wife,
DUDLEY PERSSE the younger, KATHERINE HENRIETTA PERSSE, MARIA PERSSE, RICHARD DUDLEY PERSSE, and ELIZABETH PERSSE, Infants, by the said DUDLEY PERSSE, their Father and next Friend,—

JOHN PRENDERGAST VEREKER, JAMES LAMBERT, Sir JOHN BURKE,
ANTHONY RICHARD BLAKE, JOHN MARTYN, and the Earl of ROSSE,—
Respondents [13th, 17th, 18th, and 20th February, and 7th May, 1840].

It is not competent for a defendant, failing in the defence made, by his answer to set up another defence dependent upon matters of fact not put in issue by his answer, and which the plaintiff has no opportunity of disproving or explaining.

Robert Persse being heir presumptive to R. P. Persse, who was then supposed to be a lunatic, and being under an apprehension that unfair means might be resorted to, in the then state of mind of R. P. Persse, to deprive the family of the succession to the estate, agrees with his eldest son, "Dudley Persse, that D. Persse should sue out a commission of lunacy against R. P. Persse, and carry on such other suits and law proceedings as should be [111] necessary, in the name of Robert Persse, at the expense of Dudley Persse; in consideration of which agreement, and natural love and affection, R. Persse covenants that after the death of R. P. Persse the estates which should thereupon descend to him should be conveyed to himself for life, remainder to his son for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male. The son, at his own expense, and in the name of his father, sued out the commission under which R. P. Persse is found a lunatic, who soon afterwards dies; whereupon the father succeeds as heir to the lunatic's estates. Upon a bill filed by the son to carry into effect this agreement, specific performance decreed, and held that the agreement was not voluntary, void for champerty or maintenance, or illegal, either for want of mutuality, or as being a fraud upon the great seal in lunacy; and considering the ages and situations of the parties, the father being sixty-two and the lunatic forty, and the objects to be gained by the prosecution of the commission of lunacy, that the consideration for the deed was not inadequate; but that deeds for carrying into effect family arrangements are exempt from the rules which affect other deeds, the consideration being composed partly of value and partly of love and affection.

The respondent, Robert Persse, being tenant for life of the Roxburgh estate, situate in the county of Galway, with remainder to his eldest son, the appellant Dudley Persse, in tail, by settlement of the 1st May 1823, conveyed the same to Dudley Persse in fee, subject to an annuity of £800 payable for his own life, the payment of his debts amounting to £17,000, and to a charge of £6000 for portions for his younger children. The yearly value of the Roxburgh estate was about £4500, and the consideration for the deed was fixed by the stamp office at the sum of £29,250.

[112] By settlement dated the 11th of November 1826, and made in contemplation of a marriage, which was afterwards had, between Dudley Persse and Katherine O'Grady, the daughter of the Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, Dudley Persse, being seised in fee of the Roxburgh estate under recoveries suffered in pursuance of the deed of 1823, conveyed the same to trustees, (subject, in common with several other lands, to the annuity of £800,) to Dudley Persse for life, with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, and after providing an annuity by way of jointure for Katherine O'Grady, and £10,000 for the portions of younger children, to the first and other sons of the said Dudley Persse in tail male.

In 1827 the respondent Robert Persse, being then of the age of sixty-five, was heir presumptive to Robert Parsons Persse, then of the age of forty; and in the event of Robert Parsons Persse surviving the respondent Robert Persse, the appellant Dudley Persse would have been the presumptive heir of Robert Parsons Persse. Robert Parsons Persse, who was then supposed to be a lunatic, was seised in fee of the Castleboy estate in the county of Galway, which was of the value of about £2000 a year. Apprehensions being at that time entertained that unfair means might be resorted to, by persons taking advantage of the state of mind of Robert Parsons Persse, for the purpose of depriving the family of the succession to the Castleboy estate, and the respondent Robert Persse having expressed a wish that the Castleboy estate, which had formerly belonged to his family, should be re-annexed to the Roxburgh estate, it was agreed between the appellant Dudley [113] Persse and the respondent Robert Persse, that a commission of lunacy should be sued out against Robert Parsons Persse, in the name of Robert Persse, at the cost and expense of Dudley Persse. Robert Persse had been a bankrupt, and had not the necessary means for prosecuting the commission. Under these circumstances a deed, of the 8th day of December 1827, was executed by Robert Persse of the one part and Dudley Persse of the other part, whereby, after reciting that Robert Persse would, after the decease of the said Robert Parsons Persse intestate and without issue, be entitled to the remainder or reversion in fee simple of the Castleboy estate, as heir-at-law to the said Robert Parsons Persse, and that the appellant Dudley Persse had agreed, at the request of his father, to sue out a commission of lunacy against Robert Parsons Persse, and to institute and carry on such other suits and law proceedings as should thereafter become necessary, in the name of the said Robert Persse, if necessary, and at the sole and entire expenses and charges of him the said Dudley Persse; It was by the said indenture witnessed, that in pursuance and execution of the said agreement, and for and in consideration of the natural love and affection which Robert Persse bore to his son Dudley Persse, and in further consideration of the sum of 10s. to Robert Persse paid by Dudley Persse, Robert Persse did for himself, his heirs and assigns, covenant and agree with the appellant Dudley Persse, his heirs and assigns, that from and after the decease of the said Robert Parsons Persse the Castleboy estate should be conveyed and vested in Robert Persse for life, and from and after his decease be conveyed for the same [114] uses, estates, and limitations as the Roxburgh estate stood settled; and there was a covenant upon the part of Robert Persse for further assurance.

On the 22d April 1828 Dudley Persse at his own expense caused a commission of lunacy, upon the petition of Robert Persse, to be sued out against Robert Parsons Persse, who, after an inquiry which lasted fifteen days, was found a lunatic. On the 25th of October 1829 Robert Parsons Persse died, and an ejectment being brought by a person claiming under the will of the lunatic, the jury upon the trial found a verdict against the claim set up by the will; and thereupon Robert Persse entered into the possession of the Castleboy estate, which had descended to him by the death of Robert Parsons Persse. Dudley Persse, independent of what was allowed him out of the lunatic's estate for the costs incurred in the lunacy, paid the sum of £295.

In the year 1829 Katherine Persse, the wife of Dudley Persse, died, leaving the appellants, Dudley Persse the younger, Katherine Henrietta Persse, and Maria Persse, the children of the marriage between herself and Dudley Persse.

By indenture of the 9th day of June 1830, executed by Robert Persse of the first part, the respondent, the Earl of Rosse, of the second part, and the respondent Robert Henry Persse, the second son of the said Robert Persse, of the third part, after reciting that Robert Persse was seised in fee simple in possession of the estate of Castleboy, and reciting that the said respondent Robert Persse did, by indenture bearing date on or about the 1st day of May 1823, fully and sufficiently provide for and advance his eldest son, the [115] appellant Dudley Persse, and that Robert Persse was desirous of settling the remainder in fee of the Castleboy estate on Robert Henry Persse, his second son, on the terms therein-after specified, and to vest in possession on the demise of him, Robert Persse; and Robert Henry Persse agreed to purchase the same on such terms as were therein-after expressed; it was witnessed, that in pursuance of the agreement, and in consideration of £16,000 sterling to him, the said respondent Robert Persse, secured by the bond, with warrant of attorney for confessing judgment thereon, of Robert Henry Persse, bearing equal date therewith, Robert Persse conveyed the Castleboy estate to the Earl of Rosse and his heirs for ever, upon trust for Robert Persse for life, and after his decease in trust for Robert Henry Persse, his heirs and assigns for ever; and reciting, that the said sum of £16,000, so secured by the said bond and warrant of Robert Henry Persse, was thereby made payable to the executors, administrators, or assigns of Robert Persse on the expiration of twelve months after Robert Henry Persse, his heirs or assigns, should have been put into the actual and lawful and peaceable possession of the said lands and premises thereby conveyed and assured, with interest thereon at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum from the day of the death of Robert Persse, it was thereby further agreed between Robert Henry Persse and Robert Persse, that Robert Henry Persse would, on the expiration of twelve months from the day when he should obtain the actual possession of the said lands and premises thereby conveyed, pay unto Robert Persse, his executors, administrators, or assigns, the said sum of £16,000, and in the meantime would pay to Robert [116] Persse, his executors, administrators, and assigns, interest upon the said sum of £16,000 at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum from the day of the death of Robert Persse.

By a marriage settlement dated the 15th of July 1833, and made in contemplation of a marriage which was afterwards had between the appellant Dudley Persse and Frances Barry, Dudley Persse, in consideration of the marriage portion of the said Frances Barry, amounting to upwards of £20,000, conveyed the reversion in fee expectant upon the determination of the estate in tail male, limited to the first and other sons of Dudley Persse by his first wife, Katherine O'Grady, by the settlement of the 11th of November 1826, in the Roxburgh estate, to trustees for 1000 years, for raising portions for the younger children of the marriage, and subject thereto to the appellant Dudley Persse for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of the marriage in strict settlement; and he covenanted, when he should become possessed of the Castleboy estate, to settle it to the same uses as he had settled the Roxburgh estate.

On 19th June 1835 the appellants, with the exception of the appellant Elizabeth Persse, who was afterwards made a plaintiff by amendment, filed their original bill in this cause, stating to the effect before mentioned, and stating that the said Robert Persse and Robert Henry Persse had cut a great deal of timber, both ornamental and otherwise, upon the Castleboy estate, and had ploughed up and burnt part of the estate; and praying that the indenture of the 9th day of June 1830 might be declared fraudulent and void, and might be brought into court and cancelled; and that [117] the respondents Robert Persse, and Robert Henry Persse, and the said Earl of Rosse might, in pursuance of the covenant of the respondent Robert Persse in the indenture of the 8th day of December 1827, be compelled by the decree of the Court to convey the Castleboy estate to and for the several uses and trusts specified and mentioned in the settlements of the 11th day of November 1826 and 15th day of July 1833, so far as the same were then capable of being effectuated; and that Robert Persse and Robert Henry Persse might be restrained by the order and injunction of the Court from cutting down any timber or other trees upon the said premises of Castleboy, or from burning any of the land, or from committing any other waste on the said Castleboy estate; and that an account might be taken of the waste committed by the said respondents Robert Persse and Robert Henry Persse, or either of them, on the Castleboy estate, and the value thereof ascertained, and that the sum due on the said account might be paid into court, and invested or otherwise disposed of, according to the rights of the parties thereto.

The respondent Robert Persse by his answers stated, that Dudley Persse had withheld the payment of the annuity provided by the deed of the 11th November 1826, and suffered a large arrear to become due, whereby he became embarrassed, and that Dudley Persse had withheld the payment of the annuity in order that, by taking advantage of Robert Persse's distress, he might carry into effect certain plans which he had formed as to extorting from Robert Persse his expectancy in the Castleboy estate; that he had executed the deed of the 8th December 1827 without being aware of its nature and effect; that he never intended to convey his expectancy in the Castleboy estate, but he only intended by the execution of the deed to charge the estates with the expense of prosecuting the commission of lunacy; that he was induced to execute the same by fraud and misrepresentation of the object of the deed, and without having received any valuable consideration, and that the same, being a voluntary agreement, ought not to be binding upon him; and he stated that Charles O'Connor, who prepared the deed, was not then or upon any previous occasion his solicitor, and that he executed the same without any professional advice.

On the part of the plaintiff it was proved that Charles O'Connor was the solicitor of Dudley Persse, and that he had suggested to Dudley Persse the necessity of suing out a commission of lunacy against Robert Parsons Persse, in order to save the estate to the family; and that, in consequence of communications conveyed by Charles O'Connor from Dudley Persse to his father on the 3d of December 1827, Robert Persse and Dudley Persse went to the house of Charles O'Connor in Dublin, when Charles O'Connor took down in writing Robert Persse's instructions, whereby he agreed to convey to Dudley Persse his expectancy in the estate of Castleboy in consideration of love and affection, reserving a life interest in the estate, and that Dudley Persse should have full power to proceed in his name in suing out the commission of lunacy.

These instructions were submitted to counsel as instructions for the preparation of the deed; the counsel wrote at the foot of the paper the words following:—

"I have not made Mr. Robert Persse's estate for life free from impeachment of waste, nor given him a leasing power, not being so instructed."

[119] The draft of the deed of 8th December 1827 on behalf of Dudley Persse was laid by Charles O'Connor before Waller O'Grady, a barrister, and brother-in-law of the appellant Dudley Persse, for his perusal and amendment, the instructions for which purpose were written in the fold of the draft, and at the foot thereof were written, in the handwriting of Charles O'Connor, the words

“Quere { leasing powers?”
          { impeachment of waste?”

Mr. Waller O'Grady introduced into the draft a recital of an agreement between Robert Persse and Dudley Persse, that Dudley Persse should sue out a commission of lunacy against Robert Parsons Persse, and carry on such suits and legal proceedings as should be necessary for the protection of the person and property of Robert Parsons Persse, at the sole cost and expense of Dudley Persse; and altered the draft by making Dudley Persse tenant for life, instead of tenant in fee.

A draft of the deed was afterwards submitted to Mr. Serjeant Blackburne by Charles O'Connor on behalf of Robert Persse, and appeared to be a copy of the draft as altered by Mr. Waller O'Grady, with the same instructions in the fold, except that the queries as to giving the respondent Robert Persse a leasing power and rendering him dispunishable of waste were omitted. Mr. Blackburne altered the draft, by making it a deed of covenant instead of an actual conveyance.

In the draft as settled by Mr. Serjeant Blackburne there remained in the covenant against incumbrances an exception as to leases to be made by Robert Persse; [120] Mr. Waller O'Grady, after the draft had been so settled by Mr. Serjeant Blackburne, struck out the exception as to leases to be made by Robert Persse, and made the following observation in the margin:—

“As the object is very much to unite the two demesnes of Roxburgh and Castleboy, it is not intended that either party should have leasing powers.

“W. O'G.”

It was proved that the deed of the 8th December 1827 was, on the day of its date, executed by Robert Persse at Lord Guillamore's house in Dublin, and though Lord Guillamore was not actually present at the execution of the deed he was frequently in the room when the parties had met for that purpose; and Robert Persse, after the execution of the deed, delivered the deed which was in his possession to Lord Guillamore, saying, that the younger branches of his family, when they had found he had executed the deed, would annoy him on the subject, and that therefore he wished Lord Guillamore to take care of it, and not to deliver up the deed though he wrote for it, unless he came in person.

It was proved that, in the month of December 1827, Robert Persse had declared that the Roxburgh and Castleboy estates should never be separated, and that for that purpose he had executed a deed to his son Dudley. It was likewise proved, that Robert Persse, upon being asked whether he intended by the deed of 1827 to make any further provision for his younger children, stated, that he did not intend to make any such provision by that deed. It was proved also, that a great quantity of timber on the estate had been cut [121] down, and a great quantity of ancient meadow broken up and set in con-acre.

One of the defendants' witnesses, James Blakeney, deposed, that his father was law agent to the respondent Robert Persse up to 1823 or 1824, and that his father was succeeded (as he believed) in the law agency to Robert Persse by Charles O'Connor; and Robert Persse wrote two letters to Charles O'Connor, dated the 3d of February and 10th of April 1828, in the first of which he states, “That his cook had been served with a paper on the 1st instant, and he supposed that a similar one was served on Dudley;” in the second he states, that “Burton Persse's man is on the lands this day, directing all the meadow lands to be cleared of the stock, and fenced up. Is it possible that he can hold over the lands, and his lease expired at the death of Robert Parsons Persse? What is the Chancellor doing? Surely it is time for him to declare who is to be the owner of the property? By Barton being allowed to hold over the lands and cut the meadows, it will take 500 guineas out of the pocket of the heir-at-law. Let me hear from you if you have any thing pleasant to communicate in my cause.” And it was proved on the part of Robert Persse that he was during the years 1826, 1827, and 1828 in want of money and in embarrassed circumstances.

The cause came on to be heard before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland on the 7th day of February 1837, when his Lordship decreed, as to so much of the appellants' amended bill as related to the subject of waste, that the same be dismissed, with costs; and that as to the remainder of the said original and amended bills, that the same be dismissed, without costs; and that as to the [122] draft deeds, that the same be deposited with the registrar, with liberty for all parties to inspect the same. And it was ordered, that the defendants, the Earl of Rosse, Sir John Burke, John Martyn, James Lambert, Anthony Richard Blake, and John Prendergast Vereker, are entitled to have their costs against Dudley Persse.

From this decree the appellants appealed.

Mr. Pemberton and Sir William Follett for the Appellants.—The deed of 1823 was more advantageous to the father than the son. The father's age was sixty-two. The consideration for the father's giving up his life estate, which was fixed by the stamp office at £29,250, exceeds the value of the father's life interest.

In 1827 Robert Parsons Persse was supposed to be a lunatic; it was thought advantageous that a commission should be sued out; it was inconvenient to the father to incur the expense of suing out the commission, and the son was unwilling, unless he could derive some advantage from it. If Parsons Persse had made a valid will before his lunacy, all the proceedings would have been useless; and this was not a matter of speculation, as a will was actually set up; so, if the jury had not found that he was in an unsound state, the whole expense would have fallen upon the son. The arrangement of the deed of the 8th December 1827 was a natural family arrangement, that the son should be at the expense of the commission; and if Robert Parsons Persse died in the lifetime of the father, that the Castleboy estate was to be settled in the same way as the Roxburgh estate: the father had repeatedly expressed his wish that the [123] two estates should be re-united. The sum of £250 beyond taxed costs was the expense of the commission. The decree cannot be sustained upon any thing in issue in the pleadings. The defence is, that the deed was executed for securing Dudley Persse's advances; if this was the object of the deed, why did he dispose of the estate by the deed of the 19th of June 1830 without mentioning that security? Then it is objected that the defendant did not consent to the omission of a leasing power, or that the estate should be impeachable for waste.

The attention of the defendant is called by the bill to his having an estate impeachable of waste, and yet he takes no notice of it in his answer; he does not state, as he ought to have done, that he never intended to convey free from impeachment of waste; nor are these objections put in issue by the answer. He admits that he told O'Connor to prepare the deed with expedition, and admits the execution, but says he was not aware of its effect. O'Connor was the solicitor both of the plaintiff and defendant. It is proved that the deed was read over to him, and there is no imputation that he is not a competent person. If there was fraud the Chief Baron must have been a party to it; but the Lord Chancellor of Ireland absolves the O'Gradys from all fraud. The deed substantially accords with the instructions, and it must have been agreed between the parties that the estate should be impeachable of waste and without any leasing power. The Lord Chancellor says, that there is no adequate consideration for the deed; but this is not a case where inadequacy of consideration will operate; it is a case of family arrangement [124]-ment. All the cases upon that subject are collected in Neale v. Neale (1 Keen's Reports, 672), Tweddell v. Tweddell (1 Turner and Russell, 1).

Mr. Knight Bruce and Mr. Jacob for the Respondents.—Is this such an agreement as a court of equity will carry into effect? 1st. The contract is illegal; it has the character of champerty and maintenance: giving an estate to one for life and another a reversion in fee is equally champerty as if there was a division of the estate. This is not the suit of the father maintained and assisted by the son, but joint suit of father and son for campi partitio under a joint agreement between them: Byrne v. Frere (2 Molloy, 157), Wood v. Downes (18 Ves. 120), Harrington v. Long (2 Milne and Keen, 590). 2d. Contrary to the policy of the law. The Chancellor was deceived in the proceedings in lunacy; and Dudley Persse is examined as a witness in the lunacy, divested of all interest, neither the real object nor the real petitioner appearing in the proceedings before the Court. 3d. Want of mutuality. What damages could the father have recovered against the son if the son had refused to bear the expense of the legal proceedings? Lawrence v. Butler (1 Sch. and Lef. 20), Hamilton v. Grant (3 Dow. 33), Bozon v. Farlow (1 Merivale, 459). Hardship, distress, and ignorance are all grounds for refusing to execute this agreement: Evans v. Cheeshire (Belt's Supp.

to Vesey, sen. 307), Wiseman v. Beake (2 Vernon, 121). It was not a family arrangement: Pullen v. Ready (2 Atk. 587), Stapilton v. Stapilton (1 Atk. 2), Cann v. Cann (1 Pere Williams, 723), Cory v. Cory (1 Ves. 20), Stockley v. [125] Stockley (1 Ves. and Bea. 23). No provision by this deed for younger children: one son with an estate of £4500 a year, the others scarcely having any provision. Family arrangement must be for the benefit of all the family. There must be no concealment or suppression: Gordon v. Gordon (3 Swanston, 473). The draft was sent to O'Grady, who sees the draft will not do, and invents a consideration. The deed voluntary but for O'Grady's alterations; and a court of equity does not execute a voluntary agreement: Underwood v. Hithcox (1 Ves. 279). He, again, strikes out of the draft the word leases, for which he had no authority. A court of equity only carries into execution an agreement which is certain, fair, and just, especially where the contract relates to a future interest, Buxton and Lister (3 Atkins, 382). It lies upon him who seeks to enforce a contract in respect of a reversion to prove adequacy of price. It is impossible to put a definite construction upon what suits or proceedings Robert Persse had a right to call upon his son to institute. Who was to be the judge of the necessity or expediency of the suits? If the son was to be the judge it is illusory, and the father could not compel the son to institute any suits. Is the agreement fair? It was executed by surprise; there was no opportunity given to the father of consulting his friends, no solicitor employed on his behalf. Lord Plunkett says the attempt to prove O'Connor the solicitor of Dudley Persse is a miserable failure. This is a suit to enforce, not rescind, an agreement, Stanley and Robinson (1 Russell and Mylne, 527). The solicitor prepared two drafts; neither of the drafts are conformable to the instructions.

[126] (Lord Chancellor.—This is entirely a new case, for which the plaintiff could not be prepared.)

The plaintiff must be prepared to prove that the instructions were conformable to the deed. He had no occasion to say he was taken by surprise, because he had the documents upon which the bill was drawn. The father was taken to Lord Guilmores to have the deed executed; he was only there on this occasion, when the estate was to be made over to his son-in-law, and unusual courtesy was shown to him.

Mr. Pemberton in reply.—The Court never refuses relief when the contract is not executory. Here all that could be done has been performed by the son; the plaintiff is only calling for the legal estate to perfect the settlement; no adequate relief at law on account of the various interests. There must be an action at law by each cestuique, and it is admitted that Robert would be unable to pay the damages. Champerty and maintenance do not apply to this case: this is no adverse suit, nor is there any property to be recovered. Then it is said there is no mutuality: want of mutuality only applies where the party coming for performance is not himself bound, as in the case of an infant; but if after the infant comes of age he files the bill, the objection fails: want of mutuality is not an objection where the agreement on one side has been actually performed. Inadequacy of consideration is not alleged; but in a family arrangement pecuniary consideration not of importance. Evidence must be looked to with reference to the issue joined: defence on the record differs from that made at the bar, and precludes the plaintiff from having any opportunity of explaining. [127] It appears by the original bill that Robert was tenant for life impeachable of waste, yet the answer does not say that he ought to be unimpeachable of waste, but denies the agreement to make any settlement at all; and the instructions and drafts were proved to show that a settlement was intended, and not security. The variance between the instructions and deed is prejudicial to Dudley; there never was any agreement that Robert should be dispunishable of waste, or have a leasing power. Whether he should or not was properly suggested by O'Connor and Miller; and O'Grady had means of communication with both parties; and it must be inferred that he had directions from Robert for making alterations in the draft. The only issue raised has been proved that a settlement, not a security, was intended. The object of the settlement was to re-unite the estates.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, I do not feel that I can at present call upon your Lordships to come to a final conclusion upon this cause; it is a matter of very great importance to the family, and involves questions of general importance as affecting the proceedings in courts of equity. But there is one circumstance as to which the other noble Lords who are present and myself, I believe, entirely concur, namely, that it is impossible for us to affirm the decree. I stated to your Lordships that it involves a question of extremely great importance in proceedings in courts of equity. We find that the issue which is raised upon the pleadings is proved on the part of the plaintiff, and disproved on the part of the defendant. The defendant has thought proper to tender a false defence; he has put his case upon that which is [128] disproved by all the evidence in the cause. There can be no doubt that he must have been aware when he executed the deed in question, and at the time when he put in his answer,—I am sorry to say he could not have forgotten,—that that deed was not merely in respect of the prosecution of the commission of lunacy, but that it was a settlement of the estate, in some way at least, upon his eldest son. He has, however, thought proper to take issue with the plaintiff upon that fact, and the plaintiff, therefore, in preparing for the hearing of this cause, had only to prove his own case and to repel the case made by the defendant, which, I believe, we are all of opinion he has completely succeeded in doing.

It is very true that there are circumstances, which appear upon the evidence which the plaintiff has gone into for the purpose of proving the issue stated in the pleadings and no other, which may be said to call for explanation, but the plaintiff has had no opportunity of entering into that explanation. It was not necessary for him to go into it, because upon that subject there was no issue tendered by the defendant: it is no part of his case upon his answer to state, that, although it is true he intended to make a settlement of his estate upon his son, with certain powers reserved to himself, there was, either by fraud or by negligence, an omission of those provisions which would have been for his benefit. There is no allusion to such a state of facts in the answer put in, in the cause. It was not only, therefore, not necessary, but it would have been superfluous for the plaintiff to have gone into evidence to disprove that which was not affirmed. At the same time, my Lords, there are circumstances, no doubt, which may, if investigated, show that the defendant has a case by which he [129] might be enabled to resist a part of that at least which is asked for by the plaintiff. I confess I have very great difficulty in permitting the defendant, after all which has occurred,—after a statement of a false issue in a contest with his antagonist, to have an opportunity of going into the proof of another case. I think it is extremely dangerous in principle; that it would be very likely to lead to improper means of meeting a claim when made, and also would incur some danger of very great difficulty being felt in coming to a satisfactory conclusion upon any inquiry which might be directed for that purpose. The only doubt, however, which I have, and I believe I may say which my noble and learned friend now present entertains, upon this subject is, whether there ought to be some mode directed by which those circumstances which the plaintiff has had no opportunity upon the record, as the defendant tendered the issues to him, of explaining, should be the subject of further investigation. For that purpose it is necessary that we should take time to look into the proceedings, and in order to that I would propose to your Lordships that the further consideration of the case should be adjourned.

Lord Wynford.—My Lords, I entirely concur with my noble and learned friend, that the issue which has been tendered by the respondent, and which is that which therefore ought to be met by the appellant, has been proved clearly on the part of the appellant, and disproved as far as regards the respondent. But still, my Lords, I cannot but think that there are many circumstances in this case which are not met, probably it may be from the fault of the respondent that they were not properly brought before the Court; but it [130] appears to me that you cannot give a perfectly satisfactory judgment unless you can find out some mode by which these circumstances may be further investigated. I quite agree with my noble and learned friend, that it is an extremely dangerous thing, where a cause has been tried upon one point, to open it afterwards to the parties to inquire into other matters; but I think that the danger may be avoided in this case, if the objections which occur to me shall, on further consideration, appear to be made out by the evidence on the part of the plaintiff. I think it will be very dangerous now to let the defendant go into fresh evidence; but if it appears on the evidence on the part of the defendant that a judgment in favour of the plaintiff ought to have been given, or at least one less favourable to the defendant, it appears to me that there may in such case be a further investigation. What the mode of that investigation should be I do not know: it occurred to me at one time, and it struck my learned friend at one time, that it might be sent to an issue, but the matter is of such an extended nature that it is impossible the facts on which information is desirable can be satisfactorily ascertained by an issue. I am not familiar enough with the practice of the Court of Chancery to know what other mode there may be by which this matter may be investigated, but I agree with my noble and learned friend that it is highly proper, in a case of so much importance, and where I feel bound to say I cannot quite approve of the conduct of any of the parties to these transactions, that some delay should take place, for the purpose of considering whether any mode can be discovered by which the facts may be more clearly ascertained.

Further consideration adjourned.

[131] Lord Chancellor (7th May).—My Lords, the object of this bill was to carry into effect an arrangement between the plaintiff Dudley Persse and his father, the defendant Robert Persse, respecting a considerable landed estate which belonged to Parsons Persse, a supposed lunatic, to whom Robert Persse was heir-at-law.

By a previous arrangement of 1823 Robert the father, who was tenant for life of the family estates called Roxburgh, with remainder to his son Dudley in tail, had conveyed his life estate to Dudley in consideration of an annuity of £800 for his own life, and payment of debts which he owed, which are stated to have been equal to £17,000, and a charge upon the estate of £6000 for his younger children. The estate is represented to have produced about £4500 per annum, and the age of Robert the father in 1823 is stated to have been about sixty-one or sixty-two. Much has been said as to this transaction, but the propriety of it is not in question in this cause; its validity has never been impeached, and the provisions of it are very material for the purpose of showing the relative situation of the parties in the year 1827.

Before this time, that is in 1826, Dudley the son married Miss O'Grady, and by the settlement upon that marriage this Roxburgh estate was so settled that Dudley took only a life estate, with remainder to his elder son in tail, and provision was made for the wife and the younger children. Such was the state of the family property in 1827, at which time apprehensions were suggested that unfair means might be resorted to by others to deprive the family of the succession to the estates of Parsons Persse, the supposed [132] lunatic, which were called the Castleboy estates. The lunatic was at that time about forty, Robert Persse the father was sixty-five or sixty-six, and Dudley a young man. It is, therefore, obvious that Dudley's expectancy of succeeding as heir was much more valuable than his father's, and if he had so succeeded he would have had the fee.

From expressions proved to have been used by the father it appears that the Roxburgh and the Castleboy estates had formerly been united in his family, and that he was anxious that they should be re-united; but to effect this purpose it might be expedient that Dudley should not have the power of disposing of the Castleboy estate any more than he had of the Roxburgh estate. The course recommended to secure the Castleboy estate was to sue out a commission of lunacy against Parsons Persse, the expense of which, though to be paid out of his estate if the lunacy were established, required an immediate advance of money, which would fall upon the party suing out the commission if the lunacy should not be established. Robert Persse the father had been a bankrupt, and had no command of money; under these circumstances the deed of covenant in question in this cause, dated the 8th of December 1827, was executed, the effect of which was, that Dudley the son was to undertake the prosecution of the commission in the name of his father, the heir-at-law of the supposed lunatic, and the Castleboy estate, if it should descend upon the father upon the death of the lunatic, was to be settled so as to give to the father an estate for life, subject thereto upon the same trusts and purposes as the Roxburgh estate stood settled.

The commission was sued out and proceeded with [133] success. The lunatic died in October 1829, and a will having been set up an ejectment was brought by the person claiming under it, but upon a trial the jury found a verdict against his claim. The title of the heir being thus established, in June 1835 the present bill was filed to carry into effect the provisions of the deed of the 8th of December 1827; and with reference to the grounds upon which the prayer of that bill was refused by the Court of Chancery in Ireland, and upon which the decree has been supported at the bar of this House, it is of the utmost importance to consider the defence set up by the answer. That defence consisted simply in stating that the deed had been obtained by misrepresentation and fraud; not of advantage taken of the distressed circumstances of the defendant, the father, or of his want of legal assistance in stipulating terms for his own advantage, but by a fraudulent misrepresentation of the purport and object of the deed; the defendant Robert deliberately swearing in both his answers that he never intended to give up his expectancy of succeeding as heir to the lunatic, or in any manner to agree to settle his estate, but that the extent of his intention was to charge the expenses of prosecuting the commission upon the estate; and that he was told and believed that such was the only object and purport of it. That this defence is false in every part is proved beyond the possibility of doubt; the judgment assumes that it is so; the instructions for the deed of December 1827, if known to Robert the father, disprove it; and four witnesses, O'Connor, Nolan, Waller O'Grady, and Richard O'Grady, prove that the deed was read over to and a copy read by Robert the father before he executed it; and Richard Adams proves subsequent [134] recognitions of it by him. Lord Guillamore, the late Chief Baron of Ireland, though not actually present at the execution of the deed, was frequently in the room when the parties were met for the purpose, and was made the depository of the deed by Robert the father. If any such fraud as that sworn to in the answers was contemplated, Lord Guillamore and his two sons must have been parties to it, or, what is scarcely more credible, the real author of it must have chosen to practise it in their presence.

It is unnecessary, however, to observe further upon this defence, as it forms no part of the judgment appealed from, and was not relied upon at the bar by the counsel for the appellant. But in considering the ground upon which the judgment was founded, and those upon which the right of the son to the relief he prays was denied at the bar, it must not be forgotten that the defendant pleaded this defence, and no other, and is therefore not at liberty to set up any other which depends upon matters of fact not put in issue, and which the plaintiff, therefore, has had no opportunity of disproving or explaining. Objections to the relief prayed, which rest upon the nature or provisions of the deed itself, or upon facts common to both parties, are not open to this observation; but, assuming that the father was perfectly acquainted with the contents of the deed before he executed it, to permit him to impeach it upon matters of fact not put in issue by him would be contrary to the established rules of courts of equity, and inconsistent with the most obvious principles of justice.

Some of the grounds relied upon on behalf of the defendant are of a middle character, arising out of facts [135] put in issue, it is true, but for a totally different purpose, such as the instructions and drafts of the deed proved by Mr. O'Connor. This the plaintiff put in issue to disprove the defendant's statement, that he conceived the deed to be only a security for the expenses of the commission; but the circumstances under which those instructions were given and those drafts prepared were not put in issue, the transaction not being impeached upon any statement connected with that transaction. No opportunity, therefore, was afforded to the plaintiff to explain what may now seem to require explanation, or to prove additional facts where the information may appear defective. I should, therefore, have thought that any suspicions, arising from so much of the transaction as was so proved in the cause, ought not to have led to any conclusion influencing the decision of the case; but seeing that many such circumstances have been much relied upon, it may be expedient to examine how far such suspicions appear to be well founded.

It was contended that the son had taken an improper advantage of the distressed situation of the father, occasioned by the withholding his annuity. I do not find any proof of this, but, on the contrary, it appears that there was no complaint made and no ground of complaint upon that subject. The father was, indeed, in circumstances which precluded him from incurring expenses or pecuniary liabilities; but that can only be referred to his own misfortunes or extravagance: and it is to be observed that this part of the defendant's case is inconsistent with another much relied upon, namely, that the undertaking by the son to prosecute the commission was no burden upon him, and, therefore, no consideration for the deed, because the property of the [136] lunatic was ample to provide for the costs. But if that were so, how could the distressed situation of the father prevent him from himself prosecuting those proceedings, and where was the inability to do so, which is alleged to have been used by the son as a means of depriving the father of that to which he was entitled?

Another objection taken to the transaction was, that the father had no professional advice, Mr. O'Connor being exclusively the solicitor of the son. I think it is proved that Mr. O'Connor acted as solicitor for the father as well as for the son, and that he was the person whom the father was so far in the habit of consulting as to make him the most natural person for him to employ upon the matter of the lunacy. The evidence of James Blakeney, examined by the defendant, and the letters of the 3d of February 1828 and the 10th of April sufficiently prove this. It is true that he also acted as solicitor for the son, and was thereby placed in the difficult and responsible situation of acting for two clients in a matter to be settled between them; but the objection, if any, must be, that Mr. O'Connor betrayed the interest of his client the father in favour of his client the son, and not that the father had not professional assistance.

The ground upon which it was contended that the solicitor betrayed the interests of his client the father rests upon the written instructions and the drafts of the deed of 1827, which he produced for the purpose of proving the falsehood of the defence set up in the answer. The instructions were taken down at the meeting between the father and the son; they certainly are very short, but they embrace the whole of the arrangement as afterwards carried out; they provide [137] that the father should give up his expectancy in the Castleboy estate, except a life interest for himself, and that the son should prosecute the commission. This appears to have been the whole at that time settled. When the solicitor afterwards prepared the instructions for counsel, and when the counsel employed for each of the parties proceeded to prepare the draft of the deed, it naturally occurred to inquire whether the life estate of the father was to be dispunishable of waste, and whether he was to have a leasing power. The absence of provisions for these purposes in the deed is not insisted upon or alluded to as an objection in either of the answers; no explanation, therefore, could be expected on behalf of the plaintiff. That many opportunities occurred of discussing this and all other matters connected with the proposed arrangement, is proved by Mr. O'Connor, and by Mr. Waller O'Grady, in whose father's (Lord Guillamore's) house the father was residing; and that additional details were arranged after the written instructions taken by Mr. O'Connor, is proved by the fact, that by deed the Castleboy estates were to be settled to the same uses as the Roxburgh estate, in which the son had only a life estate, whereas the instructions would have given to him the fee; an alteration which the son would not have consented to if it had not been stipulated for by or on behalf of the father. What passed upon this subject, or relative to the leasing power of the life estate not being dispunishable for waste, is not stated, no explanation being called for by the defence set up; but as the defendant does not complain of the deed because it does not contain such provisions, why is fraud and imposition to be assumed on behalf of a party who with a deed before [138] him, as stated in the bill, does not suggest any such fraud or imposition, and against a party who has thus been deprived of an opportunity of explaining the circumstances which led to the omission of them? Incidentally, however, and by accident, it is proved that the father expressed a desire that the Roxburgh and Castleboy estates should be re-united in his family, which tends to explain the absence of a leasing power for any terms which could be turned to profit by the tenant for life; and that, upon being consulted whether he wished to have a power of making any provision out of the estate for any of his younger children, he answered, that he did not, which explains the absence of a power to cut timber, as it may be assumed that he would have exercised such a power for that purpose. It appears to me, therefore, that there were not sufficient grounds for the suspicion of unfair dealing which have been relied upon, and that regard being had to the matters put in issue by the pleadings such suspicion ought not to have influenced the decision of the cause.

It was, however, open to the parties to rely upon objections appearing upon the face of the instrument, upon which relief was prayed. These objections, though divided into many heads in the argument, may be reduced to four: first, that the contract was illegal, as partaking of champerty and maintenance; secondly, that it was illegal against public policy, and a fraud upon the great seal in the matter of the lunacy; thirdly, that there was no mutuality in its provisions; fourthly, that the covenant was voluntary, being without any, or at least without any adequate, consideration.

As to the first the answer is obvious; there was no suit to be maintained, and no property in litigation to [139] be divided. Upon the second objection no case was cited, and I have not been able to understand how an arrangement between parties expecting property upon the decease of a lunatic can be a fraud upon the great seal in the matter of the lunacy, or upon the ground void as against public policy. The thing to be looked to in matters of lunacy is the protection of the person and property of the lunatic, and for that purpose the encouragement to parties to interfere, and to bring the facts before the Court. It is obvious that this object would in many cases be impeded, rather than promoted, by holding that all agreements relative to the costs of the proceedings or the ultimate division of the property were void. I have not heard any principle or authority in support of this objection. Agreements as to expectancies have been enforced in equity, which appeared to be open to serious objections, which do not apply to the present case.

In support of the third objection, that there was no mutuality in the contract, some well-known cases were cited; but the question here is, whether, after the risk incurred, and the benefit secured, and the consideration thereby paid, the father can on his part resist the performance of the contract which led to those results? If this objection could prevail in this case, how could decrees for specific performance where the defendant only signed the agreement, or upon part performance, be maintained? In those cases there is no mutuality in the sense in which the word is used in the present argument, because the contract, being within the statute of frauds, could not have been originally enforced against the plaintiff; but he having performed his part is entitled to compel the defendant to perform his.

[140] Fourthly, the supposition that the covenant was merely voluntary is negatived by the plaintiff's own statement of the case, for beyond all question some consideration proceeded from the son. The object of having a commission of lunacy prosecuted, the father's inability to undertake it, from whatever cause proceeding, and the fact of the son's having taken upon himself the prosecution of it, are facts common to both parties, and show that the covenant was not merely voluntary; leaving the question to be considered how far it can be objected to upon the ground of the consideration being inadequate. The situation of the parties and the properties in question appear to me to afford a complete answer to this objection. The son was in possession of the family estate but as tenant for life only; from the relative ages of the father and of the son, and of the supposed lunatic, the probability was much in favour of the son, by the death of his father before the lunatic, succeeding as heir to whatever estate might descend from him; but there was a strong expectation, and, as the event proved, a great probability, that without active measures to counteract the fraudulent projects of others no part of the lunatic's estate would descend to either of them. It may well be supposed to have been an object of the father, who is proved to have been anxious for the re-union of the two estates, that the lunatic's estate should be settled in the same manner as the family estates. The agreement with the son effected all that could be done to secure the lunatic's estate to the family, and, if it should descend to the father, secured its re-union with the family property. By what scale of money consideration are these objects to be estimated? The impossibility of doing so has led to the exemption [141] of family arrangements from rules which affect others. The consideration in this and in other such cases is compounded partly of value and partly of love and affection. The ages of the parties made the father's expectancy of but little value, but if he had been certain of himself succeeding as heir to the lunatic, his own personal use of the estate would probably have been confined to a life interest. This, in ordinary cases, would have been the natural course, and not likely to be departed from, where the father had expressed his anxious wish that the two estates should be held together.

But there were several younger children unprovided for, and it is assumed that the father must have desired the dominion over the estate for the purpose of making some further provision for them. Experience does not prove that the want of the younger children generally induces fathers to deprive the eldest son of much of the inheritance, but in this case it is proved, that upon being distinctly asked the question he answered that he did not wish to have any power over the estate for that purpose. If this be true (and it is sworn to by two witnesses) the absence from the covenant of any power to make leases and to cut timber is very much explained. There is no allegation or proof that it was part of the agreement that the father should have such powers. The omission of those forms no part of the father's case; but, if the contract be otherwise binding, is the absence of such powers in an arrangement between a father and son such cogent proof of imposition as to invalidate it? The arrangement of 1830 is open to the same objection; and I cannot but consider the parties interested under the settlement as the real de-[142]-fendants in this case. The father appears to have but little, if any, interest in the contest. That arrangement of 1830 took place with sufficient notice of the previous arrangement with the eldest son, and, therefore, cannot prevail against it, if such prior arrangement was in itself binding.

Being of opinion that the objections stated to this arrangement are not available for the purpose of depriving the plaintiff of the benefit of it, I am of opinion that he is entitled to have it completed by a decree, and as the timber has been cut with full knowledge of the plaintiff's title and in defiance of the father's covenant, I think it impossible to deny to the plaintiff the account he prays upon the subject. I think also that the decree below ought to have been made with costs. There can be no costs of the appeal.

Lord Wynford.—My Lords, in wading through these very long pleadings, I certainly should have thought there are many important questions which were submitted to your Lordships' consideration, but it can make no difference in the conclusion to which I shall come, because I am decidedly of opinion, upon a view of the whole case, that the judgment which my noble and learned friend has advised your Lordships to give upon this occasion is the correct judgment.

My Lords, there certainly are many points in this case, which were touched upon by the counsel at the bar, which are not raised by the pleadings. I think your Lordships cannot with propriety take any notice of those, as nothing can be more dangerous in the administration of justice than to allow your decisions to be affected by matters which are not pleaded. If the at-[143]-tention of the opposite party had been called to such points he might have given a denial, or a satisfactory explanation of such matters, which, by the course of pleading, he has been prevented from doing. The Court would, therefore, if it decided on those matters, be deciding on matters which it has been prevented from fully and satisfactorily hearing.

The points which are not adverted to in the pleadings are, first, that the respondent was not told that it was not necessary that he should take out a commission of lunacy, as it was competent to any other person to take it out; secondly, that he was not told that if he succeeded he would be paid out of the estate costs taxed as between attorney and client, that is, the whole of his expenses; thirdly, that the consideration was not sufficient to support the conveyance.

It might be observed, that the only consideration that was at first introduced was that of natural love and affection, and it was not until after it was discovered that the consideration did not prevent a subsequent conveyance from getting rid of it that any other consideration was introduced. But this is an objection that should not be made unless it be specifically pointed out by the pleadings. Now, the sufficiency of consideration depends on many circumstances, which may be proved by evidence, if the attention of the opposite party had been called to them. The deed of 1830, by which this conveyance is attempted to be set aside, is liable to great suspicion; it seems to be only colourable; the price is only eight years' purchase, and that is not to be paid till after the purchaser has got possession.

The fourth objection is, that the conveyance was obtained by maintenance and champerty; the fifth, [144] that the life estate was made unimpeachable of waste, and that no power of leasing was given to the tenant for life.

The two questions, as it has occurred to me, on the determination of which your Lordships' judgment should depend, are: first, was the respondent deceived by being prevailed upon to execute a deed which conveyed Parsons Persse's estate absolutely to the appellant, which deed he was made to believe was only a security upon the estate for the expenses that the appellant was likely to incur by taking out and prosecuting the commission of lunacy against Parsons Persse? In support of this objection the respondent urges that the deed was prepared by the appellant's attorney, a person whom he had never employed, and that it was executed in Lord Guillamore's house, who was the appellant's father-in-law, in which the respondent, who had never visited Lord Guillamore before, had resided for a fortnight surrounded by his family. It is not true that the respondent had never employed the attorney before; he had employed him many years ago when respondent was a bankrupt, and he had since been employed by the respondent's man of business; and the respondent must have known that, for he must have paid the attorney's bills for the business that was then done. On this occasion the attorney was employed by the appellant, who sent the attorney to the respondent to prevail on him to sue out a commission against Parsons Persse. He persuaded the respondent to visit the appellant, and the appellant succeeded in getting him to go to Dublin, to give instructions for the commission of lunacy and for this deed. As the respondent had never before partaken of the hospitalities of Lord Guillamore, it would have [145] been more delicate in the appellant not to have taken the respondent to his Lordship's house on this occasion. But are these circumstances to disturb a solemn deed? Yet these are all which the respondent can bring forward. On the other hand, there are many witnesses of great respectability who prove that the respondent himself gave instructions for the deed; that it was read over to him at the time of its execution; that he expressed his intention to execute such a deed before it was executed, and declared that he should do this to unite the two estates in the same person; and that after the deed was executed he told another gentleman that he had executed such a deed, and declared that he had done it with the same object as that which he had mentioned to the gentleman to whom he had said that he would make such a disposition. Whatever circumstances of suspicion may hang about it, one can scarcely conceive a stronger case. O'Connor has sworn that he took the instructions for the deed from the respondent's own mouth; those instructions, although departed from in some respects, were to prepare a conveyance of the estate to the appellant for his own use, and were not authorizing him to prepare a security for the expenses to be incurred. O'Connor, the two O'Gradys, and Nolan, that is four witnesses, swear that the deed was distinctly read over to the respondent before it was executed by him. This is confirmed by Adams and Lambert, one of whom swears that the respondent spoke to him, before the deed was executed, of his intention to unite the two estates, and the other swears that some time after the deed was executed the respondent told him that he had executed a deed by which he had provided for the union of these estates.

[146] The second question that, it appears to me, is raised by the pleadings, as I have already stated, is perfectly immaterial with respect to the judgment on the case. Did he execute the deed under the pressure of distress which the appellant had occasioned by the nonpayment of the annuity payable to him by the appellant out of the Roxburgh estate? Considering the amount of that annuity compared with the rental of the estate out of which it was to be paid, and that the respondent had only this annuity to subsist upon, I cannot find any sufficient excuse upon the evidence for the irregularity with which it was paid. But this defence is inconsistent with the case before made by the respondent; he was not likely to be induced by distress to execute a deed which was to provide for the security of money to be expended for a purpose beneficial, although not in an equal degree, to both parties. A man under the pressure of distress may execute deeds to obtain the means of supplying his present wants, but not to provide for any remote advantage. The hope of advantage here was very remote; indeed, as Parsons Persse had by will given his estate from this branch of the family, and as it was so difficult to get him found a lunatic that one jury summoned to try that question had been discharged without finding a verdict, I do not think that there was any great probability that it ever would have been realized. I cannot think that your Lordships can say that this deed was executed under the influence of distress. Whether the execution of that deed were a wise act on the part of the respondent or not, I think it was executed by him with a full knowledge of what he was doing, and for the attainment of the object that he stated to Lambert and Adams he had in his contem-[147]-plation when he executed it; and I cannot conceive that the straitness of his circumstances could have contributed to influence him to make that conveyance. I am, therefore, of opinion that the appeal should be allowed, the decree of the Court below set aside, and the directions proposed by my noble friend to your Lordships to be given should be given.

It is ordered, that the said decree of the 7th of February 1837 be reversed; and it is declared, that the plaintiffs are entitled to the benefit of the indenture of the 8th of December 1827, mentioned in the said original bill, and of the covenants and agreements therein contained; and that the indenture of the 9th of June 1830, also mentioned in the said original bill, is to be considered as fraudulent and void so far as it affects or interferes therewith.

[S.C. 7 Cl. and F. 744, q.v.]

"Privy tithes" synonymous with "small tithes," though the Ecclesiastical Survey makes a distinction between "privy tithes" and "lesser tithes," that distinction being explained by a subsequent terrier, distinguishing between tithes in general and privy tithes payable to the vicar; and there being evidence that in the district wherein the vicarage is situate privy tithes mean small tithes.

The endowment of a vicarage being established by ancient documents, and money payments having been made for privy tithes to the vicar since 1763 by some of the occupiers of the parish, and small tithes not having been claimed by or paid to the rector;—Held, as against a defence of the occupiers claiming in themselves or their [149] landlords title to the small tithes, that the vicar was entitled to small tithes of all lands in the parish, in respect of which no discharge had been proved; though some portion of the small tithes had been conveyed away by the owners of the rectory, that conveyance being capable of explanation by being referred to the glebe lands belonging to the rectory; and though some payments had been made for houses only, and in some instances payments had been omitted altogether.

On the 31st July 1833 the respondent, as vicar of Tenbury, filed his bill in the Exchequer against the first-named appellants and John Bradley (since deceased), who were occupiers of lands within the town of Berrington and parish of Tenbury, claiming to be entitled to all tithes except tithes of corn and grain within the township of Berrington and parish of Tenbury.

The parish of Tenbury consisted of the hamlet or township of Tenbury, Tenbury Foreign, Berrington, and Sutton otherwise Sutton Sturmeay.

The appellants by their answers denied the vicar's title to the tithes claimed by him, and stated that the rectory of Tenbury was formerly part of the possessions of the abbot and convent of Lyra in Normandy: that upon the suppression of the alien priories in the reign of king Henry the fifth it was granted by the Crown to and became part of the possessions of the priory and convent of Shene in the county of Surrey, and that upon the dissolution of monasteries it became vested in the Crown: that in the thirty-fifth year of the reign of king Henry the eighth the rectory of Tenbury, with the tithes and appurtenances thereto belonging, were, with divers other lands and hereditaments, granted by the Crown to Richard Andrews and Nicholas Temple, and the heirs and assigns of the said Richard Andrews for ever, at the yearly rent of 16s.: that soon after the [150] appropriation of the rectory to the abbot and convent of Lyra a vicar of Tenbury was appointed, and a vicarage created and endowed with the great and small tithes of the hamlet or township of Sutton otherwise

Sutton Sturmeay, or some part thereof, except a certain part of the said last-mentioned township called Sutton Park, but that the said vicarage was not endowed with any of the tithes, either great or small, within the hamlets and townships of Tenbury Town, Tenbury Foreign, and Berrington, but that they remained appropriated to the abbot and convent of Lyra as the rector of the said rectory of Tenbury; and that upon the suppression of the alien priories the said rectory, and the tithes and appurtenances thereto belonging, including all and singular the tithes, great and small, of the said three several townships or hamlets of Tenbury Town, Tenbury Foreign, and Berrington, were granted to and became vested in the said abbot and convent of Shene, and continued to be and were parcel of the possessions of the said last-mentioned monastery until and at the time of the dissolution thereof; and that upon the dissolution of the said monastery of Shene the possessions thereof, including the said rectory of Tenbury and all and singular the tithes of the said townships or hamlets of Tenbury Town, Tenbury Foreign, and Berrington, were granted by the Crown to the said Richard Andrews and Nicholas Temple, and the heirs of Richard Andrews: that Richard Andrews sold the rectory of Tenbury, and the tithes thereof, including all the tithes of Tenbury Town, Tenbury Foreign, and Berrington, unto certain persons, who were the owners of the lands comprised in the last-mentioned townships: that after such sale the owners of the lands in the several townships and their descendants, and purchasers from them, [151] and their tenants, held and occupied their farms and lands freed from the payment of all or any tithes whatsoever.

All the appellants, except Clee, George, and Blacklock, admitted that small annual payments under the name of privy tithes had been made by the occupiers of their farms to the vicar of Tenbury, and those payments had been made by the occupiers of houses as well as lands; but that such payments were in the nature of personal tithes, oblations, or obventions, and not as moduses or compositions for tithes.

On behalf of the respondent the following documentary evidence was produced:—

An extract from pope Nicholas's Taxation, whereby it appeared that the tenth of the church was taxed at two marks, and the tenth of the vicarage at one mark:

The following extract from the Ecclesiastical Survey:—

"Magister R. Shute vicarius perpetuus ejusdem ecclesiæ habet in decimis prædialibus, viz., garbarum et feni et unius molendini vicariæ suæ prædicti com̃ annis pertinentibus . . . . .	10	8	8

An extract from the Parliamentary Survey, in which the value of the tithes of the vicarage of Tenbury was stated to be worth £27 per annum:

Two terriers from the bishop's court, of the diocese of Hereford; one, after describing the vicarage house and premises, states "that the vicar hath no common or pasture for sheep, but hath some tithe hay in the common fields, but not of all the parish, and the tithe of corn of the parish of Sutton." The other is in the following words:—

"Teamburie, } A true terrier of the vicarage of Teamburie taken by us, July 25, 1637. } whose names are underwritten:

"Imprim., one vicarage howse; 2ndly, one barne; 3rdly, one hemplock; 4thly, 2 gardens; 5thly, one portion of tyth from Sutton; 6thly, prive tythes from the rest of the parish.

"signed EDM. CLERK, vicar.
+ JOHN UNKLES } churchwardens.
HUMPHREY LANE }

FRAN. LANE."

The grant of the Crown of the rectory of Tenbury to Andrews and Temple, which only contained the general words of "all tithes" to the rectory belonging.

And receipts for payment of small sums, as for privy tithes, from 1763 down to the present time.

The parol evidence produced on the part of the respondent proved, that annual payments under the name of privy tithes had been made to the vicar by several occupiers of lands in the three townships of [153] Tenbury, Tenbury Foreign, and Berrington; that easter dues were different payments from privy tithes, and were paid at different times of the year; that small tithes in several parishes in the neighbourhood of Tenbury were known under the name of privy tithes; that the small tithes of the three townships had never been paid to the owner of the great tithes of the parish of Tenbury.

On behalf of the appellants the documentary evidence produced was:—

An extract from the Nonae Roll, stating "that the church of Temedbury is taxed at £20, whereof the ninth of sheaves, fleeces, and lambs is worth ten marks; that the land of which the church is endowed is worth by the year 40s.; the hay of the same is worth 6 marks; the tithe of mills is worth 38s.; oblations, obventions, and small tithes with mortuaries, are worth 6 marks; and it hath peculiar jurisdiction, with power of correction, which is worth by the year 7 marks:"

An extract from Inquisitions of Benefices of Alien Priors, from the Tower, wherein it is stated that the proctor of the abbot and convent of Lyra hath the church of Temdebury, which is worth by the year 20 marks:

An extract from the charter (in the Tower), of the third and fourth Henry the fifth, of the foundation and endowment of the monks of Sheen, whereby the possessions belonging to the alien abbey of Lyra in Normandy, together with all lands, tithes, etc. are granted to the prior and monks of Sheen:

The Ecclesiastical Survey:

The grant to Andrews and Temple:

An inquisition post mortem (12th September 1601) of Joyce Lucy (from the Rolls), which found that Sir Thomas Lucy, son of Sir Thomas Lucy and Joyce his [154] wife, daughter and heir of Thomas Acton, was seised in fee as heir to his mother of the rectory of Tenbury:

An inquisition post mortem (15th July 1606) of Sir Thomas Lucy, the son, which found that he was seised at his death of the rectory of Tenbury, and that he left Sir Thomas Lucy, his son and heir:

A licence of the 2d April, nineteenth James the first, for Sir Thomas Lucy and Alice his wife to alien to Richard Milward, Rowland Corbett, and Richard Hayle, and their heirs, three messuages, two cottages, five gardens, five orchards, seventy acres of land, ten acres of meadow, and forty acres of pasture, and all and all manner of tithes in the tenements aforesaid, with the appurtenances in Tenbury:

A fine of easter term, nineteenth James the first, from Sir Thomas Lucy and Alice his wife, of the same premises and to the same persons as are mentioned in the licence:

A conveyance of the 13th of April, nineteenth James the first, whereby Sir Thomas Lucy conveyed to Milward, Corbett, and Hayle, and their heirs, a certain mansion called the parsonage in Tenbury, together with all the glebe lands, and one other messuage, and sixteen acres of arable land, and three other cottages, and two gardens in Tenbury, and all manner of tithes, corn, grain, sheep, wool, lamb, flax, hemp, and all other tithes whatsoever, and about fifty-six acres of other lands in Tenbury (without tithes being mentioned):

A feoffment of 19th May, nineteenth James the first, from Milward, Corbett, and Hayle to Lane of twelve acres of land in Tenbury parish, and also all manner of tithes of corn, grain, and sheep, wool, lambs, flax, hemp, and all other tithes, great and small:

A feoffment of the same date and by the same persons, to John and William Warde, of four acres in [155] Tenbury, with all manner of tithes upon the premises renewing, without specifying particular tithes:

Various other deeds were produced, whereby the lands and tithes mentioned in the two deeds of feoffment were proved to be vested in the master and fellows of Pembroke College, Oxford:

An extract from the Parliamentary Survey (in Lambeth Palace), 1649, which states that in Tenbury there is a vicarage, and to the same, belonging a house and garden worth £3 per annum, and other tithes to the value of £27 per annum:

A fine, of the twenty-eighth of Charles the second, by Richard Lucy and Elizabeth his wife, and William Molyneux and Bridget his wife, to Richard Leigh and Robert Bradshaigh, and the heirs of Richard, of certain lands in Tenbury and other places, and also of the tithes of the parishes of Tenbury and Berrington:

A fine, of the second of Anne, by Viscount Molyneux and Bridget his wife, to Sir William Gerrard, of the rectory of Tenbury with the tithes of sheaves, grain, and hay:

A recovery, of the ninth of Anne, wherein Robert Webber is demandant, and Sir William Molyneux, and Viscount Molyneux and Bridget his wife, and others are vouches of the advowson of Tenbury and the tithes of sheaves, grain, and hay.

The parol evidence on the part of the appellants was, that no tithes in kind or composition in lieu of tithes had ever been rendered to the vicar, but that small payments had been made by some but not all the occupiers of farms and lands in the townships of Tenbury Foreign, Tenbury Town, and Berrington, under the name of privy tithes, except two payments; one, on the 29th September 1784, for 3s. per annum, viz., 1s. 6d. [156] for Eaton's and 1s. 6d. for the tan-house, as a modus for small tithes to the vicar; another, on the 28th July 1796, of 1s., being in full of a modus for privy tithe of Wight's meadow; that the payments had been made for houses as well as lands, and that the payments had been uniform with regard to Berrington farm. Francis Clee, however, had paid a yearly sum of one guinea in lieu of the crops of some ridges and parcels of land containing three quarters of an acre, part of his farm at Berrington, and this payment had varied in amount.

The first-mentioned cause came on to be heard before Mr. Baron Alderson on the 28th day of June 1836, when it was, amongst other things, ordered and decreed, that an account of the titheable matters and things (other than and except corn, grain, and hay) had and taken by the appellants respectively from and upon their said respective farms and lands since Michaelmas 1827, and of the tithes thereof, be taken with the usual directions; and that the costs of the suit, so far as related to the tithes of which an account was directed, should be paid by the defendants to the plaintiff.

From so much of the decree as is herein mentioned the first-mentioned appeal is brought.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Maule for the appellants.

Mr. Boteler and Mr. Simpkinson for the Respondent.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, in this case it appears to me particularly important to attend to the defences set up in the answers of the appellants. They all claim title in themselves, or in those under whom they hold their land, to the tithes demanded by the [157] vicar, and they all, except Clee, George, and Blacklock, admit payment of small annual sums to the vicar under the name of privy tithes. Against such defences it is certainly necessary for the vicar to show his title to the tithes claimed; but if he succeed in so doing it is not competent for the defendants, upon such defences as they have adopted, to set up moduses or compositions. The defendants have totally failed in showing any title to those tithes in themselves, or in those whose lands they hold. There seems to be some reason for supposing that some of the lands held by Roberts, Powles, George, Davis, and Price were formerly part of the rectory, but they have not proved that the small tithes in question were granted with the lands, or have since been conveyed with them. It is indeed stated in the appellants case, at page 4, that one of the houses in Tenbury Town, comprised in one of the deeds proved in the cause, was traced to the defendant Davis, but I do not find any evidence that any of the lands occupied by any of the defendants had been conveyed with the tithes in question. All the defendants, therefore, have failed in this their principal defence, namely, title in themselves to the tithes in dispute; but it is still open to them to insist that the vicar has failed in proving any title in himself. No endowment being produced, the vicar is at liberty to establish his title by other evidence. That there was a vicarage endowed before the year 1291 appears from Pope Nicholas's Taxation; the tenth of the church was taxed at two marks, and the tenth of the vicarage at one mark. The Ecclesiastical Survey is not very intelligible by itself, but it becomes more so when it is considered that the vicar appears to have all the tithes of a district called Sutton. When, therefore, the Eccle-[158]-siastical Survey speaks in one place of tithes of sheaves and hay, and in another of lesser tithes, to wit, pigs, geese, et caetera, it may be referring altogether to Sutton; otherwise it might be inferred that the privy tithes spoken of were something different from the lesser tithes. This establishes the fact that the vicar at that time was entitled to some endowment under the name of privy tithes.

The Parliamentary Survey and the first terrier afford no information, but the second terrier is very important. It states that the vicarage has one portion of tithes from Sutton, and privy tithes from the rest of the parish. The fact that the vicarage was endowed with some description of tithes from the parish generally is, I think, by these documents sufficiently established.

Of the payment of small sums as for privy tithes there is no dispute; the receipts go back as early as 1763, and in 1784 the payment is described as a modus for the small tithes. The same occurs in 1796, but in general the term "privy tithes" is used.

As these small tithes must originally have formed a part of the rectory, and as the question is, whether they were at an early period separated from the rectory as an endowment of the vicarage, it is material to ascertain whether they have been treated as still belonging to the rectory. The earlier documents, such as the grant to Andrews and Temple, in the thirty-fifth of Henry the eighth, prove nothing, as general terms only are used, such as "all tithes to the rectory belonging;" but in subsequent conveyances, such as the fines in the twenty-sixth of Charles the second and the second of Anne, and the recovery in the eleventh of Anne, there is a description of the advowson of the church [159] of Tenbury, and all and all manner of tithes of sheaves, grain, and hay; and there is no evidence that any small tithes from any of those lands were ever claimed by the persons entitled to the rectory.

It is true that conveyances were produced from Millward, Corbett, and Hayle, who claimed under Andrews and Temple particular lands, with all tithes, as well great as small, arising and renewing within the premises, but from the preceding conveyance of the 13th of April in the nineteenth of James, there is good reason for believing that those lands were parcel of the glebe of the rectory, which may well be supposed to have been excepted from the endowment of the vicarage, and these form no part of the lands of the defendants.

These ancient documents, taken by themselves, would constitute strong evidence of the vicarage being endowed with the small tithes generally, by proving that the vicar was entitled to some tithes called privy tithes, and that the small tithes had not, except in some few instances, (not in question in this cause), been conveyed with the rectorial tithes, and the parol testimony strongly confirms these deductions from the documentary evidence; as it proves the payment of those sums called privy tithes, and that they are different from easter offerings, and the small tithes have never been paid to the owners of the great tithes.

As to the meaning of the term "privy tithes" many authorities and instances were produced to show that the term was often used as synonymous with small tithes, proving, I think, satisfactorily that they cannot be understood to mean personal tithes, which is the meaning contended for by the appellant, and there is parol [160] evidence that the term is understood in the district in which these lands are situated to mean small tithes. It is true, that as to some of the defendants there is no evidence of any payment of privy tithes having been made, but the question is, whether there be sufficient secondary evidence of the vicarage having been endowed with the small tithes, because if there be sufficient evidence of such endowment the vicar's right will be established as against all lands, (as to which no particular discharge is proved, although no small tithes have ever been paid for such lands.) The cases of Kennicott v. Watson in 2 Eagle and Younge, 690, and Masters v. Fletcher, in Younge, 25, established this proposition. Upon the whole, therefore, I think the decree of the Court of Exchequer right, and that it should be affirmed with costs.

Decree affirmed, with costs.

(SECOND APPEAL.)

On the 28th June 1836 Mr. Baron Alderson made the same decree for the payment of tithes against the appellants in this appeal as he had made against the appellants in the first appeal. From this decree this appeal was brought.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Godson for the Appellants.

Mr. Boteler and Mr. Bethell for the Respondent.

Lord Chancellor (4th August).—I think the right course will be, that as to some of the parties, namely, those who have not proved the possession of lands which formed part of [161] the premises comprised in the conveyances,* on which so much stress has been laid, the decree must be affirmed with costs. With regard to two of the defendants, Cooke and Barnes, of course the bill must be dismissed; and I think that the bill must be dismissed with costs, because there never was a ground for attacking those parties, and they set up a case sufficiently in their answer † to entitle them to go into that defence. Then with regard to the costs of the appeal, I am of opinion that those parties who have succeeded in altering the decree, though it does not appear that they called the attention of the Court below to these distinctions, must be exempted from the order for the payment of the costs of the appeal.

With respect to those who hold glebe lands the decree must be altered, by exempting those lands which they prove to have been conveyed with great and small tithes; they must be exempted from the order which directs only the appellants who have no case to pay the costs of the appeal. Those who succeeded altogether in the withdrawing their lands from the operation of the decree, and the others who succeeded in withdrawing part of their lands from the operation of the decree, ought not, so far as those lands are concerned, to pay the costs of the appeal. The other appellants, who have established no distinction as to their lands, must pay the costs of the appeal; and those appellants who have shown [162] that none of their lands are liable to tithe must have the costs of the suit below.

It is ordered, that the decree of the 28th of June 1836 as to the said Joseph Cooke and Thomas Barnes be reversed, and that the bill as to them be dismissed, with costs: That the said decree as to John Russell, Charles Smith, and John Benbow be in part reversed as herein-after mentioned, and that the bill as to them be in part dismissed, with costs, as herein-after mentioned; that is to say, as to the said John Russell, so far as the said bill and decree relate to four acres, twenty-seven perches of land, mentioned in the answer of the appellants; and as to the said Charles Smith, so far as such bill and decree relate to a close containing one acre and three quarters, mentioned in the same answer; and as to the said John Benbow, so far as such bill and decree relate to a dwelling house and building and eleven acres of land in the same answer mentioned. And it is ordered, as to the three last-named appellants, in respect of other houses and lands in their respective occupation, that the decree be affirmed; and as to the rest of the appellants, other than the said five appellants, it is ordered that the appeal be dismissed, and the said decree affirmed, with costs.

(THIRD APPEAL.)

On the 28th June 1836 Mr. Baron Alderson made the same decree against the appellants in this appeal as he had made against the appellants in the two former appeals; from this decree the appeal was brought.

Mr. Swanston and Mr. Godson for the appellants.

Mr. Boteler and Mr. Bethell for the respondent.

[163] Lord Chancellor (4th August).—This must follow the fate of Clee and Hall; the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

---

* The particular lands comprised in these conveyances were proved in the cause to be vested in the master and fellows of Pembroke College, Oxford, and to be occupied by defendants Thomas Barnes and John Benbow as their tenants.

† The defendants Thomas Barnes and John Benbow by their answer insisted that the lands occupied by them were purchased by their ancestors, or by persons under whom they derived title, together with the tithes arising thereon.

Appeal dismissed, with costs; and the said decree, so far as therein complained of, affirmed, with costs, to be paid by the appellants to the respondent

A party complaining of a decree which had directed inquiries for the purpose of obtaining further information, nine years and a half after the decree made, ought to have a strong case to induce a court to set it aside; more especially when the party complaining has exhausted the subject matter of the inquiry, and failed. Where debts due to a former partnership are agreed, upon the formation of a new partnership between a partner of the old and a new partner of the new partnership, to be transferred to the new firm as part of the capital of the new partnership, against the debts due from the old partnership, the monies received by the new partnership must, in the absence of appropriation by the customers or agreement between the parties, be applied in payment of the earlier debts of the old partnership. Declarations and admissions made by plaintiff not stated in the pleadings inadmissible in evidence.

[165] In and prior to the year 1806 Richard Toulmin deceased and Abraham Toulmin, who is now also deceased, carried on the business of navy agents in co-partnership together in Surrey Street in the Strand. In the year 1806 that partnership was dissolved. On the 1st September 1806 Abraham Toulmin took the appellant John Copland as a partner into the business, and from that time until the death of Abraham Toulmin they carried on the business of navy agents in copartnership together under the style and firm of "Toulmin and Copland," upon the terms that Abraham Toulmin should bring into the new partnership of Toulmin and Copland £40,000 of good debts, due to the old partnership of Richard and Abraham Toulmin, for the purpose of setting against and providing for debts to that amount due from the old partnership; and that John Copland should bring £4000 into the partnership, and that Abraham Toulmin should have two thirds and John Copland the remaining third of the profits of the business, and on the 4th January 1819 Abraham Toulmin died, having by his will appointed the respondents Margaret Toulmin his widow, Thomas Butterfield Simpson, and Bryan Holme his executrix and executors, who proved his will.

On the 16th of January 1819 the respondents filed their bill of complaint in the Exchequer against the appellant, thereby claiming two thirds of the profits of the partnership of Toulmin and Copland, and praying the usual partnership accounts, and for an injunction and receiver.

The appellant by his answer stated that the terms of the partnership agreed upon between him and Abraham Toulmin were, that Abraham Toulmin should bring [166] into the partnership good debts due to the preceding partnership to the amount of £40,000 to set against debts due from such partnership, and that the appellant should bring in £4000, and that Abraham Toulmin should be entitled to two thirds, and the appellant to one third of the profits; but that if Abraham Toulmin failed in bringing in £40,000 good debts, that then the profits of the business should be divided in moieties; and that Abraham Toulmin having failed in bringing into the partnership the £40,000 good debts, the partnership, from the time of its commencement to the death of Abraham Toulmin, was carried on upon equal division of the profits; and he insisted that he was entitled to a moiety of the profits of the partnership.

Before the appellant put in his answer to the said bill, and on the 29th day of January 1819, he made an affidavit, filed in the cause, in support of a motion made by him in the cause, wherein he stated to the same effect as in his answer; viz., that the profits were to be divided in thirds if the £40,000 was brought into the partnership; and it goes on to state that, Toulmin having failed to bring in the £40,000, he and Toulmin afterwards agreed to divide the profits in moieties.

On the 12th June 1828 the cause came on to be heard before the Chief Baron, when, after witnesses had been examined on both sides, and extracts from the partnership books proved for the purpose of proving how the profits were divided, the Court referred it to the master to take the partnership accounts, and to inquire whether Abraham Toulmin, the testator, brought into the partnership of Toulmin and Copland £40,000 of good debts which were owing to the partnership of Abraham Toulmin and Richard Toulmin, according to [167] the true intent and meaning of a certain agreement stated in the said affidavit of the appellant, sworn in the cause on the 29th day of January 1819, upon the footing of which their partnership commenced; and also to inquire whether the said agreement was at any time after the commencement of such partnership varied and altered, and under what circumstances and in what respects; and if he should find that there was such agreement, and that it was not afterwards altered, then that the accounts should be taken on the footing of one third of the profits to the appellant, and the remaining two thirds to the respondents; but if he should find that there was a subsequent agreement, or the £40,000 good debts were not brought into the partnership, then that the accounts should be taken on the footing of the subsequent agreement, or, in the latter alternative, on the footing of their having been partners in equal moieties.

On the 26th May 1830 the master made a separate report, finding that Abraham Toulmin did not bring £40,000 good debts into the partnership; and upon exceptions taken to that report the Court, on the 21st December 1830, over-ruled the exceptions, and confirmed the report; but the House of Lords, on the 30th May 1834, reversed the order of the Court of Exchequer, thereby establishing that Abraham Toulmin had brought into the partnership £40,000 good debts; and thereupon the master made his separate report, on the 2d of July 1835, whereby he found, that the said Abraham Toulmin did bring into the said partnership of Toulmin and Copland the said sum of £40,000 of good debts, which were owing to the said late concern which was carried on in partnership with the said Abraham and Richard Toulmin. And the said master [168] also found, that the said agreement was varied and altered after the commencement of the said partnership, and that it was agreed between them, the said Abraham Toulmin and the appellant, that they should carry on and be interested in the said partnership in equal shares and proportions, and should receive and pay the profits and loss in equal moieties.

The respondents took exceptions to the said last-mentioned report; first, on the ground that he ought not to have found that the said agreement was afterwards varied or altered; and, second, that he ought to have found under what circumstances and in what respects the said agreement was varied and altered.

On the 27th day of February 1836 the Court allowed the said exceptions, and referred it back to the master to review his report, who, by his report dated the 3d November 1836, reviewed his report, and found that the agreement was not varied.

The master, by another separate report dated the 15th day of February 1836, after stating the evidence brought before him, found, that in taking the accounts between the said Abraham Toulmin deceased and the appellant, as directed by the said decree, all sums received by the firm of Toulmin and Copland from their customers and clients who had been debtors of the former firm of Richard and Abraham Toulmin, and to whom advances had been made by the said firm of Toulmin and Copland in the ordinary and necessary course of the business and practice of navy agents, should, in the first place, be applied towards the discharge of such advances and interest respectively, and that the surplus only should be applied towards the discharge of debts due from such customers and clients [169] respectively to the said firm of Richard Toulmin and Abraham Toulmin; but in consequence of such finding being objected to he had forborne to take the accounts of the partnership.

From the last report the respondent took, amongst others, the following exception: "For that in case the said master ought not, in and by his said report, to have found as submitted or insisted on by the said plaintiffs in their said first exception, then the said master, regard being had to the evidence laid before him, instead of his said finding, ought to have found, in and by his said report, that in taking the accounts between the said Abraham Toulmin deceased and the said defendant, as directed by the said decree, all sums received by the said firm of Toulmin and Copland from or on account of their customers and clients who had been debtors to the said firm of Richard and Abraham Toulmin, and whose debts had been transferred to their respective accounts in the said books of Toulmin and Copland, should, in the first place, be applied towards the discharge of the said debts owing to Richard and Abraham Toulmin, and of the interest thereon respectively, and that the surplus only, if any, should be applied towards the discharge of the advances and interest in the said report mentioned; and that the said firm of Toulmin and Copland, as between them and the said Abraham Toulmin, should be charged with the sums so firstly applied, and with interest thereon, from the times when the same were respectively received to the 4th day of January 1819, at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum, with annual rests."

[170] This exception came on to be heard before the Chief Baron on the 17th of December 1836.

From the original decree of the 12th June 1828 the appellants appealed.

Extracts from the partnership books were produced in evidence, but in the general business no division had been made of profit and loss, and the same uniform mode of keeping the accounts had been adopted, except in particular items, which showed that certain losses and expenses were borne between the parties in moieties; such as in the purchase and sale of stock, and in the purchase of wines; and the purchase of wine was included under an account of "house expenses." Declarations were proved to have been made by Abraham Toulmin, that, in all cases of advances made by the firm of Toulmin and Copland to clients of the late firm, such advances should be deducted from the first remittances or receipts, on account of the clients of the old firm.

It was likewise proved by the book-keeper of the partnership books, that in December 1814 the appellant had directed him to balance the partnership books, and carry one moiety of the profits to his account, and the other to the account of Abraham Toulmin; which Abraham Toulmin must have heard, and expressed no dissent to such direction. It was on the other hand proved, on the part of the respondent, that the appellant had stated to Robert Reynolds that he, the appellant, had only brought into the concern the sum of £4000, and that he was to receive one third of the profits.

The Chief Baron, by an order dated the 17th day of December 1836, allowed the exceptions, except where [171] it appeared on the face of the accounts in the books of the said firm of Toulmin and Copland, in the said master's said report mentioned and referred to, that deductions had been made from particular receipts, and the balances only carried to the credit of the account; and it was thereby referred back to the said master to review such separate report, and vary and amend the same accordingly.

From the order dated the 27th day of February 1836, the master's report dated the 3d of November 1836, and the said order dated the 17th day of December 1836, the appellant appealed, asserting that the two reports dated the 2d day of July 1835 and the 15th day of February 1836 ought to be confirmed.

Mr. K. Bruce and Mr. G. Richards for the appellants.

Mr. Simpson and Mr. Jacob for the respondents.

Lord Chancellor (1st June).—This case came before your Lordships upon two appeals: the first appeal was from certain orders of the Court of Exchequer made in a subsequent stage of the cause; the second appeal was an appeal complaining of the original decree. That order had been made in the month of June 1828. If your Lordships should be of opinion that the original decree was wrong, it will necessarily follow that any subsequent proceedings in the cause will fail with that.

I shall proceed in the first instance to consider the second appeal, and, secondly, the points that relate to the early stage of the cause. The decree of the 12th of June 1828 merely contains a reference to the master to [172] enquire whether one of the partners of the firm, Abraham Toulmin, brought into the partnership of Toulmin and Copland £40,000 of good debts due from a certain partnership, according to the true intent and meaning of an agreement stated in a certain affidavit of the appellant, and whether such agreement was at any time varied.

Under that decree the master made a report, of the 26th of May 1830, in which he negated the fact inquired into, namely, as to whether there had been this sum of £40,000 brought into the concern. That report, and the accuracy of that finding, were questioned by exceptions taken, which were heard in December 1830, and overruled. The result therefore of the decision in the Court of Exchequer upon that subject was to negative the proposition, that a sum of £40,000 of good debts had been brought into the concern of Toulmin and Copland. The order, however, of December 1830 became the subject of appeal to this House, and by an order of this House, of the 30th of May 1834, the decision of the Court of Exchequer was reversed, and the exceptions taken to the report were allowed. It, therefore, then became established, by an authority which can no longer be questioned anywhere, that Abraham Toulmin had brought into the concern £40,000 of good debts, and that he had, therefore, to that extent performed the contract which he had entered into with his partner Mr. Copland.

The parties went on, and in the month of July 1835 there was a report on the second part of the inquiry, by which the master found that the agreement had been varied. That also became matter of question before the Court of Exchequer, and by an order of the 27th of [173] February 1836 those exceptions to the master's report were allowed. The Court of Exchequer in that instance, therefore, established the fact that the original agreement had not been varied by any subsequent agreement between the parties.

Various other proceedings followed in the cause, till at last in the year 1837, (I am now confining my observations to the appeal against the original decree,) nine years and a half after the original decree was made, namely, the decree directing inquiries as to the fact, the appellant thought it expedient to appeal against the original decree, which is the appeal I am now considering, which was heard at your Lordships' bar. Now, my Lords, that decree contained merely inquiries. It may be undoubtedly true that a decree ought not to contain a mere inquiry, and that there was either no ground for the inquiry or that some other mode of inquiry ought to be adopted. If that were so it would require a very strong case, after all the objects of the inquiry have been exhausted, and when the decree adjudicates no right, establishes no fact, but merely is an act of the court, by which the court desires that further information may be obtained,—it would require a strong case to induce your Lordships to reverse a decree merely for the purpose of ascertaining a fact, in order to enable the Court with more certainty to adjudicate between the parties.

It appears that the answer which the defendant put in to Mr. Toulmin's bill stated the contract to have been, that if Toulmin brought in £40,000 of good debts, then that the partnership between them should be in thirds, Toulmin being in that case to have two [174] thirds, and he, Copland, in that case to have one third; and we have now the fact, by the ultimate judgment of this House, that that £40,000 was brought in, and that Copland therefore had performed his part of the contract. We have, therefore, according to the answer now, a statement in that answer denying the fact of the £40,000 having been brought in; but that fact being established the case stated by the answer is, that in the event now proved to have existed the parties were to divide the profits in thirds, the present contest, however, being, on the part of Mr. Copland, that the ultimate agreement between the parties was to divide in moieties.

The affidavit referred to in the decree is an affidavit by which it is stated, that on the failure of Toulmin bringing in the £40,000 a new agreement was made. It states the original agreement, namely, that the profits were to be divided in thirds if the £40,000 was brought in, in the same way as the answer, but the affidavit goes on to say, that Toulmin having failed to bring in the £40,000 the parties afterwards agreed to divide the profits in moieties. Now, inasmuch as it was established, by the ultimate judgment of this House, that the £40,000 had been brought in according to the intent and meaning of the contract, the event never occurred upon which the parties would have entered into a new contract; and the affidavit stating that it was upon the failure of that payment,—that being an event which never took place,—it is impossible that such new contract can have been entered into between the parties.

My Lords, it was said that this affidavit was to be [175] taken altogether, that is to say, if it is used for the purpose of showing what the original contract was, namely, that there was a division into thirds in case the £40,000 was brought in. Being to be taken together, therefore, you are bound to adopt that part of it which states the new contract. It is certain that it must be taken together, but it does not follow that, because it must be taken together, therefore every part of it is to be conclusive upon the fact of which it is evidence; the Court therefore required further information, and sent it to the master, first to exhaust the first inquiry as to the £40,000, and then directed the master to inquire whether there had been any subsequent contract entered into between the parties; that refers to the other appeal. As I have stated, the party now appealing having exhausted both subject matters, and the inquiry having failed him in both, he then complains of the Court having inquired into those facts at all.

I think that that extreme case does not occur here, in which your Lordships would be disposed to disturb a decree merely directing inquiries, after the lapse of time which has taken place, and after the result of the inquiries was contradictory to the case set up by the party. Even if it were not for the length of time, and if your lordships were called upon to express an opinion upon the original decree immediately after it had been pronounced, I should have said that it was a case of that kind, in which it was the duty of the court to inquire into the facts. The defendant having set up a defence, both parties were entitled to call upon the Court; to ascertain by inquiry the nature of that defence so set up; and that defence depending on certain facts, [176] it was not possible without inquiry to come to any satisfactory conclusion upon the facts so stated. It was matter, therefore, of course, for the Court to adopt one or other mode of ascertaining the facts which were not at that moment before it, in such a way as to enable it to dispose of the case: it might have directed an issue, and that is one of the arguments; the Court was, no doubt, quite competent to direct an inquiry. But the Court directed an inquiry, and no complaint was made of the inquiry so directed until after the subject matter was exhausted, and the party now complaining had failed to establish the facts in his favour. My Lords, I think this House will not listen to complaints brought, under the circumstances of this case, against a decree merely directing an inquiry. After all that had taken place, I think the inquiry itself perfectly proper, and upon both grounds, therefore, I think the appeal against the original decree has no foundation to rest upon, and must be, therefore, dismissed, with costs.

The first appeal in point of date, that is to say, that first presented, complains of two orders. It complains of an order of the 27th of February 1836, by which exceptions were allowed to the report of the 2d of July 1835; now, the effect of allowing those exceptions was to decide that there had been no alteration in the agreement after the commencement of the partnership. But the second appeal also complained of another order of the 17th of December 1836, which allowed the second exception taken to the report of the 15th of February 1836, by which the master had reported that all sums received by Toulmin and Copland from their customers ought to be applied in repaying the advance [177] of the firm, and the surplus only applied in payment of the debts due to the former firm. The effect, therefore, of the order of the court was to establish the converse of that proposition as the rule to be followed in taking the accounts. As to the order of the 27th of February 1836, it is to be observed, that Mr. Copland's affidavit rested altogether upon the allegation of a new agreement having been made, upon the assumption that the £40,000 good debts had not been brought into the concern by Abraham Toulmin, but this house having decided that such assumption was unfounded, the very ground upon which the supposed existence of such new agreement was rested failed, and, after a careful examination of the evidence, I think that there is no proof of any such new agreement. I lay aside all evidence of declarations and admissions imputed to Abraham Toulmin, which are not stated in the pleadings, and which there was not, therefore, any opportunity of explaining or disproving; and in the absence of all direct evidence upon the subject, either verbal or in writing, it can only be ascertained by reference to the evidence furnished by the books themselves. The books do not contain any division of profit and loss. And here I may observe, that a new contract is supposed to have taken place at some subsequent period; now there is a total absence of any trace in the books of any altered mode of keeping the accounts: if the parties had originally been connected together according to a certain agreement as to the division of profits, and if at a subsequent period they had agreed to adopt another mode of dividing the profits, it could hardly have occurred that in the accounts there should have been throughout [178] the whole of that time a complete absence of all evidence of such an altered contract having taken place between the parties. The books, however, are uniform, following the same system from the commencement to the end, and there is no alteration whatever in the mode of keeping the accounts. The books do not contain any division of profit and loss as to the general business between the parties, and so far they afford no evidence of any new contract; but in respect of particular items they do show that certain expenses and losses were charged equally to the partners. Those relate to certain losses upon the purchase and sale of stock in the public funds, and to certain wines purchased by the firm, which, it appears, were divided equally between the partners. But to this it is answered, that these purchases and sales of stock were not on the partnership account, but that they were speculations of the two partners as individuals, and that the losses were therefore properly charged in moieties to each of the two; and such appears to me to be probably the true solution, for if they were in fact partnership transactions, why were they kept separate from the other transactions of the firm, and why were the results carried to the account of each partner, when no such course was followed as to any other of the partnership transactions? It may also be observed, if the partners were to bear the result of all the transactions in moieties, why were the losses upon their stock transactions carried separately to the account of each partner? But if they were to bear their losses in moieties, and the result of the general business of the partnership in thirds, there was an obvious propriety in separating the results of these adventures from the transactions in their general business.

[179] As to the wines which were divided between the parties the answer given was, that they were so divided to meet the expenditure in entertaining the customers of the firm, and there seems some probability for this supposition. The reference in the account to "house expenses" leads to this conclusion; but in order to make this item available proof of a new agreement for a division of the profits in moieties, it would have been necessary to have shown that the same mode of division applied to all similar cases, which does not appear upon the face of the accounts. The evidence, therefore, of a new agreement to divide the profits equally in my opinion totally fails, and the order of the 27th of February 1836 appears to me to be correct, and in my opinion the exceptions to the report of the 2d of July 1835 were properly allowed.

As to the order of the 17th of December 1836, it establishes a rule for taking the accounts consistent with the ordinary course of business, and which the law assumes to be the course to be pursued, unless there be proof of a contrary course agreed upon between the parties. Certain debts due from the customers of the house to the general firm of Richard and Abraham Toulmin were, by agreement between Abraham Toulmin upon the formation of the partnership between them, transferred into the books of the new firm as Toulmin's capital, and the transactions with such customers continued as before; monies were received on their account, and advances were made to them or payments made on their account. Without a distinct appropriation by the customers paying the money,—at least that is the general [180] course of business, (in some particular instances there seems to have been an appropriation,)—but without a distinct appropriation by the customers paying the money, or an agreement between the parties prescribing a different course of proceeding, the monies so received would be applicable to the earlier debt. What, then, is the proof that there was any such agreement between the parties prescribing a different course? And here, again, I must lay aside all declarations imputed to Abraham Toulmin which are not stated in the pleadings. In the accounts of the customers the old and new debts constitute but one account, and the balance struck is the result of the two. But it is said, that in certain proceedings between Abraham Toulmin and the estate of his late partner, who had become lunatic, he had represented that the monies so subsequently received were to be first applied in repaying the subsequent advances. But it will be found that, by the objection in the exception in favour of Abraham Toulmin, he endeavoured to support this proposition upon the ground of the custom of trade as applicable to that particular business, and not of any special contract for that purpose; but the decision of the case by Lord Eldon (Devaynes and Noble, 1 Merivale, 598) negatived any such contract or any such custom, by deciding that, as between those two branches of the firm, no doubt Abraham Toulmin being the nominal party as between himself and the estate of his late partner, there was sufficient to show that Copland was a party to the proceedings then carried on. Lord Eldon decided, upon the evidence in that case, that the monies re-[181]-ceived were to be applied in payment of the earlier debts; he, therefore, negatives the two grounds set up for a contrary proposition, namely, that, either by the custom of trade or by contract, it was to be applied in paying advances for the subsequent partnership. I think, therefore, that there is no proof of any special contract or any particular custom of trade to support the proposition contended for by the appellant, and the general rule of law is against it. So far, therefore, I think the order of the 17th of December 1836 correct. That order, however, allows the second exception, with an exception which I think very proper, but which is not here in question; it allowed that part of the second exception which asserted "that the firm of Toulmin and Copland, as between them and Abraham Toulmin, should be charged with the sums firstly applied, and with interest thereon, from the times when the same were respectively received to the 4th day of January 1819, at the rate of five per cent. per annum, with annual rests."

The master, by the report to which the exceptions were taken, after stating his opinion as to the manner in which he conceived that the monies received ought to be applied, stated that he had forbore to take the account till this point was decided. Now the part of the second exception to which I have referred does not relate to the question of the manner of applying the monies received, as raised by the report, but to the manner of taking the account, which the master stated he had forbore to take, consequent, indeed, perhaps upon the decision of the first point, but which is not directly embraced by it, although the master has stated he had forbore to take it. It is impossible, therefore, to say that the master, if he [182] was right in making a separate report at all as to the mode of showing the receipts, ought to have reported in the terms of the latter part of the second exception to which I have alluded. I by no means wish to be understood as expressing any opinion against the proposition so raised, but before the account is taken, and without more information as to the fact, I think that it would not be safe for this House a priori to lay down that or any other proposition beyond what is necessary to decide the question raised by the report, and I have before said that it is not regular by an exception to raise a proposition foreign to the subject matter of the report excepted to. I think, therefore, that there should be a variation in the order of the 17th of December 1836, so as to make it allow the second exception, except that concluding part of it to which I have alluded, not for the purpose of expressing any opinion against the proposition so raised, but because I think it was not regular to express an opinion in that state of the cause upon an exception to such a report.

I have had a doubt whether this alteration in the order ought to protect the appellant against the payment of the costs of the appeal. The objection to the order was not put forward as a ground of the appeal in the printed case, but it was insisted on at the bar, and I think it of some importance. Upon the whole, therefore, I think that the appellant should pay the costs of the second appeal, and of so much of the first appeal as complains of the order of the 27th of February 1836, and that each party should pay their own costs with reference to the remaining part of the first appeal.

[183] Ordered, that the appeal against the original decree below be dismissed, with costs; and the appeal against the orders of the 27th of February and 17th December 1836 be dismissed, so far as the appeal complains of the order of the 27th February 1836, with costs, and in part varied as to the order of the 17th December 1836.

[184] FROM THE COURT OF CHANCERY, IRELAND.

The Reverend THOMAS SMYTH, Clerk, and THOMAS JAMES SMYTH, a Minor, by the said THOMAS SMYTH his Father and next Friend,—Appellants; JOHN HYACINTH NANGLE, WILLIAM NANGLE, RICHARD MORE O'FERRALL, and GERALD DEASE, Esquires,—Respondents [1st and 2d June 1840]. [See Hussey.]

[Mews' Dig. viii. 819; S.C. 7 Cl. and F. 405; 4 Jur. 476; and, in Court below, 1 Ir. Eq. R. 119; and, at law, 1 Jebb and S. 199. See Sherlock v. Kennedy, 1863, 15 Ir. Ch. R. 160; and Swinburne v. Milburn, 1884, 9 A.C. 847.]

Upon a bill filed to obtain the benefit of a perpetual renewal of a lease alleged to be contained in a lease granted in 1672, the lease itself being destroyed, the plaintiffs refer to the recitals in a subsequent lease as containing evidence of the covenant contained in the original lease, and pray that the covenant contained in the original lease may be decreed to have been a covenant for perpetual renewal, but make no other case by that bill, the covenant so recited in the subsequent lease not being a covenant for perpetual renewal:—Held, that two issues directed by the chancellor of Ireland, 1st, whether at the time of the execution of the original lease it was agreed that the lessor should grant to the lessee a lease for lives renewable for ever of the premises mentioned in the lease; 2d, whether, independent of the memorandum or endorsement made upon the lease, there was contained in the lease any clause, covenant, or agreement relating to the lease, were issues not consistent with the case made by the bill. The decree was reversed, and the original bill dismissed, with costs.

[185] Henry Pakenham, formerly of Tullenally in the county of Westmeath, esquire, deceased, having been, in and previous to the year 1672, seised in fee simple of the lands of Mayne and Fiermore, by indenture of lease, dated the 24th of May 1672, demised unto Bartholomew Cooper, his heirs and assigns, that part of the lands of Mayne, containing 148 acres of profitable land of the late Irish plantation measure, and part of Fiermore, containing twenty-five acres two roods and five perches and one third part of a perch, like measure, situate in the barony of Fore and county of Westmeath, for the lives of the said Bartholomew Cooper and Appellina Cooper his wife, and Bartholomew Cooper his son, at the yearly rent of £30 for the first seven years of the said term, and £33 16s. 8d. for so many years as should after ensue during the said lives.

There was the following agreement contained in or endorsed upon the said lease:—"And it is hereby agreed between the parties aforesaid, that upon renewing or inserting of any life or lives there shall be paid by the said Bartholomew Cooper the father, his heirs or assigns, unto the said Henry Pakenham, his heirs or assigns, the full sum of £16 16s. 4d., current and lawful money of England."

Some time before the year 1713 Bartholomew Cooper entered into possession of the lands demised by the lease, and shortly afterwards, by endorsement on the original lease, conveyed his interest therein to Garrett Nangle of Mayne, gentleman, the ancestor of the respondent John Hyacinth Nangle.

In or about the year 1674 Appellina Cooper, one of the lives in the lease, died, and in 1695 Bartholomew [186] Cooper the elder, the lessee, and one other of the lives in the lease died.

Henry Pakenham settled the lands of Fiermore, part of the lands comprised in the lease of 24th May 1672, on his son Sir Thomas Pakenham, and the lands of Mayne, the residue of said lands comprised therein, on his son the Rev. Robert Pakenham.

Robert Pakenham, by deeds of lease and release bearing date respectively the 4th and 5th days of February 1706, in consideration of the sum of £1760 granted unto Thomas Smyth the first, his heirs and assigns, the lands of Mayne.

Thomas Smyth the first, by his last will dated the 20th of February 1712, devised unto trustees therein named the lands of Mayne, to the use of his second son Thomas Smyth (called Thomas Smyth the second) for life, with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, remainder to the first and other sons of the said Thomas Smyth severally, successively, and in remainder, according to priority of birth, and their respective heirs male of their bodies, and for default of such issue to the use of his eldest son William Smyth for life, with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to the first and other sons of the said William Smyth severally and successively, and of the several and respective heirs male of their bodies respectively issuing, with divers remainders over. The testator died in the same year, without having altered or revoked his will.

Garrett Nangle, on the 1st day of July 1713, exhibited his bill of complaint in the Court of Chancery in Ireland against Thomas Smyth the second and others, and [187] thereby, after setting forth the seisin in fee of the said Henry Pakenham of and in the said lands of Mayne and Fiermore, expressly stated and put in issue, that he the said Henry Pakenham did, about the 1st day of May 1672, come to an agreement with the said Bartholomew Cooper, to make him a lease for lives, renewable for ever, of said lands and premises, and, after stating the particulars of said lease as before set forth, that the said Henry Pakenham did, on the 24th of May 1672, in pursuance and performance of the said agreement, demise the said lands to the said Bartholomew Cooper for the three lives therein named, as by the said indenture of lease, then in the custody of the said Garrett Nangle, and by his said bill stated to be ready to be produced to the Court, might appear; and the said Garrett Nangle thereby charged that it was concluded and agreed by and between the said Henry Pakenham and the said Bartholomew Cooper, senior, before and at the time of making the said lease for lives, that the same should be renewable for ever by the said Bartholomew Cooper, his heirs and assigns, on the payment of £16 16s. 4d., and charged that such agreement the more plainly appeared by its being mentioned and expressed in the said deed of lease, "that upon the renewing or inserting of any life or lives there should be paid by the said Bartholomew Cooper, his heirs or assigns, the full sum of £16 16s. 4d. unto the said Henry Pakenham, his heirs or assigns."

By his said bill the said Garrett Nangle also stated that the said Henry Pakenham had settled or conveyed the said lands of Fiermore to his son Sir Thomas Pakenham, and the lands of Mayne to his second son Robert Pakenham clerk, who conveyed same to [188] Thomas Smyth the first, and charged that the said Thomas Smyth the second had refused to renew the said lease, alleging that he was not obliged by the said covenant or agreement in the said lease to renew the same, in regard that the said agreement was not more fully or skilfully worded; and the said Garrett Nangle by his said bill further charged, that if the said agreement for renewing was not as fully or skilfully expressed or worded as it ought to be, the same was occasioned by the mistake and ignorance of the person that drew the lease, and his being unacquainted with the term or manner of drawing leases for lives renewable, which was a conveyance then rarely used in Ireland.

And the said Garrett Nangle submitted, that he was relievable by the equity of the said Court of Chancery, in regard that by the manner of wording the covenant or agreement mentioned in said deed of lease, he could not bring an action at law to compel the said Thomas Smyth to renew said lease, though (as alleged by the said bill) it plainly appeared by the said lease, that it was the intention and meaning of the parties thereto that the same should be a lease for lives renewable.

And the bill prayed that the said Thomas Smyth and the other defendants might set forth their knowledge, hearsay, and belief of all and singular the premises, and that he might be relieved therein, according to equity and conscience.

Thomas Smyth the second by his answer admitted the seisin in fee of the said Henry Pakenham of and in the lands of Mayne and Fiermore, and that he did, about the time therein mentioned, by indenture of lease demise that part of the said lands of Mayne unto Bartholomew Cooper for three lives; and that in the said [189] lease there was a clause contained in the words and to the purpose following:—"And it is hereby agreed between the parties aforesaid, that upon the renewing or inserting of any life or lives there shall be paid by the said Bartholomew Cooper the father, his heirs or assigns, unto the said Henry Pakenham, his heirs or assigns, the full sum of £16 16s. 4d. current and lawful money of England."

And he swore that he did not know or believe, nor had he ever heard, save by said bill and by some late discourse with the said Garrett Nangle and those who acted on his behalf some short time before filing the said bill, that the said Henry Pakenham and the said Bartholomew Cooper senior at any time had come to any other agreement, whereby the said Henry Pakenham did make or agree to make to the said Bartholomew Cooper senior a lease for lives renewable for ever of the said lands and premises, or any part thereof, or that the said lease was made in pursuance or performance of any such agreement, or that it was concluded or agreed, before or at the time of making the said lease for lives, that the same should be renewable for ever by the said Bartholomew Cooper senior, his heirs and assigns.

And that he did not know or believe, nor did he ever hear that the said Thomas Smyth the first did, when he purchased the said lands of Maine, know or believe or ever hear that the lease thereof was renewable for ever, or was so agreed or designed to be made by the said Henry Pakenham, or that he purchased the same cheaper on that account; and, on the contrary, he the said Thomas Smyth the second expressly swore that the said Robert Pakenham before said purchase made use of it as an argument with the said Thomas [190] Smyth the first to induce him to give what he did for said lands, that there was a lease for three lives only, and that said lands would be worth a great deal more at the expiration of said term.

And he insisted and was advised that he was not obliged by the said covenant or agreement in the said lease to renew to the said Garrett Nangle.

And he stated that if the said clause or agreement was not fully or skilfully worded, it was not occasioned by the mistake or ignorance of the person that drew the same, or by his being unacquainted with the form and manner of drawing a lease for lives renewable for ever, it having been drawn by the said Sir Thomas Pakenham, who was her majesty's prime serjeant-at-law, and, therefore, if it had been designed to be a lease for lives renewable for ever it would have been otherwise drawn.

And he stated that there was no other clause, except what was afore-mentioned by him in the said lease, to the purport or effect that the said Bartholomew Cooper senior, his heirs and assigns, might renew any life or lives, paying the sum of £16 16s. 4d. on the renewal, or any other to that purpose; and that he had never heard nor did he believe that the said clause before mentioned was inserted in the said lease in pursuance or performance of any agreement that the said lease should be renewable for ever.

The plaintiff proved, by Robert Pakenham, the sale by him of Mayne to Thomas Smyth the first, as being subject to a lease for lives renewable, and that the general reputation in the county was that the lease was renewable; and by the evidence of Ann Pakenham, the widow of Henry Pakenham, "that the said lease was made by her [191] husband to the said Bartholomew Cooper with an intention to be renewable for ever, and that she having had some discourse with her husband in relation to the said lease, he told her that the said lease was renewable for ever." And the plaintiff also proved, by the evidence of Anne Beatty (the daughter of the said Henry Pakenham), that all the body of the said lease was the proper handwriting of Andrew Williams, who was not a person skilled in drawing leases, but was a parish clerk; that she heard her father say "the lease was for lives renewable;" and heard him say, several years after the death of the said Appellina Cooper, (one of the lives in the original lease,) that he wondered the plaintiff in that suit did not renew his lease by putting in a new life, instead of the said Appellina Cooper. The plaintiff also proved, by the evidence of Edward Pakenham, that the said Andrew Williams was a parish clerk, and no way skilled in drawing leases, and that it was the intent of the said Henry Pakenham and Bartholomew Cooper that the said lease should be for lives renewable for ever.

The cause was heard in the Court of Chancery in Ireland on the 22d, 26th, 27th, and 28th days of November 1716, the lease of the 24th May 1764 having been proved and read upon the hearing of the cause.

On the 28th day of November 1716 it was decreed by the then Lord Chancellor of Ireland, that the said Thomas Smyth should perfect unto the said plaintiff, Garrett

Nangle, a lease or leases of the said lands of Mayne, demised by the said Henry Pakenham to Bartholomew Cooper for the lives of Thomas Nangle [192] and Patrick Cashell in the room of Bartholomew Cooper the elder and Appellina Cooper, the plaintiff paying a proportion of the rent and of the fines payable by the said lease in respect of the said lands of Mayne, regard being had to the said lands of Fiermore, without costs on either side; "and his lordship was thereby pleased to declare, that he did not establish the said lease was a lease for lives renewable or not."

In pursuance of the decree Thomas Smyth the second, by indenture of the 8th of April 1719, and in consideration of £28 15s. 5d., after reciting said lease of the 24th day of May 1672, and that the same contained a clause or agreement to the purport and effect before mentioned, namely, "that upon the renewing or inserting of any life or lives, there should be paid by the said Bartholomew Cooper the father, his heirs or assigns, the full sum of £16 16s. 4d.," and after reciting the said decree, the said Thomas Smyth, in obedience to the said decree, did grant unto the said Garrett Nangle, his heirs and assigns, the said lands of Mayne, containing 148 acres of profitable land and 23 acres 13 perches of unprofitable land, for the life of Bartholomew Cooper and the lives of Thomas Nangle and Patrick Cashell, at the yearly rent of £28 10s. 3½d.

A memorial of the indenture of the 8th of April 1719 was registered in Ireland, and described as "a memorial of an indenture of renewal, bearing date and perfected the 8th of April 1719, made between the Rev. Thomas Smyth of the city of Dublin, clerk, of the one part, and Garrett Nangle of Mayne in the county of Westmeath, esq., of the other part, annexed to a lease for lives renewable for ever, dated the four [193] and twentieth day of May one thousand six hundred and seventy-two." Signed by Garrett Nangle, but not by Thomas Smyth the second.

The said Bartholomew Cooper the younger, the last remaining life in said lease of the 24th of May 1672, having died, Thomas Smyth the second, by indenture bearing date the 5th day of May 1752, after reciting said lease of the 24th of May 1672, and that same contained an agreement in the precise words before set forth, and after reciting said decree and said indenture of the 8th of April 1719, so executed in pursuance thereof, in pursuance of the covenant of renewal in the said original lease contained, granted unto Hyacinth Nangle (the grandson and heir of Garrett Nangle), his heirs and assigns, the said lands at Mayne, for the lives of the said Thomas Nangle, Patrick Cashell, and his royal highness George Prince of Wales, and the survivors and survivor of them; and in this last-mentioned indenture the following agreement is contained:—

"It is hereby agreed between the parties aforesaid, that upon the renewing or inserting of any life or lives there shall be paid by the said Hyacinth Nangle, his heirs or assigns, unto the said Thomas Smyth, his heirs or assigns, the full sum of £14 17s. 8½d. current and lawful money of England," being the sum apportioned for the renewal fine by the said decree in 1716.

Thomas Nangle, one of the lives named in said indenture of the 8th of April 1719, having died, Thomas Smyth the second, by indenture dated the 2d day of March 1754, after reciting to the effect mentioned in the lease of 1752 and the indenture of 5th of May 1752, in [194] pursuance of the covenant for renewal in the said original lease contained, and in consideration of £14 7s 8½d., did release unto the said Hyacinth Nangle, his heirs and assigns, the said lands of Mayne for the lives of Patrick Cashell, George Prince of Wales, and Prince Edward his brother, and the survivors and survivor of them, with a similar clause as to renewal as is contained in the lease of 1752.

Some time after the execution of the indenture of the 2d of March 1754 the house of Hyacinth Nangle, at Streamstown in the county of Westmeath, was set fire to and burnt, and Hyacinth Nangle was murdered, and all the title deeds therein, including the original lease of the 24th of May 1672 and the renewals thereof, were burnt or destroyed.

Hyacinth Nangle left an only child, Christopher Nangle, then a minor, him surviving.

William Smyth, the eldest son and heir-at-law of Thomas Smyth the first, and to whom Thomas Smyth the first had devised certain estates in his said will mentioned for life, to take effect in possession immediately on the decease of Thomas Smyth the first, with remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male, died in the lifetime of his next brother Thomas Smyth the second, leaving an eldest son Thomas Smyth (called Thomas Smyth the third), who, as the first tenant in tail of the said estates which had been so devised directly to his father the said William Smyth for life, became entitled thereto in possession on the death of his said father William Smyth, and thereupon, having duly barred the estate tail and all remainders over under said will, acquired the fee in the said estates so devised to his said father for life by the will of said Thomas [195] Smyth the first, and was also entitled to an estate tail in remainder in the lands so as aforesaid devised to the said Thomas Smyth the second for life, expectant on the death of the said Thomas Smyth the second without issue male.

The said Thomas Smyth the third being entitled to such estates in possession, and to the said lands of Mayne and other estates in reversion expectant upon the death of Thomas Smyth the second, upon and previous to his marriage with Miss Martha Hutchinson, made and duly executed an indenture of release and settlement bearing date the 10th day of March 1764, whereby he conveyed the several lands therein mentioned to trustees therein named upon trust, to the use of himself for life, with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder, subject to a jointure for the said Martha Hutchinson and to the powers and remedies for recovery thereof, to the use of the first and other sons of the said Thomas Smyth the third by the said Martha Hutchinson in tail male, with divers remainders over.

This last-mentioned settlement contains a proviso, that in case the said Thomas Smyth the third should outlive the said Thomas Smyth the second, and thereupon, and by suffering a recovery thereof, the lands then possessed by the said Thomas Smyth the second should become vested in the said Thomas Smyth the third in fee, it should be lawful for the said Thomas Smyth the third to revoke the limitations thereby declared concerning the lands therein comprised, and to limit and settle the lands then in the possession of the said Thomas Smyth the second upon the same trusts [196] and for the same estates as the several lands therein comprised then stood limited.

In the latter end of the year 1764, and shortly after the execution of said settlement, Thomas Smyth the second died without issue, whereupon Thomas Smyth the third became seised of an estate tail male in possession in the lands of Mayne and the other lands devised to the said Thomas Smyth the second for life by the will of the said Thomas Smyth the first; and the said Thomas Smyth the third, in or as of Hilary term 1765, levied a fine and suffered a common recovery of all said last-mentioned lands, and acquired an estate in fee simple therein.

In pursuance of the proviso contained in said settlement of the 10th of March 1764, for revoking the limitations thereof as regarded the lands therein comprised, and settling said last-mentioned lands in lieu thereof, Thomas Smyth the third made and duly executed an indenture of release and settlement, bearing date the 8th day of March 1766, and did thereby revoke and make void the several trusts declared in the said indenture of the 10th of March 1764 concerning the lands and premises therein comprised, and did thereby grant and release unto trustees therein named the lands of Mayne and the several other lands therein mentioned upon trust, to the use of the said Thomas Smyth the third for life, with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder, subject to a jointure for the said Martha Hutchinson and to the powers and remedies for recovery thereof, to the use of the first and other sons of Thomas Smyth the third by the said Martha Hutchinson, in tail [197] male and in strict settlement, with divers remainders over.

In or about the year 1768, Prince Edward having died, Thomas Smyth the third, by indenture bearing date the 2d day of April 1768, after reciting to the effect mentioned in the lease of 1754, and after reciting the said indenture of the 2d of March 1754, in pursuance of the covenant of renewal in the said original lease contained, and in consideration of £14 7s. 8½d., did release unto Christopher Nangle, the only child and heir-at-law of Hyacinth Nangle deceased, a minor, the lands of Mayne for the lives of the said Patrick Cashell, his said royal highness George Prince of Wales, then George the third, and of his royal highness William Henry Duke of Gloucester, and the survivors and survivor of them, with a similar clause for renewal as is contained in the two former leases.

Thomas Smyth the third executed a memorial of said last-mentioned indenture of the 2d of April 1768, which was registered in the public registry office for registering deeds in the city of Dublin, on the 22d of April 1768.

Thomas Smyth the third, Patrick Cashell having died in or about the year 1768, by indenture of lease dated the 25th day of December 1768, after reciting the said original indenture of lease of the 24th of May 1672, and that it was by the said indenture of lease agreed, that upon renewing or inserting of any life or lives there should be paid by the said Bartholomew Cooper the father, his heirs or assigns, unto the said Henry Pakenham, his heirs or assigns, the full sum of £16 16s. 4d. sterling; and after reciting the said decree and said indenture of the 8th day of April 1719, the 5th day of [198] May 1752, the 2d day of March 1754, 2d day of April 1768, and that Patrick Cashell was dead, and that the life of Christopher Nangle was nominated in his place, the said Thomas Smyth the third, in pursuance of the covenant for renewal in said original lease contained, and in consideration of £14 7s. 8½d., did release unto the said Christopher Nangle the said lands of Mayne for the lives of King George the third, his royal highness William Henry Duke of Gloucester, and of the said Christopher Nangle, and the survivors and survivor of them.

And in the said last-mentioned indenture is contained the following clause:—
“And it is thereby agreed between the parties aforesaid, that upon the renewing or inserting of any life or lives there shall be paid by the said Christopher Nangle, his heirs or assigns, unto the said Thomas Smyth, his heirs and assigns, the full sum of £14 7s. 8½d. current and lawful money of England.”

On the 29th July 1774 Thomas Smyth the third filed his original bill for the purpose of having the boundaries ascertained between the said lands of Mayne and certain lands at Coole, alleging that Garrett Nangle and Hyacinth Nangle were severally and successively in possession of lands of Coole adjoining the lands of Mayne, as tenants to the said Thomas Smyth the second and Thomas Smyth the third, under determinable leases for twenty-one years, and that during the continuance of such leases they had defaced the ancient meerings between the said lands of Mayne and Coole, and had annexed part of the lands of Coole to the said lands of Mayne.

On the 6th day of August 1779 the bill was amended, [199] and it was therein stated that the lands of Mayne were held under a lease for three lives, with a covenant for a perpetual renewal. The suit was not prosecuted to a decree, an amicable adjustment having been made.

Some time in the year 1782 or 1783 Thomas Smyth the third died, leaving Thomas Hutchinson Smyth his eldest son, who, having suffered a common recovery of the lands in Mayne, in contemplation of a marriage afterwards had with Miss Abigail Hamilton, by an indenture of release and settlement, bearing date the 27th day of February 1796, granted and released unto trustees therein named the said lands of Mayne and other estates therein comprised, upon trust, to the use of himself the said Thomas Hutchinson Smyth for life, with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder, subject to a jointure thereby provided for the said Abigail Hamilton and to the powers and remedies for securing the same, and in default of such appointment as therein mentioned, to the use of the first and other sons of the said Thomas Hutchinson Smyth by the said Abigail Hamilton, his intended wife, and the heirs male of such first and other sons in tail male, and in default of such issue to the use of the said Thomas Hutchinson Smyth in fee.

William Henry Duke of Gloucester having died some time prior to the year 1806, Thomas Hutchinson Smyth, by deed dated the 16th day of January 1806, and purporting to be made between the said Thomas Hutchinson Smyth of the one part and the said Christopher Nangle, the lessee in the annexed indenture, of the other part, after reciting that William Henry [200] Duke of Gloucester, one of the cestuique vies in the annexed indenture, was dead, and in order to fill up the three lives pursuant to the covenant for perpetual renewal in said annexed indenture mentioned, the said Christopher Nangle had nominated his eldest son John Nangle, and in consideration of a fine of £14 7s. 8½d., the said indenture witnessed, that, in pursuance of the said covenant for perpetual renewal, and in order to fill up the said three lives agreeable thereto, the said Thomas Hutchinson Smyth added and inserted to the time or term of said grant or demise the life of the said John Nangle then nominated, and released unto Christopher Nangle, his heirs and assigns, the lands of Mayne, for the lives of King George the third, of Christopher Nangle, and John Hyacinth Nangle, and the survivors and survivor of them.

On the death of George the third Thomas Hutchinson Smyth, by indenture bearing date the 12th day of August 1820, and made between the said Thomas Hutchinson Smyth of the one part, and the said Christopher Nangle, who is therein again described as the lessee in the annexed indenture named, of the other part, after reciting that George the third was dead, and in order to fill up the three lives, pursuant to the covenant for perpetual renewal in the said annexed indenture mentioned, and in consideration of a fine of £14 7s. 8½d. did add the life of William Nangle, and did release unto Christopher Nangle, his heirs and assigns, the lands of Mayne, for the lives of Christopher Nangle, John Hyacinth Nangle, and William Nangle, and the survivors and survivor of them.

In the month of October 1830 Thomas Hutchinson Smyth died, leaving Thomas Smyth the fourth his [201] eldest son, who, having suffered a recovery of the lands in Mayne, and in contemplation of his marriage with Miss Mary Anne Gibbons, which was afterwards solemnized, made and duly executed an indenture of release and settlement, dated the 2d day of August 1832, whereby he granted and released unto trustees therein named the said lands of Mayne and the several other lands therein comprised, upon trust, to the use of himself for life, with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder, subject to a jointure for the said Mary Anne Gibbons, in case she should survive the appellant Thomas Smyth the fourth, and to the powers and remedies for recovery thereof, and to a trust term for better securing the same and raising portions for younger children, to the use of such of the sons of the appellant Thomas Smyth the fourth by the said Mary Anne Gibbons as the said appellant Thomas Smyth the fourth should appoint; and in default of such appointment, to the use of the first and other sons of the said marriage, and the heirs male of such first and other sons, in tail male.

On the 12th day of June 1836 Christopher Nangle, the last surviving cestuique vie named in the before-mentioned indenture of renewal of the 25th day of December 1768, died, having previously made his will, bearing date the 2d day of July 1828, whereby he devised all his estates therein, including his interest in the said lands of Mayne, to the respondents Gerald Dease and Richard More O'Ferrall, their heirs and assigns, in trust, to the use of his eldest son, the respondent John Hyacinth Nangle, for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, [202] with remainder to testator's second son William Nangle for life, remainder to his first and other sons in tail male.

On the 8th day of July 1836 John Hyacinth Nangle applied to Thomas Smyth the fourth to execute a new lease of the lands of Mayne for a life to be nominated by him in place of Christopher Nangle deceased; but Thomas Smyth the fourth, conceiving that John Hyacinth Nangle had possessed himself of more lands than were comprised in the original lease of the 24th day of May 1672, refused to grant a renewal of the leases until it was ascertained what lands John Hyacinth Nangle was entitled to beyond those comprised in the original lease.

On the 28th day of November 1836 the respondents John Hyacinth Nangle, William Nangle, Richard More O'Ferrall, and Gerald Dease filed their original bill against the said Thomas Smyth the fourth, and which was amended in June 1836, setting forth the original indenture of lease of the 24th of May 1672, and that therein was contained a covenant on the part of the said Henry Pakenham with the said Bartholomew Cooper for the perpetual renewal thereof on payment of half a year's rent, as by the said original lease which had been burnt or destroyed, if it could be produced, would appear, and as appeared by a recital thereof in the indenture of the 25th day of December 1768, thereafter set forth.

The respondents by said bill then proceeded to deduce the title of the lessor and lessee to the said lands of Mayne, and in so doing particularly stated and set forth the several indentures of the 8th day of April 1719, 5th of May 1752, and 2d of March 1754, and in so [203] doing averred that the same had been burned or destroyed, and particularly referred to the recitals of the said several indentures in the said indenture of the 25th day of December 1768 as conclusive evidence of the contents thereof.

The respondents, by their said bill, after stating the said indenture of the 2d day of April 1768, and particularly setting forth the said indenture of the 25th day of December 1768, stated that the said last-mentioned indenture, viz., the indenture of the 25th of December 1768, contained full recitals of the several indentures therein-before set forth and stated to have been burned or destroyed, and submitted that the appellant Thomas Smyth the fourth was bound and estopped by the recitals contained in the said last-mentioned indenture of the 25th of December 1768.

And after the several other statements in said bill contained, the respondents prayed that the covenant for renewal might be decreed to have been a covenant for perpetual renewal.

The appellant Thomas Smyth the fourth by his answer admitted that the lease of the 24th May 1672 had been executed by the said Henry Pakenham to the said Bartholomew Cooper, and that there was contained in said lease or endorsed there-upon a clause or memorandum in the words or to the purport following, that is to say:—"and it is hereby agreed between the parties aforesaid, that upon the renewing or inserting of any life or lives there shall be paid by the said Bartholomew Cooper the father, his heirs or assigns, unto the said Henry Pakenham, his heirs or assigns, the full sum of £16 16s. 4d. current and lawful money [204] of England;" but appellant denied that there was contained in or endorsed upon said lease any other or further covenant in anywise relating to the renewal of said lease than the covenant or memorandum aforesaid.

And after deducing his title to the fee and inheritance of said lands of Mayne as herein-before stated, he submitted that he was not bound by the aforesaid agreement or memorandum, and the true construction thereof, to execute any renewal to the respondents, and that he was not bound by the renewals, inasmuch as the same were made by persons having only estates for life.

After the appellant had filed his answer insisting that the said indenture of the 24th of May 1672 did not contain any covenant or agreement in anywise relating to the renewal thereof, except the clause or memorandum aforesaid, and that the said clause or memorandum was not a covenant for perpetual renewal, the respondents, on the 23d day of June 1837, amended their said bill upon the file, by introducing the following words at the commencement of the prayer; viz., "that the covenant for renewal contained in the said original lease may be decreed to have been a covenant for perpetual renewal." And by such amendment the respondents made the appellant Thomas James Smyth, a minor, and Francis Smyth, James Gibbons junior, and the Rev. Robert Pakenham parties defendants, and prayed an injunction to restrain the appellants from proceeding at law.

On the 1st day of July 1837 the appellant Thomas Smyth the fourth filed his answer to such amendments.

[205] In Easter term 1837, the appellant Thomas Smyth the fourth brought his ejectment in the Queen's Bench for the recovery of the possession of the lands of Mayne.

This ejectment was tried at the Mullingar summer assizes in the year 1837 before Mr. Baron Foster, who in charging the jury stated, that the question whether the defendant Nangle had now a valid subsisting title to the possession of the lands sought to be recovered, must depend upon whether the leases of 1806 and 1820, or either of them, were good and subsisting leases on the days in the declaration mentioned, which depended on the fact whether there was or was not a covenant for perpetual renewal in the lease of 1672; and in case there was such a covenant in the said lease, it then became a question for the Court, and not for the jury, and there-upon directed the jury to consider the leases of 1806 and 1820 as good and subsisting leases.

The plaintiff excepted to this charge, insisting that the judge should have told the jury that there was not any covenant for perpetual renewal contained in the lease of 1672, or in the renewals of 1768, or in any other renewal; and that the renewals of 1806 and 1820 were not good and valid leases, first, as having been made by a tenant for life under the settlement of 1796, and, secondly, as not having been made in pursuance of the leasing power contained in that settlement.

On the 23d day of January 1838 the defendant Francis Smyth filed his answer to the said original amended and supplemental bills.

On the 3d day of February 1838 the defendants [206] James Gibbons and the Rev. Robert Pakenham filed their joint and several answer to said original amended and supplemental bills, and upon the same day the appellants Thomas Smyth the fourth and Thomas James Smyth, a minor, filed their joint answer to said supplemental bill, and the appellant Thomas James Smyth also answered said original and amended bills, by which said answer the appellant Thomas Smyth the fourth submitted, that as there was not any covenant for perpetual renewal in said lease of 24th May 1672, no subsequent events could construe it to have been such, and that the jury had found for the defendant in such ejectment cause upon the misdirection of the baron who tried the same.

On the 2d day of March 1838 the plaintiffs filed their replication in said cause, and evidence was gone into on the part of the respondents and appellants; and publication having passed in the cause, the same was set down to be heard upon pleadings and proofs as to the appellants, and upon bill and answer as to the other defendants.

On the 22d day of May 1838 an order was made in this cause, on consent, that the parties should be at liberty to read as an original document the copy of the will of Thomas Smyth the first; and the cause came on to be heard before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland on Friday the 25th day of May 1838; but the bill of exceptions taken to the charge of the learned baron who tried the ejectment cause being in course of argument before the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland, the hearing of this cause was from time to time adjourned until the argument in said law cause should be closed, and the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench [207] upon the construction of the said clause or memorandum, being the point raised by the bill of exceptions, should be pronounced.

On the 13th day of June 1838 the Court of Queen's Bench, after argument, gave judgment on the said bill of exceptions, in which the Court gave it as their opinion, that there could be no reasonable doubt that the terms of the renewal covenant contained in the lease of 1672 were such as they were recited to have been by the renewal lease of 1768, and in conformity with the renewal covenant contained in that lease; and the Court were of opinion that the terms of that covenant did not amount to or warrant the construction of such a covenant being a covenant for perpetual renewal; and the Court stated that the jury should have been directed that the terms of the covenant, as the same were recited in the lease of 1768, did not amount to a covenant for perpetual renewal, and that, although the Court could not but feel a disposition to sustain a construction to which the acts of parties appeared for a length of time to have given countenance, the Court did not see sufficient grounds to adopt it; and the verdict of the jury having been founded upon a direction leading to a misconception of the construction of that covenant, the Court thought that the exceptions so taken by appellant Thomas Smyth the fourth should be allowed, and a venire de novo awarded. Bell, on the demises of Thomas Smyth and others, v. John Hyacinth Nangle (1 Jebb and Symes Reports, 199).

The cause came on to be heard before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland on the 3d day of November [208] 1838, and to be further heard on the 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th days of November 1838, and on the 22d day of December 1838 it was decreed by the Lord High Chancellor of Ireland, that the respondents bill should be retained for six months, with liberty for the respondent John Hyacinth Nangle to commence a feigned action at law against appellants, to which the appellants should appear gratis and plead the general issue, and to admit all matters of form, so that a trial might be had between the said parties to try the following issues:—first, whether at or before the time of the execution of the lease dated the 24th day of May 1672, in the pleadings mentioned, it was agreed between Henry Pakenham, the lessor in that lease, and Bartholomew Cooper, the lessee therein, that the said Henry Pakenham should grant to the said Bartholomew Cooper, his heirs and assigns, a lease for lives renewable for ever of the lands and premises in the said lease mentioned; and secondly, whether, independent of the memorandum or endorsement made upon said lease, whereby it was agreed by and between the parties thereto that for the renewing or inserting of any life or lives there should be paid by the said lessee, his heirs or assigns, the sum of £16 16s. 4d., there was contained in the said lease of the 24th day of May 1672 any clause, covenant, or agreement relating to the renewal of said lease to the lessee, his heirs and assigns; the parties to the said action to be respectively at liberty to give in evidence on the trial of such issues all the evidence used by the said parties on the hearing of this cause; the said issues to be tried by a special jury of the county of Westmeath; and the judge before whom such trial should be had should certify to the said court the verdicts to be [209] had on the said issues respectively; and his Lordship was pleased to reserve all further directions until the return of said judge's certificate.

From this decree the present appeal is brought.

Sir William Follett and Mr. Jacob for the appellants:—These issues cannot be supported; there is no agreement between the parties distinct from the lease. The plaintiffs do not make out a case upon their bill for a perpetual renewal.

The case put upon the record is, that the covenant contained in the several leases, is a covenant for a perpetual renewal, and that case has failed. The proceedings in the Court of Chancery in 1713 show that there was no covenant for perpetual renewal. Two allegations have been resorted to which are not on the record; first, a parol agreement for a perpetual renewal, second, that there might be some other covenant than that contained in the original lease.

The lease executed supersedes any parol agreement, unless evidence of reputation can be admitted to contradict a written instrument; the only endorsement on the original lease was an assignment of Bartholomew Cooper's interest in the lease to Garrett Nangle.

The different renewals which were made by the Smyth family were made in ignorance of their rights; and the acts of the parties cannot convert what is not a covenant for perpetual renewal into a covenant for perpetual renewal, Iggulden v. May (9 Ves. 325; 7 East, 237). Lord Alvanley would not [210] allow a deed to be construed by the acts of the parties, Baynham v. Guy's Hospital (3 Ves. 295). The Lord Chancellor said he could not come to any satisfactory conclusion, and therefore directed these issues. Supposing the jury were to find that there was another agreement, could the Chancellor act upon it? There can be no living witnesses to examine. If there is documentary evidence the Court itself ought to decide upon it; no parol evidence can be received independent of the statute of frauds; a solemn written agreement cannot be added to by a parol agreement. Most of the leases granted by tenants for life, therefore, no evidence against us, and the Lord Chancellor adopts as a fact in one of the issues what is pure hypothesis, that there is a memorandum or endorsement on the original lease.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Wakefield for the respondents:—From 1713 to the present time there never has been a doubt of the right of the Nangle family to a renewal; each side has treated it as a perpetual interest, and it is not a violent presumption that there was some collateral agreement for a perpetual renewal.

There is no objection to a parol agreement in Ireland; there was at that time no statute of frauds. In 1754 the lease was destroyed, and the lessee was not able to produce the original lease; but it is remarkable that the lessor produces no counterpart.

(Lord Chancellor:—There is no evidence that they have the lease.)

They do not account for not producing it.

[211] (Lord Chancellor:—If you had asked them for it they might have accounted for it.)

In the proceedings in Chancery in 1713 the Court, by decreeing that two lives should be added, determines that there is some engagement for a perpetual renewal, otherwise there would be a great injustice in adding two lives. In 1752 the same party, who was litigating the point, acquiesces in the claim, and grants a renewed lease; all the leases have been taken as if there was a covenant for perpetual renewal, and though there have been disputes as to boundaries, no dispute has ever arisen in respect of a renewal of the leases. From the numerous renewals which have taken place the Court would presume a covenant for perpetual renewal. Attorney General v. Bishop of Ely (4 Russell, 102), Ball v. Lord Devonshire (Lynes App. on Gen. 61). Where the question of right in a suit is a mere legal question dependent upon written evidence, the House of Lords held that it was right to send it to law to be tried upon a proper issue. Collins v. Saurey (4 Brown's P. C. 692), Burkett v. Randall (3 Merivale, 466).

(Lord Chancellor:—I have looked over the original and amended bill, and I do not find any such case made by your bill as you are arguing.)

We have put the case sufficiently in issue. The plaintiffs by their supplemental bill state, that the defendants pretend that the case of 1672 does not contain any covenant for perpetual renewal.

(Lord Chancellor:—But they do not charge that the pretence was untrue.)

The Court might give us leave to file a supplemental bill.

[212] (Lord Chancellor:—It could not be done by supplemental bill; but your bill must be dismissed, without prejudice to your filing another bill.)

Sir William Follett in reply:—A supplemental bill would bring forward a case totally inconsistent with the case made in 1713. Mr. Foster, the judge, thought the covenant was a covenant for a perpetual renewal, and the bill is framed upon that view of the subject. The original lease was produced in 1713, and in the answers to the bill filed in 1713 the covenant contained in the original lease is set out, and it is denied that there was any agreement for a perpetual renewal. This is not a case of presumption, like the bishop of Ely's case. To presume that the lease contained such a covenant would be inconsistent with the deed; further litigation would answer no additional purpose; no additional evidence can be produced. There are many instances in church lands of families holding leases for centuries, and yet from that holding no presumption of a right to a perpetual renewal arises; it is the practice always to recite the renewal covenants in a new lease. Nothing can be wilder than the first issue, to leave to a jury to say there was an independent agreement; the whole evidence is before the Court. Nothing further can be elicited; the result must be the same, and only additional expense incurred.

Lord Chancellor (2d June):—This suit was instituted to obtain the benefit of a perpetual renewal of a lease which had been agreed for, as alleged, in 1672; and since the case was argued yesterday I have taken ad-[213]-vantage of the interval to look through the pleadings, and I think our judgment must be regulated by the pleadings, and the pleadings alone, because it would be very dangerous to listen to the arguments urged at the bar, that a different rule of pleading is to be followed regarding matters of equity, whether the cause comes from Ireland or from England. The rules of pleading for this purpose are essential to the due administration of justice, in order to give to each party the opportunity of knowing the case which he has to meet. Now, when this case comes to be investigated, there is no such objection, and when I threw out that the House might be disposed to dismiss the bill without prejudice to the party filing another bill, it was certainly on the supposition that the form of the bill might have been more advantageously framed if it had assumed a different shape; but when I come to consider what appears on the proceedings of 1713, I am quite satisfied that the gentleman who drew this bill, having those proceedings before him, could not have drawn the bill in a way which would have led to a more beneficial result to his client than the course he has adopted.

Now, the order of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland directed certain issues to be tried, and the question is, whether these issues are at all consistent with the case made by the bill, one of the issues being to inquire, whether there was an agreement independently of the lease at or before the period of the lease of 1672; and the other, whether that lease contained any other provisions besides that memorandum, which, it appears, the plaintiff states to have been either included in or attached to that lease.

When we look to the bill itself it does not open the [214] door to any one or other of these inquiries; it confines the plaintiff's case strictly to what the plaintiff alleges to have been contained in that lease of 1672. The bill states that lease, and then states that it contained a covenant for perpetual renewal, and refers to a subsequent lease of the 25th of December 1768 as evidence of the alleged contents of that first lease. Now, if the bill had stopped there, if there was nothing further, no further allegation on the subject, it might have been open to the observation of Mr. Wakefield, that it was an allegation that the original lease contained a covenant for renewal, and referred to the renewed lease of 1768 as evidence of its containing such a covenant. But the subsequent part of the bill entirely excludes such a supposition, for, in mentioning the renewal, it is always mentioned to be "in pursuance of said covenant." In page 27 it states "your suppliants do not possess any copies or copy thereof, or any of them, or any evidence of the contents thereof, save the recitals thereof contained in the said indenture of the 25th day of December 1768 herein-after mentioned, but which recitals your suppliants submit is conclusive evidence of the contents thereof for the reasons herein-after set forth." Then in a subsequent page it states, that the last-mentioned indenture of renewal contains full recitals of the several indentures herein-before set forth or mentioned, and herein-before stated to have been burned or destroyed," which includes the lease of 1672; and having been executed by Thomas Smyth, your suppliants submit that Thomas Smyth is bound and estopped by the recitals contained in the last-mentioned indenture of renewal. Then the bill prays, "that the [215] covenant for renewal contained in the said original lease may be decreed to have been a covenant for perpetual renewal."

Now, it is impossible to read that bill and put any other construction on it than this,—that which appears in the renewed lease of 1768 is a copy of that which is contained in the lease of 1672. We have not got the deed of 1672; it was burned or destroyed; but we state that we know what it contains, because that deed of 1768 contains all the recitals and statements in that deed; and then having got that covenant from the deed of 1768 the bill prays that the covenant contained in the original lease, alleged to be identical with that which is stated in the renewed lease of 1768, may be declared to be a covenant for perpetual renewal. The whole case of the plaintiff is put on the construction of that covenant, which is stated by the plaintiff to be identified and ascertained by the renewed lease of 1768. When that case fails it is not attempted at the bar to be argued that that covenant is a covenant for perpetual renewal, or that it gives the plaintiff any title to the relief which he claims by this bill. Now, what have the issues tendered by this bill to do with the construction of the covenant? They have nothing to do with the construction of the covenant; they find out a case for the plaintiff totally dehors the bill.

Then it occurred to me, certainly, that if the bill had assumed a different shape, and if the bill had stated that the deed was lost, (but through the dealings between the parties an inference ought to be drawn that that deed contained a covenant for perpetual renewal,) [216] and they had brought forward evidence for the affirmative of that proposition,—that a large and reasonable inquiry might have been open to the plaintiff, which might have justified the inquiries directed by those issues. But then, when we look at the earlier history of this transaction, and look at what passed in the year 1713, when the original lease existed, when the parties had it to produce, when they were as much interested in making the most of that lease as at the present moment, it is quite clear there is no room for any presumption that the deed itself, then in possession of the parties, contained any other covenant than that which is contained in the renewed lease of 1768. The complaint being not of any covenant that is contained in it, but the bill prays for relief on the ground of some mistake or error in the person employed to prepare the lease, and asks for relief on the ground of that supposed error. Why, there was no error in the covenant for renewal, which is all the plaintiff asks for. He states that which appears in the renewed lease of 1768, and asks for relief on the ground of that not being properly adapted to the purpose the parties had in view. That shows that no further investigation, nor any other form of suit, could possibly enable the plaintiff to have that which he asks; and the person who prepared this subsequent bill had good reason for not opening a door for further inquiry, knowing that the proceedings of 1713 would show that there was no other ground on which the plaintiffs case could by possibility succeed.

No doubt, after possession has been held for so long a time, and parties have supposed they have a title which [217] they have not, courts of justice are anxious to take care that no conclusion of wrong may be done consistently with the original right of the parties; and where the dealing presupposes that there are grounds of title which are not capable of being proved, they would give the party every opportunity of proving the history of that title. Such, however, is not the title now set up by the plaintiff, and I think it would be improperly encouraging litigation to allow the plaintiff to file a bill which he will not be able to sustain. If he has any other ground of equity, or a case generally which enables him to make a new title to new relief, under those circumstances the dismissal of this bill will not prejudice him.

I think it much fairer, considering the circumstances of the transaction, not to hold out any hope to the plaintiff of proceeding in a case which, according to the rules of practice, he would be precluded from proceeding with by the dismissal of this bill. I therefore propose to your Lordships, that this decree should be reversed, and the original bill dismissed, with costs.

Lord Brougham.—I entirely agree with what my noble and learned friend has stated, in the opinion he has given as the result of this case, in every particular. It has been said, that certain inattention or negligence, or slovenliness, as was stated in one part of the observations, has been found to prevail in other parts of the United Kingdom in the drawing of pleadings, and that on that account your Lordships ought to apply a different rule to cases coming from that part of the kingdom than to cases coming from nearer home. My [218] Lords, I should say, if it were so (which I very much doubt),—if it were so, that would be an exceedingly dangerous course for your Lordships to take, for it would be the means of perpetuating that negligence, or at least slovenliness, which it is suggested there exists; I do not believe it exists, but if it does exist, your Lordships, by having one rule of pleading for Ireland and another for Westminster Hall, would undoubtedly perpetuate that neglect.

But I see no evidence whatever of this in the present case; I see nothing whatever of that defect in the present pleadings; the defect is not in the draughtsman but in the party, not in the bill but in the case. The bill appears to me to meet the facts of the case, and no doubt it is unfortunate to the party that it must be so framed; but the case being defective in that essential particular, which has been pointed out by my noble and learned friend, the bill is defective in that particular, as the case—as the facts upon which the draughtsman had to proceed were defective, and, therefore, cannot be now remedied.

A doubt appeared to exist at one moment, both in my noble and learned friend's mind and my own, whether we ought not to dismiss this bill, without prejudice, so as to enable the party to file another; but I think the real answer to that is, that, looking at the proceedings of 1713, that the lease was in existence, and was before the draughtsman who prepared that bill, which was disposed of by Lord Middleton, there is no evidence here, from the frame of that bill, of what the contents of the lease then before the draughtsman were. I do not say whether that bill would be evidence [219] between the same parties in the present suit, supposing an action was sent to be tried at law; I do not argue that at all; but, in the discretion which the Court has to exercise as to whether it will encourage another suit or not, it is very material to consider whether there is any possibility, when you look at the bill, of the lease being now produced containing the clause it is alleged to have contained, namely, the covenant for perpetual renewal. Is it possible to conceive that there should be a lease in existence with that covenant, when you see the way in which that bill is framed with the lease lying before the draughtsman at the time? So far from saying there is a covenant for perpetual renewal in that bill, he says there were various covenants in the bill; that it was agreed between the parties at and before the time of executing that lease,—it was understood and agreed between them that there should be a perpetual renewal, as more plainly appears by this clause, namely, the sixteen guinea clause. Now, if there had been a covenant for perpetual renewal, it would not have more plainly appeared by the sixteen guinea clause, but it would have most plainly appeared by that covenant of renewal itself. It is clear that there was no such covenant, or he would not have had recourse to that form of stating his case, or to that kind of evidence by which he was to support it. Then he states the reason why that sixteen guinea clause was so framed, and was not a covenant for perpetual renewal, namely, the unskilfulness of the conveyancer who prepared the lease. It is clear, in my opinion, that your Lordships have the strongest reason to suppose,—the strongest reason that can be imagined,—that in the [220] lease itself, if it had not been unfortunately destroyed, there would have been found no covenant for a perpetual renewal, excepting that clause respecting the sixteen guineas.

I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend that this decree ought to be reversed, and the original bill dismissed, with costs, below.

It is ordered, that the said order complained of in the said appeal be reversed, and that the respondents' bill be dismissed out of the Court below, with costs.

FROM THE COURT OF CHANCERY, IRELAND.

MASON GERARD EARL OF ALDBOROUGH,—Appellant; HENRY NORWOOD TRYE, THOMAS HENNEY, and WILLIAM CHARLES KING, Executors of JOHN HARVEY OLLNEY, deceased,—Respondents [2d, 4th, and 15th June 1840].

Lord Aldborough, being tenant in tail male of certain estates expectant upon the determination of his father's life estate, charged his estates with the payment of £12,000 and £20,000 in case he shall survive his father, as the consideration to Colonel Ollney for his advancement to Lord Aldborough of £6000 and £10,000, and gives an annuity to his agent for his services, which is afterwards assigned by the agent to Colonel Ollney for a valuable consideration. Upon a bill brought by Colonel Ollney to enforce, and a cross bill by Lord Aldborough to set aside, these transactions:—Held, (though at the hearing of the cause evidence was given on the part of Lord Aldborough, that, according to the tables, an inadequate price was given for the post-obit securities, but no evidence of value was given by Colonel Ollney,) that the Court below, in directing the master to inquire what was the fair market price for the sums secured to be paid, having regard to the ages of Lord Aldborough and his father, the circumstances of the property, and the estate and interest of Lord Aldborough therein, and the other [222] circumstances in the pleadings mentioned, was a proper inquiry; and that the market value, not the value of the tables, was the proper criterion of value; and it was held that Colonel Ollney had a right to be repaid, with interest, the sum he had paid for the purchase of the annuity, though the annuity was voluntary, and not supported by a pecuniary consideration.

In and prior to the year 1825 Benjamin O'Neale Earl of Aldborough was tenant for life of certain estates in Ireland of the annual value of £8000, with remainder to the appellant Mason Gerard Earl of Aldborough in tail male.

In 1825 Benjamin O'Neale Earl of Aldborough was upwards of seventy-nine years of age; the appellant was baptized on the 22d July 1784, and was in December 1825 under the age of forty-two years.

The appellant, Lord Aldborough, from the year 1817 until the year 1826 had been confined within the rules of the King's Bench prison for debt, and had been from 1817 until the death of his father in very embarrassed circumstances.

In the years 1810 and 1812 he alienated an annuity of £500 granted to him by his father, the only income he had for the support of himself and his family, which in 1825 consisted of two sons and two daughters; and in and prior to the year 1825 judgments had been obtained against him to the amount of £160,000.

Under these circumstances in the month of December 1825 it was agreed between William Read King, as the solicitor of John Harvey Ollney, and Lucius Hook Robinson, as the agent of the appellant, with whom the application for a loan had originated, that £6000 should be advanced to the appellant by John Harvey Ollney, in [223] consideration of his being paid £12,000 three months after the death of the appellant's father, and of its being secured on the estates in Ireland.

An indenture, dated the 21st December 1825, was accordingly made and executed between the appellant, Lord Aldborough, of the one part, and John Harvey Ollney of the other part, whereby, in consideration of the sum of £6000 to the appellant paid by the said J. H. Ollney, the appellant covenanted that, in case he should survive his father, he would, in three months after his death, pay unto J. H. Ollney the sum of £12,000; and he thereby demised his estates in Ireland, of which he was seised or entitled at law or in equity, in possession, reversion, or remainder, unto the said J. H. Ollney, his executors, administrators, and assigns, from the day next before the day of the date of the said indenture, for the term of ninety-nine years, in trust, during so much of the said term as the said Benjamin O'Neale then Earl of Aldborough should live, for the said Benjamin O'Neale then Earl of Aldborough, and his assigns, and after his decease in trust for the person or persons for the time being entitled to the said hereditaments in remainder expectant on the determination of the said term, in case the said appellant, then Viscount Amiens, should depart this life in the lifetime of the said Benjamin O'Neale then Earl of Aldborough; or if the said appellant, then Viscount Amiens, should survive the said Benjamin O'Neale late Earl of Aldborough, then until default should be made in payment of the said sum of £12,000, or any part thereof, at the day or time appointed for payment thereof, in and by the covenant therein-before for that purpose contained; and upon further trust, that in case [224] the said appellant, then Viscount Amiens, should be living at the decease of the said Benjamin O'Neale late Earl of Aldborough, and default should be made in payment of the said sum of £12,000, or any part thereof, then that the said J. H. Ollney, his executors, administrators, or assigns, should at any time thereafter, by sale or mortgage of the said term, raise the said sum of £12,000, with interest for the same from the time the same became payable, together with the costs of the execution of the trusts.

And in the said indenture was contained a covenant by the appellant with the aforesaid J. H. Ollney, that he would, at Hilary Term then next, levy one or more fine or fines unto the said J. H. Ollney of the said hereditaments, and also, in case he the said appellant should survive the said Benjamin O'Neale late Earl of Aldborough, would suffer one or more common recovery or recoveries of the same hereditaments; and it was thereby agreed and declared, that the said fine or fines and recovery and recoveries should operate and enure to the use of the said J. H. Ollney, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for the residue which should then be to come of the said term of ninety-nine years, but upon and for the trusts thereby declared concerning the same, and after the expiration or sooner determination of the said term, to the use of the said appellant, then Viscount Amiens, his heirs and assigns for ever.

Shortly after the execution of the said indenture fines were duly levied, in the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, of the hereditaments comprised in the said indenture, in pursuance of the covenant.

The sum of £12,000, secured by the said indenture, was, in case of the appellant surviving his father, further [225] secured by the bond of the appellant, with warrants of attorney for entering up judgments both in England and Ireland against him; but by the said indenture it was agreed that the judgments should not be entered of record until the death of Benjamin O'Neale Earl of Aldborough.

William Read King on the 22d of December 1825 paid to the appellant the sum of £6000 in the following manner; £2500 in Bank of England notes, and £3500 in promissory notes of J. H. Ollney, William Read King having previously cashed one of the notes. On the 24th January 1826 the notes were paid, but no discount was paid to the appellant. In the month of July 1826 the appellant went to reside in France. In the month of July 1827 it was agreed between William Read King, as the solicitor of J. H. Ollney, and Lucius Hook Robinson, as the agent of the appellant, upon the proposal of L. H. Robinson, that John Harvey Ollney, in consideration of his being paid £20,000 after the death of the appellant's father, and being secured on the estates in Ireland, should advance £10,000 to the appellant, who was then resident in France. An indenture was accordingly executed, dated the 27th July 1827, between the appellant and J. H. Ollney, whereby it was agreed that the powers given over the estates to the said J. H. Ollney by the indenture of the 21st December 1825 might be exercised for securing the sum of £20,000 within three months after the decease of Benjamin O'Neale Earl of Aldborough, with interest from the time when the same should become payable, as well as the payment of the £12,000 with interest.

The sum of £20,000 was further secured by the bond [226] of the appellant, with warrants of attorney for entering up judgment against him.

On the 28th July 1827 the sum of £10,000 was paid by William Read King to the appellant in the following manner:—£6000 in Bank of England notes, and £4000 in eight bills of exchange of £500 each, payable at six months after date, and £100 for discount. The bills, when they became due, were paid to the appellant.

On the 28th December 1825 W. R. King, who prepared the deeds, received from Lucius Hook Robinson, for his expenses attending the loan of £6000, and for preparing, engrossing, and executing the indenture and bonds for the same, the sum of £285 in part payment of £300, which L. H. Robinson had previously agreed to pay him for such expenses, and on the 28th of July 1827 a sum of £500 for similar expenses in respect of the loan of £10,000, which L. H. Robinson had previously agreed to pay him. In neither case was any bill of costs made out by William Read King.

By indenture of the 28th July 1827, executed between the appellant of one part and L. H. Robinson of the other part, in consideration of the services performed by L. H. Robinson for the appellant, and for a nominal consideration, the appellant granted to L. H. Robinson an annuity of £200, issuable out of and charged upon the same estates, to hold the said annuity unto the said L. H. Robinson, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for the term of 99 years, to commence and be computed from the death of Benjamin O'Neale late Earl of Aldborough, if the appellant should be then living, and fully to be complete and ended if the said L. H. Robinson should so long live; and to be paid quarterly, the first payment to be made at the expiration of three calendar months [227] after the decease of the said Benjamin O'Neale late Earl of Aldborough, if the appellant should survive him; and in case of the death of the said L. H. Robinson on any other day of the year than one of the said quarterly days of payment, then also a proportionate part of the said annuity for the time which at the death of the said L. H. Robinson should have elapsed since either the day of the decease of the said Benjamin O'Neale late Earl of Aldborough, in case the said appellant should have survived him, or the then last quarterly day of payment, as the case might be; and by the said indenture the said appellant demised unto the said L. H. Robinson, his executors, administrators, and assigns, the hereditaments in Ireland for the term of 100 years, without impeachment of waste, upon certain trusts for securing the said annuity thereby granted.

By indentures of lease and release, bearing date respectively the 2d and 3d days of July 1828, the release being made between the said Benjamin O'Neale Earl of Aldborough of the first part, the appellant of the second part, Charles Doyne of the third part, William Jackson of the fourth part, James Montgomery Blair of the fifth part, Robert Saunders and the reverend John Charles Lloyd of the sixth part, and the said Charles Doyne and Thomas Rickards Watkins of the seventh part, and by certain common recoveries suffered in the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, the hereditaments and premises comprised in the several indentures before mentioned were discharged from the estate tail of the appellant, and were settled to the use that the said James Montgomery Blair, his executors and administrators, might, during the joint lives of the said Benjamin O'Neale Earl of Aldborough and the [228] appellant, receive, upon certain trusts, a yearly rent-charge of £700 to be issuing out of the said hereditaments; and subject thereto, to the use of the said Charles Doyne and Thomas Rickards Watkins, their executors, administrators, and assigns, for a term of years for securing the same; and subject thereto, to the use that after the decease of the said Benjamin O'Neale Earl of Aldborough the said Robert Saunders and John Charles Lloyd, their executors, administrators, and assigns, should receive upon certain trusts a rent-charge of £700, to be issuing out of the said hereditaments; and subject thereto, to such uses as the said Benjamin O'Neale late Earl of Aldborough and the said appellant should jointly appoint; and in default of such appointment, to the use of the said Benjamin O'Neale Earl of Aldborough and his assigns for his life, without impeachment of waste; and after his decease, to the use of the appellant, his heirs and assigns for ever.

In and about the month of March 1833 L. H. Robinson applied, on behalf of the appellant, to William Read King, as the solicitor of J. H. Olney, for a further loan of £5000.

By indentures of lease and release bearing date respectively the 1st and 2d days of March 1833, the release being made between the appellant of the first part, the said J. H. Olney of the second part, and Margaret Powell and the respondent William Charles King of the third part, in consideration of the sum of £5000, the appellant covenanted with the said J. H. Olney, his executors, administrators, and assigns, that he the appellant, his heirs, executors, or administrators, would, on the 2d day of August then next ensuing, pay unto the said J. H. Ollney, his executors, administrators, [229] or assigns, the sum of £5000 of lawful money of Great Britain, together with interest after the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, to be computed from the day of the date of the said indenture, without any deduction whatsoever; and by the said indentures, for the considerations aforesaid, the appellant conveyed unto the said Margaret Powell and William Charles King, and their heirs, all the hereditaments comprised in the indentures before mentioned, to the use of the said Margaret Powell and William Charles King, their heirs and assigns for ever, subject nevertheless to the life estate of the said Benjamin O'Neale Earl of Aldborough, and to the said indentures of the 21st day of December 1825 and the 27th day of July 1827 respectively, and to the annuity of £700, limited to the said Robert Saunders and John Charles Lloyd as aforesaid by the said indenture of the 3d day of July 1828, nevertheless upon the trusts following; that is to say, in case the said two several sums of £12,000 and £20,000, secured by the said herein-before stated indentures of the 21st day of December 1825 and the 27th day of July 1827 respectively, should either never become payable, or should, together with all interest thereon respectively, have been fully paid and satisfied to the said J. H. Ollney, his executors, administrators, or assigns, at the expiration of six calendar months next after the decease of the said Benjamin O'Neale Earl of Aldborough, and in case the said sum of £5000 and all interest thereon should have been fully paid and satisfied within six calendar months next after the decease of the said Benjamin O'Neale Earl of Aldborough, then in trust for the appellant, his heirs and assigns for ever; but in [230] case such several sums of £12,000 and £20,000, or any part thereof or any interest thereon, should not have been paid within six calendar months next after the decease of the said Benjamin O'Neale Earl of Aldborough, then upon trust to sell and dispose of the said hereditaments or any of them, or any part thereof, and out of the monies to arise from such sale or sales, and out of the rents and profits which should arise from the said hereditaments from and after the death of the said Benjamin O'Neale Earl of Aldborough, in the first place pay and satisfy all the costs, charges, and expenses attending or in anywise relating to the said sale or sales, and in the next place pay and satisfy unto the said J. H. Ollney, his executors, administrators, and assigns, all principal monies and interest which should be due in respect of the indentures of the 21st of December 1825 and 27th of July 1827, and of the present indenture; and should pay the ultimate surplus, which should remain after answering all the purposes aforesaid, unto the appellant, his heirs or assigns, for his or their own absolute use and benefit.

On the 2d of March 1833, £4700, part of the said sum of £5000, was paid to the appellant in Bank of England notes, and £300, the residue, was retained for the expenses of William Read King in effecting the loan.

By an indenture bearing date the 4th day of March 1833, and made between the said L. H. Robinson of the one part and the said J. H. Ollney of the other part, in consideration of the sum of £750 paid to the said L. H. Robinson, the said L. H. Robinson assigned to the said J. H. Ollney, his executors, administrators, [231] and assigns, the said annuity of £200 granted by the said indenture of the 28th July 1827, and the lands thereby demised.

Benjamin O'Neale Earl of Aldborough died on the 9th July 1833, and was succeeded in the earldom by the appellant.

On the 28th day of November 1833 J. H. Ollney filed his bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland against the appellant and others, stating the several deeds before mentioned, and praying that an account might be taken of what was due to the said J. H. Ollney for principal and interest in respect of the said three several sums of £12,000, £20,000, and £5000, and in respect of the said annuity of £200 so assigned to the said J. H. Ollney as aforesaid, and of all incumbrances affecting the said lands and premises or any of them prior to the demands of the said J. H. Ollney; and that, in default of payment of the sums which should be found due on such account, the appellant might be debarred and foreclosed from all equity of redemption in the said hereditaments respectively charged with the said principal sums and interest; and that the same might be sold; and that out of the proceeds of such sale or sales the sum which should be found due to the said J. H. Ollney upon taking such account, and such other charges as the Court should consider to be properly payable thereout, might be paid and satisfied; and that the residue of such proceeds, or a competent part thereof, might be properly secured for the purpose of answering the accruing payments of the said annuity; and that in the meantime a receiver might be appointed of the said lands and hereditaments, and might be directed to apply the rents towards satisfaction of the sums due or to become due to the said J. H. Ollney.

The appellant, by his answer to the bill, stated, amongst other things, that in the respective years 1810, 1812, 1814, and 1816 he charged his estates in Ireland with annuities amounting to £1324 or thereabouts, payable during the lives of himself and of other persons in the event of his surviving his father, and with divers principal sums of money amounting to upwards of £40,000, payable in the like event; and he alleged, that at the time when the said J. H. Ollney paid him the said sums of £6000 and £10,000 he was in great pecuniary distress, and was thereby induced to submit to unreasonable terms; and that the said L. H. Robinson was employed by the said J. H. Ollney, and not by the appellant, in negotiating the said transactions; and that the said indenture of the 21st of December 1825 was prepared by Mr. William Read King, the solicitor of the said J. H. Ollney, and was executed by the said appellant in prison, and without employing or consulting any solicitor; and that the said indenture was not in conformity to the agreement between the parties, for that the appellant had agreed to pay the said sum of £12,000 within twelve, and not within three, months after the death of his father if he survived him; and that the appellant, on the execution of the said indenture, paid to the said L. H. Robinson £600 as a bonus with the knowledge of the said J. H. Ollney; and that the said indenture of the 27th day of July 1827 was also prepared by the said W. R. King, and was executed by the appellant while abroad, and without consulting any solicitor; and that on the execution of the said last-mentioned indenture the appellant paid to the said [233] L. H. Robinson £1000 as a bonus, and also paid to the said W. R. King £500 for his charges, exclusive of stamps and other costs out of pocket, and travelling expenses; and that the said indenture of the 28th day of July 1827 was prepared by the said W. R. King with the privity of the said J. H. Ollney; and that by another deed the appellant appointed the said L. H. Robinson receiver of the rents of the said hereditaments after the death of the appellant's said father; and that in the year 1825 the appellant's father was upwards of eighty-three years of age, and was in a very infirm state of health, and that the appellant was then only forty-five years of age, and a very healthy person; and the appellant by his answer insisted that on payment of the said sums of £6000 and £10,000, with interest from the times of the said advances, the said indentures of the 21st of December 1825 and the 27th July 1827 ought to be set aside, and that this indenture of the 28th July 1827 ought to be set aside, without payment by the appellant of any sum whatsoever. And the appellant alleged, that out of the said sum of £5000 he paid to the said W. R. King £300 or thereabouts for the expenses of the said loan; however, he admitted that the said J. H. Ollney was entitled to the said sum of £5000 secured by the said indentures of the 1st and 2d March 1833, with interest thereon from the time of the advance thereof; and the said appellant submitted, that at the time of the said several transactions with the said J. H. Ollney the appellant was in the situation of an expectant heir, dealing with his expectancies, and that advantage had been taken by the said J. H. Ollney and his agent of the situation of appellant, and of his necessities and embarrassments; and that appellant [234] was entitled in equity to be relieved from the said bargain.

On or about the 19th February 1835 the appellant filed a cross bill in the said Court of Chancery in Ireland against the said J. H. Ollney, Margaret Powell, and W. C. King; and by such cross bill stated the original bill of the said John Harvey Ollney, and stated and charged the matters contained in his answer to the original bill, and charged that L. H. Robinson was the agent of J. H. Ollney.

And that the appellant executed the said indenture of the 28th day of July 1827 without receiving any consideration for the same, and that same was in fact only colorably granted to the said L. H. Robinson, he being in fact a mere trustee for the said J. H. Ollney, and it not being meant or intended that he should derive or receive any benefit or advantage from the same; and that no money consideration was in fact paid by the said J. H. Ollney to the said L. H. Robinson for the assignment of the said annuity; and that if any such was paid it was only colorably done, and that such consideration had been repaid to the said J. H. Ollney, or been allowed to him by the said L. H. Robinson in some collusive manner, for the purpose of enabling the said J. H. Ollney to insist that he was a purchaser of the said annuity from the said L. H. Robinson.

And appellant by his said cross bill charged that appellant, some time in the year 1828, joined with his father in suffering recoveries of all the said estates tail, which were re-settled to the use of appellant's said father for life, with an absolute vested remainder in fee to appellant, expectant on the decease of appellant's said father, who was then at the point of death; which [235] having come to the knowledge of the said J. H. Ollney or his agents, he, in order, if possible, to give validity to the said loans, proposed to lend appellant the sum of £5000 upon the terms of appellant securing the said principal sum and interest from the time of the said advances by a conveyance of all his said estate to trustees as therein-after mentioned; and appellant having agreed thereto, and being much in want of money, and pressing for the said advance, the said J. H. Ollney, or his agents, represented to appellant that it would be convenient for him to have all his demands included in one deed, and that appellant could not be in any way prejudiced by doing so; whereupon appellant, who had no professional man concerned for him on the said negotiation, and finding that the said J. H. Ollney would not lend the said £5000 unless he submitted to the said request, consented that the deed about to be executed should also include the said two sums of £12,000 and £20,000 in addition to the said sum of £5000; and appellant, then being under the pressure of absolute want, did thereupon execute the said indenture of the 2d of March 1833; and that the said deed was prepared by the said W. R. King, who, with the knowledge and consent of the said J. H. Ollney, retained or was paid the sum of £300 for preparing the same out of the said sum of £5000; and that appellant executed the said deed without ever having read over the same or any copy thereof, and in the kingdom of France, where appellant then resided, and from whence he could not depart, he being at the time indebted to several inhabitants of that country.

And the said appellant by his said cross bill prayed that the said indentures of the 21st day of December [236] 1825, the 27th day of July 1827, the 28th day of July 1827, and the said bonds dated the 21st day of December 1825 and the 27th day of July 1827 might be set aside as fraudulent and void, and be delivered up to be cancelled upon payment by appellant of the principal sum actually and bona fide paid to appellant on the execution of the said deeds, after deducting throughout all such sums as appellant by fraud or imposition was compelled to repay or allow the said L. H. Robinson and W. R. King at the desire and by the contrivance of the said J. H. Ollney; which principal sums, with the interest thereon from the time they were respectively advanced, appellant undertook to pay when fully ascertained; and that the said deed of annuity of the 28th of July 1827 might be set aside and delivered up to be cancelled, and that an account might be taken of the sum due for principal and interest on foot of the sums actually and bona fide received by appellant for his own use at the times of the said respective alleged advances, and also on account of the sum of £5000 so advanced to appellant on the 2d day of March 1833, with interest for the advance; and that the several deeds and securities so obtained by the said J. H. Ollney, if not altogether set aside, might be deemed to be securities only for the sum or sums of money which, upon the taking of the said account, should appear to be due on foot of the said respective advances made to appellant by the said J. H. Ollney; and that upon payment of such sums as should be found due on taking the said account, which appellant undertook to make, the said lands and hereditaments might be re-conveyed to appellant.

J. H. Ollney by his answer denied that L. H. Robinson was his agent, or that he had any knowledge of the [237] bonuses, or the sums paid or retained by William Read King for costs; and he further stated that he paid the sum of £750 to L. H. Robinson as the consideration for the assignment of the annuity of £200, and that no part thereof had ever been returned to him.

On the 16th January 1836 J. H. Ollney died, and the suits were revived against the respondents and his executors.

The said suits being at issue, witnesses were examined on both sides in each suit.

The respondents in the suits instituted against the appellant proved the execution of the several deeds and the payment of the consideration for them in the manner before mentioned, and that Lucius H. Robinson was the agent of the appellant. W. R. King proved the due execution by the appellant of the deeds and the consideration for the several deeds as before mentioned.

The appellant proved that the chief clerk to the Pelican Life Insurance Office, who had been accustomed to the calculating the value of contingent reversionary interests for twenty years, calculated that the sum of £8576 4s. 5d. was a fair and proper sum, in the month of December 1825, in respect of the sum of £6000 then paid, to be secured and payable and paid within three months after the death of a gentleman of seventy-nine years in the event of his being survived by a gentleman then forty-two years of age; and that the sum of £13,838 15s. 8d. was a fair and proper sum, in the month of July 1827, in respect of the sum of £10,000 then paid, to be secured and payable and paid three months after the death of a gentleman then aged forty-four years; and he calculated the same by the Carlisle table of mortality, and reckoning the interest of money at five per cent; but no [238] evidence was given on the part of the respondents to show what was the value of the post-obit bonds at the time they were purchased.

On the 7th of February 1837 the causes came on to be heard before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, when he decreed that it should be referred to the master to inquire, and report whether, under all the circumstances, the sum of £6000 paid by the said J. H. Ollney to the now Earl of Aldborough on the 21st day of December 1825 was a fair market price for the sum of £12,000, secured to be paid to the said J. H. Ollney by Mason Gerard Earl of Aldborough at the time and in the manner in the pleadings mentioned, taking into consideration the relative ages at the time of the said Earl of Aldborough and his father, Benjamin O'Neale Stratford then Earl of Aldborough, and the circumstances of the property whereon the said sum of £12,000 was intended to be secured, and the estate and interest of the said defendant, the Earl of Aldborough, therein, and the other circumstances in the pleadings mentioned relative to the said transaction; and his Lordship further ordered, that it should be referred to the said master also to inquire, and report whether, under all the circumstances, the sum of £10,000, paid by the said J. H. Ollney to the said Earl of Aldborough on the 27th day of July 1827, was a fair market price for the sum of £20,000, secured to be paid to the said J. H. Ollney by the said Mason Gerard now Earl of Aldborough at the time and in the manner in the pleadings mentioned, taking into consideration the relative ages at the time of the said Earl of Aldborough and his father, Benjamin O'Neale Stratford then Earl of Aldborough, and the circumstances of the property whereon the sum of [239] £20,000 was intended to be secured, and the estate and interest of the said defendant, the Earl of Aldborough, therein, and the other circumstances in the pleadings mentioned relative to the said transaction; and his Lordship further ordered, that the defendant, the Rev. John Christopher Lloyd, should have his costs against the plaintiffs, H. N. Tyre, Thomas Henney, and William Charles King; and his Lordship reserved the question, whether the said plaintiffs should have the same over against Lord Aldborough, and all further directions, until the return of the master's report, whereon such further order should be made as should be fit.

The respondents under this decree gave in evidence before the master, that the price given by J. H. Ollney to the appellant was the fair market value of the post-obit bonds. The appellant gave no evidence before the master as to their value, except what he had given upon the hearing of the cause.

On the 20th March 1838 the master made his report, and found, that under all the circumstances the sum of £6000, paid by the said J. H. Ollney to the said appellant on the 21st of December 1825, was a fair market price for the sum of £12,000 secured to be paid to the said J. H. Ollney by the said appellant at the time and in the manner in the pleadings mentioned; and that the sum of £10,000, paid by the said J. H. Ollney to the appellant on the 27th day of July 1827, was a fair market price for the sum of £20,000 secured to be paid to him by the said J. H. Ollney at the time and in the manner in the pleadings mentioned.

The said appellant caused objections to be taken to the draft of the said master's report, which the master [240] overruled, and the said appellant did not file any exceptions to the said report.

The said causes came on for hearing before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland on report and merits, and for further directions, on the 26th and 27th days of April 1838, when it was decreed that the said report should stand confirmed; and that the said two sums of £12,000 and £20,000, secured by the deeds dated respectively the 21st day of December 1825 and the 27th day of July 1827, and interest thereon respectively at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum from the 10th day of October 1833 until paid, were charges on the lands and premises in the pleadings mentioned: and it was further decreed that the said respondents were entitled thereto: and it was further decreed, that the said respondents were also entitled to the sum of £5000, secured by the deed bearing date the 2d day of March 1833, in the pleadings also mentioned, with interest thereon at the rate of £6 per cent. per annum, to be computed from the said 2d day of March 1833 until paid, and that the same was well charged on the said lands and premises: and it was further decreed, that the said respondents were not entitled to the annuity of £200 a year in the pleadings mentioned, granted by the said deed of annuity bearing date the 28th day of July 1827, and assigned to the said J. H. Ollney, deceased, by deed bearing date the 4th day of March 1833; but that the said deeds were only to stand as security for the sum of £750, being the consideration money paid by the said J. H. Ollney to L. H. Robinson for the purchase of the said annuity, with interest thereon from the said 4th day of March 1833, at the rate of £5 per cent. [241] per annum, until paid; and that the said sum of £750 and interest were well charged on the said lands and premises in the pleadings mentioned, and in the same priority as the said annuity: and it was further decreed, that the respondents bill in the original cause should stand dismissed without costs, so far as the same sought to establish the same annuity of £200 per annum: and it was further ordered that it should be and it was thereby referred to the master in the cause, to take an account of what was due to the plaintiffs in the first cause for principal and interest in respect of the aforesaid sums of £12,000, £20,000, £5000, and £750, and also to take an account of all incumbrances prior to the said plaintiffs demands affecting the estate of the appellant in the pleadings mentioned: And it was further decreed, that the defendant, the Rev. John Christopher Lloyd, should be struck out of the bill in the first cause, and that the plaintiffs in the first cause should have, as part of their costs in the said first cause, the costs which, by the decretal order of the 7th day of February 1837, they were directed to pay to the said Rev. John Christopher Lloyd: and it was further decreed, that the said respondents should have the costs as plaintiffs in the said first cause, and as defendants in the said second cause, including the costs of the reference under the said decretal order of the 7th day of February 1837, as against the appellant and the lands and premises in the pleadings mentioned: and the consideration of all further directions was reserved.

From the decree of the 27th day of April 1838 Mason Gerard Earl of Aldborough appealed.

[242] Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Knight Bruce for the Appellant.—The appellant was in great pecuniary difficulties, and confined in the King's Bench, when he was obliged to raise £6000 upon post-obit bonds. The £6000 was paid, £2000 in cash and £4000 in promissory notes, upon which no discount was allowed; £300 was paid to Mr. King, but no bill of costs was made out. Lord Aldborough procured his discharge from prison by this advance. In respect of the loan of £10,000, £500 was paid to Mr. Read King, the solicitor, for effecting the loan. The onus lay upon the purchaser to show that a proper value was given for the expectancies, Davis v. Duke of Marlborough (2 Swanston, 139), but no evidence was given by him as to the value. The cause was ripe for decision, and the Court ought to have made a decree at the hearing, and not have directed any inquiries. Our evidence shows an enormous disproportion between the sum given and what ought to have been given for the expectancies. In Gowland v. De Faria (17 Vesey, 20) a decree was made upon the calculated value, and not on the marketable value, of a reversion, and that judgment was approved of in Lord Portmore v. Taylor (4 Simons, 210). The principle laid down in Headen v. Rosher (1 M'Clel. and You. 89) by Sir William Alexander, that the calculated value is not the proper criterion of value, is improper.

The form of inquiries directing the other circumstances in the pleadings mentioned to be inquired into is wrong. What does it mean? The annuity granted by the appellant, having no consideration to support it, cannot stand; the Court below has not sustained it, L. H. Robinson could not have enforced it, and the assignee [243] ought not to stand in a better situation than the original grantee.

The Attorney General and Mr. Jacob for the Respondents.—The market value is the only proper criterion of value; market value in no instance reaches the value of the tables. Sir Anthony Hart, in Scott v. Dunbar (Moll. 458), disapproved of Gowland v. De Faria. In Headen v. Rosher Sir William Alexander refused to set aside a sale, though the value was inconsistent with the tables. In Potts v. Curtis (1 Young, 543) the market value prevailed over the value estimated by the tables; so Wardle v. Carter (7 Simons, 490); and in Headen v. Rosher the Court refused to set aside a sale of a reversionary interest, though inconsistent with the values calculated by the tables. It is said the onus lies upon the purchaser of proving the value; he proved the whole consideration paid, and the evidence brought forward on the part of the appellant might prove there was no inadequacy; sale by auction admits the principle of market value, Shelley v. Nash (3 Madd. 232), except where the auction is colourable, Fox v. Wright (6 Madd. 111). All the circumstances must be taken into consideration: that the appellant was tenant in tail in remainder; that there were incumbrances upon the estate; that, not having the legal estate or the deeds, the purchaser could not know the amount of the charges; if the appellant had refused to suffer a recovery, the estate could not have been liable; no circumstances were inquired into before the master, except what was the value to be got in the market. With regard to the [244] annuity, there seems no reason why it should have been set aside; it was good against the grantor; but at any rate it was good in the hands of a purchaser for a valuable consideration, George v. Milbanke (9 Vesey, 190).

Mr. Pemberton in reply.—This was a bill by a purchaser to enforce his demand; it was incumbent upon him to prove the value, Kendall v. Beckett (2 Russell and Mylne, 88), Bawtree v. Watson (3 Mylne and Keen, 339). The protection which the Court affords to expectant heirs is very different from a naked reversion. The appellant was in very distressed circumstances; £1300 life annuities and £40,000 charged upon the estate. The consideration is not proved as stated; promissory notes and bills of exchange are very different from hard cash; many contingencies are not the subject of valuation, Baker v. Bent (2 Russell and Mylne, 224), Drought v. Eustace (1 Molloy, 328). It may be said we had no right to take a chance of the inquiry; we had a right so to do; a purchaser has nothing to do but file his bill, go into no evidence, and then have an inquiry in the master's office.

Lord Chancellor.—I must have copies of the bill; there are no copies in the printed cases.

Lord Chancellor (15th June).—In this case I was desirous, before I stated any opinion I had formed on the argument, to have an opportunity of looking into the pleadings, particularly with respect to the annuity of £800 a year.

[245] The cause came on on a bill and cross bill, the object of the cross bill being to set aside certain post-obit securities given by the present Lord Aldborough during the lifetime of his father. When the cause came on before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, a reference was made to the master to inquire "Whether, under all the circumstances, the sum of £6000 paid by Ollney to the now Earl of Aldborough was a fair market price for the sum of £12,000 secured to Ollney at the time and in the manner in the pleadings mentioned, taking into consideration the relative ages at the time of the said Earl of Aldborough and his father Benjamin O'Neale Stratford then Earl of Aldborough, and the circumstances of the property whereon the said sum of £12,000 was intended to be secured, and the estate and interest of the defendant the Earl of Aldborough therein, and the other circumstances in the pleadings mentioned relative to the said transaction."

Upon this reference, made on the 7th day of February 1837, the master made his report, by which he found that, under all the circumstances, the sum of £6000 paid by Ollney on the 21st of December 1825 was a fair market price for the sum of £12,000 secured to be paid to Ollney at the time and in the manner in the pleadings mentioned. There was a similar finding with respect to the sum of £10,000.

To this report no exceptions were taken. It was at one time supposed, that there was some informality in the manner in which the report was confirmed; that supposition was removed, and there appears now to be no irregularity in the mode in which that report was dealt with upon the decree for further directions. [246] The case, therefore, stands upon the report not complained of, establishing the fact that with regard to those two sums, the sum paid was, under all the circumstances of the case, a fair price for the sum received by Lord Aldborough in his then situation of expectant heir.

Two grounds of objection have been taken to the course adopted by the Court of Chancery in Ireland. The first is, that that finding did not justify the decree upon further directions, by which that security was enforced against the estates charged with it; the other is, that, however that might be, yet that upon the original decree, inasmuch as it was not then proved that that was a fair price, it was the duty of the Court to have granted the relief prayed by the cross bill.

The second ground I propose to dispose of and to state my opinion upon first,—and I think this House will not be disposed to give much weight to that objection. The party takes the inquiry, and does not complain of the decree directing the inquiry until after the result of that inquiry is ascertained to be against him. Although, undoubtedly, it is competent to him to complain of the original decree, it is not a complaint to which this House will be very ready to listen. If he can show that there was any error in that decree, he is not precluded from stating his complaint; but in a matter which is purely matter of discretion, where the Court thinks it has not sufficient information to enable it to administer justice between the parties, and either directs an issue or directs an inquiry for the purpose of better ascertaining the facts,—when your Lordships find, upon that inquiry and that investigation, that the facts [247] lead to a conclusion against the plaintiff, this House will not be much disposed to set aside the whole proceeding, because the Court exercised the discretion of directing that inquiry in order to ascertain those facts.

I conceive it to be quite competent to the Court, and that the Court exercised a very sound discretion in directing that inquiry. It appears to be established by several cases that where a party deals with an expectant heir, the onus is upon him to show that he gave a fair price for that which he purchased. It does not from that proposition follow that he is bound to establish it in a different way from that in which it is competent to any other suitor to establish any fact or facts upon which his cause rests; and if, when the cause comes to a hearing, the Court finds that it requires further inquiry to ascertain the facts necessary for the due decision of the case, that is a matter so entirely in the discretion of the Court, that a complaint resting upon that ground is not one to which this house would very readily yield.

Now, in this case, I think I shall in a few words satisfy your Lordships that there was no evidence to enable the Court satisfactorily to dispose of the question between the parties; the Court, therefore, directed an inquiry, and the result of that inquiry is what I have stated. That, however, leaves entirely open the question whether the result of the inquiry found by the master entitled the party claiming the benefit of the security to the benefit of a decree to enforce it, or whether it would merely have entitled the party seeking to have that transaction set aside, to have a decree for that purpose.

[248] In order to support the proposition set up on the part of Lord Aldborough, who complains of these securities, and seeks to have them set aside, it was argued that in the case of Gowland v. De Faria this proposition had been established. There are two propositions: one which was established, and the other supposed to be established in that case; the one said to be established was, that in a transaction with an expectant heir it was necessary for the party seeking the benefit of that transaction to show that he gave a fair price; but that proposition has been the subject of much observation, undoubtedly, since that decision took place, and it has been considered as interfering a good deal with that proper discretion which persons who are capable, according to the law of this country, of disposing of their own property, ought to be at liberty to exercise. At the same time it does establish a rule which has the effect of protecting persons who are, generally speaking, very much in need of protection. Of the policy of that rule it is not my purpose to say any thing; that rule has been established in the case of Gowland v. De Faria, and has been recognized since.

But another proposition has been supposed to be established by the case of Gowland v. De Faria, which is, that in transactions of this sort the Court has only to look at the value of the reversionary interest calculated according to the tables; that is to say, how much of the value of the property is to be deducted on account of its being a postponed interest, postponed by the chance of the duration of another life, and that that is capable of being reduced by calculation to what is considered a fair induction with reference to the duration of the life on which it is dependent.

[249] I do not find any such proposition established by Sir William Grant in that case. Sir William Alexander, in the case before him of Headen v. Rosher, in 1st McClelland and Young, 89, and Lord Lyndhurst again, in the case of Potts v. Curtis in 1st Young, 543, entertained the same opinion; and upon looking at the language of Sir William Grant it does appear to me that that rule is not at all to be extracted from it. In that case there was no evidence but that of the actuaries, and the evidence of the actuaries proved that the sum given was not the marketable value of the reversion. Sir William Grant, in observing upon the case, states the evidence before him, namely, that of the actuaries, and says there is no other evidence in the case, and he then proceeds upon that evidence, there being no other. Now, the only observation I will make upon that case is, that one may suppose it would have been a more wholesome course to have adopted, seeing that the evidence was only the evidence of the actuaries, and the Court being of opinion that that was not evidence which ought to be conclusive in a case of that description between the parties; I say it would seem to have been better to have adopted some course for the purpose of ascertaining more correctly the value, in the sense in which that term is to be used in inquiries of that kind. Sir William Grant, however, did not adopt that course, and he decided it upon the only evidence he had, that only evidence being to the effect that an inadequate consideration had been given. It is, therefore, not an expression of opinion by Sir William Grant, that that is a rule that ought to be adopted; it is only a dealing with that case, with reference to its own particular circumstances.

[250] That has been disapproved of by subsequent decisions of the highest authority. It was disapproved of by Sir William Alexander, in a judgment the reasons of which are very conclusive to show the soundness of the conclusion at which he arrived. It was also objected to and disapproved of by Lord Lyndhurst, in the case to which I have referred; and if your Lordships consider what the effect of that rule would be,—how inapplicable it is to the great mass of cases,—how little calculated it is to lead to a right conclusion, and how much it must interfere with the right of disposing of property, I am sure this House will not hesitate in preferring the rule which has been established in subsequent cases to that which has been supposed to be established in the case of Gowland v. De Faria.

It is sufficient to say, that the establishment of that rule would make it impossible for an expectant heir to dispose of his interest at all; that, I apprehend, is quite a sufficient objection. It is a rule also, which, as a general rule, being calculated on the result of a great mass of cases, must apply with great injustice in a great variety of individual cases. The lives are supposed to be of average value; but the life in question may be an extraordinarily good or an extraordinarily bad life,—one which is likely to last beyond the usual time, or the contrary; how then can it be right to establish a rule not applicable to the particular case, but applying to a mass of cases collected together, and to make that rule govern an individual case to which it may not at all apply?

I will not go further into my reasons for not adhering to that supposed rule. The matter having been very fully and very ably discussed by Sir William Alexander and [251] by Lord Lyndhurst, it appears unnecessary further to discuss it here than to say, that I entirely concur in the reasons of those two very learned judges, and I do not think that the rule supposed to be extracted from Gowland v. De Faria is a rule which ought to be laid down.

Then, if that be so, in what position does the present case stand? Taking the report as establishing the fact, it is a bill to set aside these transactions, it being established as a fact that the transactions are fair and proper transactions, regard being had to all the circumstances of the case. I will only observe, that the cases of Shelly v. Nash, in 3d Maddox, 232, and the case of Baker v. Bent, in 1st Russell and Mylne, 224, although they are not expressly to the same point, yet they establish this proposition; namely, that the market price is the thing to be looked at; for if the market price is not the thing to be looked at, how is it established that a sale by auction is within the rule? A sale by auction is a means of ascertaining the market price; it is a means of ascertaining, as nearly as it can be ascertained, that that sum which it will fetch in the market is the sum which the thing is worth, and therefore negatives the imputation of fraud.

The case, therefore, stands upon the fact being established, that the sum given was the fair market price. Now, taking that as a fact which is established, and which therefore constitutes a proposition fixed between the parties, that the party buying gave the fair market price under all the circumstances,—that that is the proposition your Lordships have to decide, and which the Court of Chancery in Ireland had to decide,—[252] it is impossible that the case on the part of the appellant can be maintained for a moment, unless the doctrine be established which is supposed to be extracted from Gowland v. De Faria. This transaction now cannot be any further questioned. It appears to me to be established that the fair market price was given for these bonds under all the circumstances of the case, regard being had to all the facts which are referred to in the pleadings; all of which were material in order to fix the price that was fair and proper for Mr. Ollney to give to Lord Aldborough under the circumstances. I apprehend, therefore, that, as soon as it is established that the doctrine supposed to be extracted from Gowland v. De Faria is not the doctrine of a court of equity, and as soon as it appears that the parties are precluded from disputing the finding of the master, the question is in substance disposed of, as far as relates to these two sums of £6000 and £12,000.

One other part of the case only remains, and that is a point upon which I was desirous of investigating the pleadings, which unfortunately, upon that which is the only part of the case involving any difficulty, are not printed in the papers. There was an annuity given, and a deed, not of the same date, but alleged to have been part of the same transaction, but on the day after the grant of one of these securities;—it is an annuity given to Mr. Robinson, and at a subsequent period, that is to say, in the year 1833 (the grant of the annuity being in 1828) Mr. Ollney, the grantee of the other securities, is alleged to have purchased from Mr. Robinson this annuity for £750. The case made by the bill is, that it was a mere fiction, in order to give an [253] appearance of validity to the transaction which did not in fact belong to it; that Mr. Robinson was only a trustee or agent for Mr. Ollney; that it was intended as an additional benefit to Mr. Ollney. The bill stated that Mr. Robinson was in substance the agent and attorney for Mr. Ollney, not for Lord Aldborough, and that his name was used for the purpose of securing this benefit to Mr. Ollney; that the £750 either was not paid at all or merely colourably paid.

That case has entirely failed. It is established that Mr. Robinson was the attorney for Lord Aldborough, and it is established that the annuity was granted for Mr. Robinson's benefit in the first instance, and that Mr. Ollney paid £750 to Mr. Robinson. Now the bill does not impeach the transaction as a transaction in which an attorney has secured improperly a benefit to himself from his client; it does not attack it upon that ground at all. The grounds upon which it is impeached, and upon which it is sought to take the benefit of that purchase from Mr. Ollney, have entirely failed. I may assume that this is not affected at all with fraud, but that it was a voluntary annuity, because that is admitted by the other party; that is to say, voluntary, so far that there was no money consideration paid for it. Whether it was earned by any services, we do not know; but we know that it was not the subject of a money transaction nor of purchase between Mr. Robinson and Lord Aldborough. That was a transaction in 1828. Five years afterwards, in 1833, (nothing in the meantime being done for the purpose of questioning the security, it being a security under the hand of Lord Aldborough,) Mr. Ollney purchased it, and paid £750 [254] for it; and the decree does confer this benefit on Lord Aldborough, that it sets aside the transaction, but it requires him to repay the £750 and interest which had been paid by Mr. Ollney; and as against him the decree is to operate by setting aside the annuity which he had purchased.

Now, when we consider that the bill does not attack the annuity upon any other ground than want of consideration, except that imputed combination between Mr. Robinson and Mr. Ollney, which is not established in fact, but which is disproved, I think that Lord Aldborough has got as much benefit from the court of equity in Ireland as he could reasonably expect, because he has the benefit of that transaction being set aside. He has not got the benefit of that transaction being set aside without repaying the money actually paid by Mr. Olney for the purchase; and I apprehend that if the bill had impeached the transaction in a different and more correct mode than this, he never could have had ground, upon the facts as they stand here, to have got any decree to set aside that transaction without repaying the party who had actually paid for it. If a man puts into the hands of another the means of obtaining money from a third person, he never can be enabled to obtain a decree to get rid of that transaction arising out of the security which he has entrusted to another, and of which he (the party complaining) was himself the author.

That has been established in cases of voluntary deeds. In the case of George v. Milbanke, in 9th Vesey, 196, Lord Eldon established this: that even as against creditors, where the party had been the author of a [255] voluntary deed, and that voluntary deed had been used by the holder of it for the purpose of either raising money upon it or of sale, that even a creditor in the case of bankruptcy could not get it back without repaying the money that had been paid for it; but here the application is made by the author of this, which is a voluntary deed, to deprive the party of the benefit he is to derive under it. Now, a voluntary deed is not impeachable upon those grounds upon which we know that many transactions between man and man are set aside. Here the author of a voluntary security comes into a court of equity, and asks the court to set aside the transaction against the party who has purchased the benefit conferred by it without paying him that which he has paid himself. I think that the equity which the Court of Chancery in Ireland had administered in that respect is perfectly correct, and that the way in which the appellant has put his case is not sustainable against the decree against which he has complained.

Under all these circumstances, therefore, it appears to me that the Court of Chancery was quite justified in the decree which it has made, and that the appellant has failed in making out his case. I would propose, therefore, to affirm the decree below with costs.

Lord Brougham.—I entirely agree with the view which my noble and learned friend has taken in both parts of this case, the latter part being the only part about which any doubt could exist. I also agree with him that Lord Aldborough has had quite as much benefit as he could have expected in the Court below. With respect to what has been said about the case of Gowland v. De Faria, and the doctrine supposed to be laid [256] down in that case, two questions might arise: the first is, whether the doctrine really exists in that case which has been supposed there to exist. Upon that point I have some doubt; but if that doctrine is justly imputed to the case of Gowland v. De Faria, I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend in the view which he takes, and which was taken by Lord Lyndhurst in the case of Potts v. Curtis, that that doctrine, if it exists at all in that case, is now to be considered as over-ruled. It certainly never could have been the intention of the rule, with respect to expectant heirs dealing with a purchaser, that they should not have the power of dealing at all with their reversion. The rule laid down by the courts has certainly made that dealing very difficult; it has discouraged that dealing, for the purpose of protecting an expectant heir; it has made that discouragement very great indeed. But unless it is intended to say that the practical object of the rule was what undoubtedly in effect it would be were the doctrine supposed to exist in Gowland v. De Faria still maintained,—unless it is meant to say that they shall practically never dispose of their reversion at all, it appears to me clearly impossible to maintain that supposed doctrine.

I think in many cases such a rule would be any thing rather than a protection to an expectant heir. Upon the whole, therefore, I entirely agree with the view taken by my noble and learned friend; the matter never, indeed, admitted of any considerable doubt; it was only with respect to the point I first mentioned, and which was last dealt with by my noble and learned friend, that the case stood over for consideration.

[257] Ordered, That the said petition and appeal be dismissed this House, and that the decrees therein complained of be affirmed; and it is further ordered, that the appellant do pay or cause to be paid to the said respondents the costs incurred in respect of the said appeal.

FROM THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

HER MOST FAITHFUL MAJESTY DONNA MARIA THE SECOND, Queen of Portugal and the Algarves,—Appellant; Sir RICHARD CARR GLYN, Baronet, THOMAS HALLIFAX, RICHARD PLUMPTRE GLYN, CHARLES MILLS, and GEORGE CARR GLYN,—Respondents [27th February 1837 and 2d July 1840].

[Mews' Dig. v. 699, 876, 880; xi. 46. S.C. 7 Cl. and F. 466; and, in Court below, sub nom. Glyn v. Soares, 1 Y. and C. 644, 5 L.J. Ex. Eq. 49. Followed in Manchester Fire Insurance Co. v. Wykes, 1875, 33 L.T. N.S. 145.]

Manoel Joaquim Soares, being indorsee of certain bills of exchange, brings an action against Messrs. Glyn and Co. on the bills, as the acceptors thereof. Messrs. Glyn and Co. file a bill of discovery in aid of their defence to the action, and get an injunction in the meantime against M. J. Soares, the plaintiff at law, and the Queen of Portugal, stating that the plaintiff at law is the mere agent of the Queen of Portugal; that he has no interest therein; that neither of them gave any consideration for the same; that the Queen of Portugal, by bringing the action in her agent's instead of her own name, and by attempting to appropriate to her own use the produce of the bills, commits a fraud upon the defendants. Upon a demurrer filed by the Queen of Portugal to the bill,—demurrer allowed, the Queen of Portugal not being a party to the record at law, reversing the judgment of the Court of Exchequer; the Lord Chancellor, Lord Lyndhurst, and Lord Brougham concurring, Lord Wynford dissentiente.

[259] On the 14th of November 1835 the respondents filed their bill of complaint against Manoel Joaquim Soares and the appellant, stating that they carried on in copartnership together the business of bankers in London, under the firm of Sir Richard Carr Glyn, Mills, Hallifax, and Company: that in the beginning of the month of December 1829, and thenceforward down to and in the first six months of the year 1833, and for some time afterwards, Don Miguel was de facto King of Portugal, and by himself and his agents exercised the government of the country: that in the early part of the year 1833 Don Miguel had occasion to raise a loan for the exigencies of the government, and that such loan was to be raised upon the security of certain scrip or bonds issued under the authority of Don Miguel and his government; and that the said government was to engage to pay to the holders of such bonds or scrip the sums therein mentioned within a period therein mentioned, and to pay interest thereon half-yearly at the rate therein mentioned; and that in March 1833 Messrs. Outrequin and Jauge, bankers in Paris, entered into an agreement with Don Miguel and his government for negotiating and raising such loan in Paris, and for remitting the same when raised to the treasurer of the royal treasury of Portugal, appointed by Don Miguel and his government, to be applied by such treasurer for the use of Don Miguel and his government: that the bonds were duly received by Messrs. Outrequin and Jauge as the agents of Don Miguel and his government, and Messrs. Outrequin and Jauge, between the 1st of March and the 30th of June 1833, subscribed and advanced, and procured to be subscribed and advanced by various other persons in [260] Paris and elsewhere, considerable sums of money upon the security of the bonds, and remitted a great part of the amount so raised and subscribed to the treasurer of the royal treasury of Portugal appointed by Don Miguel and his government in bills of exchange, among which were six bills of exchange accepted by the respondents: that for some time previous to the 1st of January 1833, and down to the 7th of August 1833, Donna Maria Da Gloria, who now bears the title of Queen of Portugal, claimed to be Queen of Portugal, and her father Don Pedro Duke of Braganza, in her name and on her behalf, occupied Oporto in Portugal with the adjacent districts, and loans were raised in her name, and fleets and armies were maintained in her name: that Donna Maria the second alleged that Don Miguel was an usurper, and could not by any acts or contracts bind the nation or crown of Portugal, or the revenues thereof: that she repudiated the loan, and declared the same as well as the bonds null and void: that the object of the loan was to furnish Don Miguel and his government with the means of more effectually resisting the military operations of Donna Maria, and of supporting and maintaining his government: that the bills so remitted on account of the loan were remitted to Joaquim Fernandez Couto, and were received by him as the treasurer of the royal treasury of Portugal duly appointed by Don Miguel: that Baron D'Est, residing at Paris, drew upon the respondents, the bankers, six bills of exchange, for the sums of £650, £450, £550, £750, £450, and £550, payable to the order of Messrs. Outrequin and Jauge: that Baron D'Est, according to the custom of merchants, made each of the said bills in two parts; and by the [261] second of such parts required the respondents, the bankers, to pay the amount thereof to Messrs. Outrequin and Jauge, the first not being paid: that the said Baron D'Est, on or shortly after the 4th of June 1833, delivered the said several parts of the four first-mentioned bills to the said Messrs. Outrequin and Jauge, and on or shortly after the 7th of June 1833 he delivered the said several parts of the two lastly-mentioned bills of that date to the said Messrs. Outrequin and Jauge: that the said six bills were intended to be remitted as parts of the said loan: that the said Messrs. Outrequin and Jauge forwarded the first parts to Gower and Co., their agents in London, to present the same for acceptance, and to hold the same when accepted for the holders or endorsees of the second parts: that the first parts of the said bills were presented in due course by Gower and Co., and were accepted by the respondents: that the respondents were not subscribers to the said loan, but accepted the said bills in the course of their business as bankers on the account and by the directions of Edward Richardson, who kept an account with them as bankers; and that they had not any interest in the said bills, save as such acceptors on behalf of Edward Richardson: that in filing the bill they merely act as the agents of Edward Richardson, who has the sole management of the defence to the action and of this suit: that Messrs. Outrequin and Jauge duly endorsed each of the second parts of the said bills as follows:—"Pay to the order of the treasurer general of the royal treasury of Portugal value in account of the negotiation of the royal loan of Portugal:" that Messrs. Outrequin and Jauge transmitted the said bills so endorsed to the office of the [262] royal treasury of Portugal at Lisbon, where the same were duly received by Joaquim Fernandez Couto, the treasurer of the royal treasury of Portugal appointed by Don Miguel: that Joaquim Fernandez Couto never executed the office of treasurer except under the authority of Don Miguel, and that he had no power to apply, dispose of, or negotiate any of the said bills so remitted to him except under the directions of the said Don Miguel, or of the ministers who acted as the agents of Don Miguel: that no consideration was given for the said bills by the government of Portugal except some of the bonds issued by Outrequin and Jauge: that in consequence of the misfortunes which had attended the armies and fleet of Don Miguel, and the approach of a hostile army near to Lisbon, the Duke of Cadaval, who commanded in Lisbon for Don Miguel and his government, abandoned that city in the night between the 23d and 24th of July; and on the 24th of July the said Donna Maria was proclaimed Queen of Portugal by the title of Donna Maria the second.

That in July 1833 Don Pedro and his adherents, acting on behalf of Donna Maria, took possession of Lisbon, and assumed the functions of government on behalf of Donna Maria; which government was founded on the destruction of the government of Don Miguel: that Don Pedro and his adherents seized and took possession of the second parts of the said bills of exchange and other bills on behalf of Donna Maria, and caused them to be endorsed to Manoel Joaquim Soares; and such endorsement of each of the second parts of the said bills purported to be signed by Joaquim Fernandez Couto; and such endorsements were dated the 7th of August 1833, which was after Joaquim Fer-[263]-nandez Couto had ceased to be treasurer of the said royal treasury of Portugal on behalf of Don Miguel: that Joaquim Fernandez Couto had no authority to endorse the same for any purpose except for the purpose of their being applied for the service of the said Don Miguel and his government: that on or about the 7th of August 1833 the agents of Donna Maria remitted the said second parts of the said six several bills of exchange to Manoel Joaquim Soares, with directions to and in order that he might receive the same on behalf and for the use of the said Donna Maria and her government, and might remit the proceeds thereof to her or her government.

That in the year 1834 Don Miguel was obliged to quit Portugal, and Donna Maria remained in possession of the throne of Portugal: that the loan so raised and the bonds or scrip so issued as aforesaid were not recognized or repaid, or agreed to be recognized or repaid, by or on behalf of Donna Maria or her government; but, on the contrary thereof, Donna Maria and those who act in her name pretend that the said bonds and scrip of the said government are void, and not binding on the kingdom of Portugal, and they have repudiated the same, and declared the same to be null and void: that neither the said Donna Maria nor her government has given any valuable consideration for the said bills of exchange: that the possession of the second parts of the said six bills was obtained by Donna Maria, and the persons acting on her behalf, by fraud, accident, or violence; and they did not nor did any of them thereby acquire any beneficial interest in or any title to any of the said bills of exchange: that as soon as the said Messrs. Outrequin and [264] Jauge were informed that the said bills of exchange had fallen into the hands of the government of the said Donna Maria, and the functionaries who were acting under her authority, they gave instructions to Gower and Co. not to deliver up the first parts of the said bills of exchange, and not to pay them to the said Donna Maria or her government, or to any person claiming title from them.

That, besides the said six bills, the said Baron D'Este drew upon respondents another bill in two parts, dated the 2d of June 1833, for the sum of £600, and endorsed the same to the order of Messrs. Outrequin and Jauge, who remitted the first part of the said bill to Gower and Co., who procured the same to be accepted by the respondents; and Messrs. Outrequin and Jauge endorsed the second part of the last-mentioned bill, in the same manner as the second parts of the said six bills were endorsed to the treasurer of the royal treasury of Portugal, value in account of the negotiation of the royal loan of Portugal, and remitted the same to the royal treasurer of Portugal at Lisbon on account of the said loan; and the second part of the last-mentioned bill came into the hands of Donna Maria or her agents, when they took possession of Lisbon, by the same means and under the same circumstances by and under which the first-mentioned six bills came into her or their hands; and they caused the same to be endorsed by Joaquim Fernandez Couto to Manoel Joaquim Soares, who obtained possession of the first part, and presented the same for payment to the respondents; and to such application the respondents gave the following answer, which appears on the protest:—"This bill being by the endorsement of Messrs. Outrequin [265] and Jauge made payable, not to an individual, but to a public officer, whose name does not appear, and circumstances having transpired which give the acceptors reason to doubt whether the person who has taken upon himself to endorse it is the person entitled by Messrs. Outrequin and Jauge, the acceptors, though ready and willing to pay the amount, require before doing so satisfactory evidence of the right of Couto to endorse this bill as the treasurer general of Portugal, mentioned in Messrs. Outrequin and Jauge's endorsement:" that thereupon Manoel Joaquim Soares instituted proceedings in the Tribunal of Commerce at Paris on the said last-mentioned bill against the said Baron D'Este and the said Messrs. Outrequin and Jauge, and also against divers other persons on others of the said bills which had been so remitted by Messrs. Outrequin and Jauge as aforesaid: that the claim of Manoel Joaquim Soares was resisted in the said suit, on the ground that he had no title to the said bill; and on the 23d of January 1834 the said Tribunal of Commerce gave judgment against Manoel Joaquim Soares, and condemned him in costs, on the ground that he was not the real and bona fide holder of the bills in question, and that Soares had not given any consideration for the bills, and that they were not his property.

That on the 19th day of June Donna Maria caused an action to be commenced in the name of Manoel Joaquim Soares against the respondents on the bills of exchange, in the Court of King's Bench, to recover what is due in respect of the said six bills of exchange, pretending that he was a holder of the bills for valuable [266] consideration; whereas the respondents insisted that he was a mere agent of Donna Maria or her government, and had no interest in the bills of exchange.

The bill charged that the action was brought solely for the benefit of the Queen of Portugal, and was in truth her action: that she had in her possession divers documents by which it would appear that the respondents were not liable upon the bills of exchange to her or to Manoel Joaquim Soares, and that he had no interest therein: that Manoel Joaquim Soares was compelled to endorse the same by duress: that the Queen did not intend to recognize the loan or pay the holders of the bonds or scrip, but that she and Manoel Joaquim Soares acted fraudulently in concert, in attempting to appropriate to their own use or the government of Donna Maria the proceeds of the bills of exchange.

And the bill prayed a discovery of the matters mentioned in the bill, and for a commission or commissions to examine witnesses at Lisbon, Paris, and elsewhere abroad; and that in the meantime the appellant and Manoel Joaquim Soares might be restrained from proceeding in the action commenced or in any other action upon the bills of exchange.

To this bill the Queen of Portugal put in a demurrer on the grounds, first, that the respondents had improperly joined the Queen of Portugal as a defendant in the suit, who was not a party to the action at law brought by Manoel Joaquim Soares in the bill mentioned; and secondly, that the matters mentioned in the bill, if admitted or proved to be true, would not constitute a valid defence to the said action at law.

[267] The demurrer came on to be argued before the Chief Baron on the 15th day of December 1835, and, by an order dated the 19th day of January 1836, was by the Chief Baron overruled.

From this order this appeal is brought.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Roupell for the Appellant.—If this judgment is maintained it operates as a perpetual injunction, and the acceptor will continue to hold the money; this is not a bill for relief or interpleader. In no case, except against underwriters, can a bill be filed against any but parties to the record, and in those cases the bills generally pray for the delivery of the policies, and the plaintiff (the broker) must aver for whom the insurance is made. There is no jurisdiction against a foreign sovereign, unless he comes here and sues; King of Spain v. Hullett (7 Bligh, 359). Again, the discovery is not available in the action; bishop of London v. Fytche (1 Bro. C. C. 96) is said to be an exception; but the register's book proves that the patron was the only defendant. In Fenton v. Hughes (7 Vesey, 287) the bill charged interest in a defendant to a bill of discovery, and Lord Eldon allowed the demurrer. In all cases a party not upon the record may be called as a witness for the party seeking the discovery. A sovereign is not amenable unless he files a bill; if he be amenable, the King of England must be equally so to foreign courts. How can a bill be filed against the sovereign power of America, which is "the people of the United States"?

[268] The following cases were cited:—Le Texier v. The Margravine of Anspach (15 Vesey, 164), Dummer v. The Corporation of Chippenham (14 Vesey, 245), Vandam v. Monro (2 Anstruther, 502), Mayor of London v. Levi (8 Vesey, 403), Tooth v. Dean and Chapter of Canterbury (3 Simons, 63), Plummer v. May (1 Vesey, sen. 426).

Mr. Knight Bruce and Mr. James Russell for the Respondents.—The equity is that no consideration was paid for the drawing and accepting the bills. Declarations by a party interested in the action are evidence against the plaintiff, King v. Inhabitants of Hardwick (11 East, 578), Bell v. Ansley (16 East, 141), Smith v. Lyon (3 Campbell, 465), Alves v. Banbury (4 Campbell, 28). A foreign sovereign has no privilege. A plaintiff has a right to file a bill of discovery against any party whose declarations would be evidence for the defendant in the action (Lord Redesdale's last edition on Pleadings, pages 53, 111, 148, 161, 185, 188, 283), Wych v. Meal (3 Pere Williams, 310). The Queen of Portugal could not be examined as a witness, because she is in fact an interested party, though not a party to the record; Fenn v. Granger (3 Campbell, 177), King v. Inhabitants of Woburn (10 East, 395). The Queen of Portugal has documents in her possession; Day v. Drake (3 Simons, 64), Angerstein v. Wentworth (1 Fowler, 227).

Mr. Pemberton in reply.—It is said that in all cases in which an action is brought any one person interested [269] in the subject of the action, and whose declaration would be evidence in the action, may be made a defendant to a bill of discovery ; if that be so, then all persons interested may be made defendants. The passage from Lord Redesdale does not apply to cases of discovery (Lord Redesdale's last edition on Pleading, page 185). Plummer v. May [1 Ves. 426] is referred to as an authority, but that was a bill for relief. Day and Drake [3 Sim. 64] was compromised upon the threat of an appeal. The object of a bill of discovery is to examine your opponent, whom you cannot examine at law ; it must, therefore, be confined to those who cannot be examined at law. The bill is not a bill for relief, offering to bring the money into court.

Lord Chancellor (2d July).—This case comes before this House upon a demurrer by one of the defendants to a bill of discovery, which was filed by Messrs. Glyn and Company, who were the acceptors of certain bills of exchange. The holders of those bills having brought an action on the bills, a bill of discovery was filed, which undoubtedly the defendants at law had a right to file as against those who were pursuing them at law. So far no objection can be taken to the proceeding ; but in addition to those who were pursuing the plaintiffs at law, the defendants at law made another party defendant in the suit in that bill of discovery, namely, the Queen of Portugal. How the Queen of Portugal became a party to the cause below, and what immediate process was served upon her, is not now under consideration ; she was, by virtue of certain orders which have not [270] been the subject of appeal, made a party by the subsequent service, and it became necessary, therefore, for those who had to protect the interests of that foreign potentate to take such proceedings as became necessary in consequence of the orders of the Court of Exchequer. The Queen of Portugal demurs to that bill of discovery ; that demurrer was heard before the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and overruled. From that order overruling the demurrer an appeal was brought to this House.

Unfortunately a considerable length of time has elapsed since this case was argued, and I only refer to that to guard against any supposition that the delay has arisen from any doubt which I at least, individually, entertained of the proper judgment to be pronounced. It becomes a question now what the order ought to be upon that appeal.

The plaintiffs in equity, the acceptors of the bills of exchange, state, and very truly state, (and there is no reason to suppose that they have any benefit in the subject matter,) that they are merely acting as bankers. But looking at the case as it affects the commercial interests of the country, one cannot fail to observe that they are acceptors of certain bills of exchange, and that the plaintiff at law is the holder of those bills of exchange ; and if that which has been done by the Court of Exchequer in overruling this demurrer was to be considered the law of the land, one does not see how any holder of bills of exchange can ever hereafter compel the acceptor to pay, because, if the acceptor could make any foreign potentate a party defendant, the plaintiff at law will not be at liberty to proceed until that foreign potentate puts in an answer in the Court of Exchequer or the Court of Chancery. It is plain that in such a state of [271] things the holder of the bill of exchange will encounter difficulties which it is not very advisable to permit.

The bill states that the party suing the holder of the bill of exchange, the plaintiff at law, is the mere agent for the Queen of Portugal ; upon a demurrer that of course must be taken as an allegation founded in truth. It therefore raises the question which has been decided in the Court of Exchequer, and the proposition there laid down appears to me very fairly to state the point which your Lordships have now to decide. It was laid down by the Lord Chief Baron, that, in his opinion, where a party interested is charged in a bill of discovery and called upon to disclose, he is bound to do so, and that a court of equity will compel him to do so, although he is not a party to the record at law : those are the terms in which the proposition is laid down. Now, I have the misfortune to differ from the proposition so laid down, and I think your Lordships will be of opinion, on reference to the authorities, that the rule of courts of equity is precisely the reverse.

The decision in the Court of Exchequer which we are now considering, has given rise to several cases in Chancery, which have made it my duty to consider the subject ; and although it is one as to which, during an experience of more than thirty-five years in the Court of Chancery, I have not entertained any doubt, or ever heard any suggested, I have thought it my duty to examine all the cases upon the subject, and propose as shortly as possible to submit to your Lordships the result of that examination.

The question is, whether a bill of discovery can be supported against persons interested in the subject matter of the action at law, but not parties to the [272] record. Bills of discovery in aid of the defence to an action are permitted for the purpose of obtaining from the antagonist at law the discovery of matter which, being admitted by him, may aid the defence, and not for the purpose of procuring evidence. It is now nearly forty years since Lord Eldon, in Fenton v. Hughes, reported in 7th Vesey 287, allowed the demurrer of the defendant Bate to a bill of discovery which, according to the statement of the bill by the Vice Chancellor in Irving v. Thompson, in 9th Simons 23, alleged that he, Bate, was interested in the success of the action, and was to be entitled to all or some part of the money to be recovered thereby, and that he would be liable to pay all or some part of the costs in case Hughes, the plaintiff in the action, should not recover. Lord Eldon observed, that Bate would not be a witness for the plaintiff at law on account of his interest, but that the defendant might examine him; and that the superior advantage of discovery by answer, particularly as to the production of papers, was not sufficient to make an exception to the rule that a bill of discovery will not lie against a mere witness.

In 1803, in the case of The Mayor of London v. Levy, in 8th Vesey 403, and in 1808 in Le Texier v. The Margravine of Anspach, in 15th Vesey 164, Lord Eldon laid down the rule in the same way. In 1813 Sir Thomas Plumer acted upon this rule in Powell v. Yeats, as stated by the Vice Chancellor in Irving v. Thompson, as he did in the same year in Whitworth v. Davis, in 1st Vesey and Beames 550. Lord Lyndhurst, in Tooth v. The Archbishop of Canterbury, in 3 Simons 63, and in Few and Guppy, in Hare on Discovery, 124, recognized and acted upon the case of Fenton v. [273] Hughes. In 1835, in the case of Glyn v. Soares, in 3 Mylne and Keen, 450, at the Rolls, I considered the rule as clearly settled; and in 1839 the Vice Chancellor, in Irving v. Thompson, reviewed all the cases and acted upon the rule; and in the present year, in the case of Kerr v. Rew, I thought myself bound by the pendency of this case to look into all the authorities, and found no ground for doubting the rule as I had always understood it; and therefore allowed a demurrer, by a party made a defendant to a bill of discovery by underwriters, upon an allegation that an action upon a policy brought in the name of another as agent was in fact brought for the benefit of the party demurring, and that he was exclusively interested in the subject matter of the suit. It was indeed assumed in the Court below, that in cases of actions upon policies it was the common practice to make the owners defendants to bills of discovery, although they are not parties to the record at law. What may have been the recent practice of the Exchequer I am not very conversant with; but I am very confident that if there be any such practice in the Court it is of very recent date, and certainly at variance with the practice of the Court of Chancery, as the cases of Irving v. Thompson and Kerr v. Rew prove. Indeed, at the time when I was familiar with what was going on in the Exchequer, it was not usual to file bills of discovery in such cases: they all prayed relief. I have looked through many precedents, which, from the names attached to them, must cover a period not much short of a century, and I find but one which does not pray relief. The case of Vandam v. Monro, in 2d Anstruther 502, as there reported, would appear to have been a bill of discovery; and if so, it would be an instance of a bill [274] of discovery filed against the assured, not parties to the action; but, considering what the general practice was, it was most probably a bill praying relief.

Some cases, however, were referred to by the Lord Chief Baron as establishing a contrary doctrine, and some observations of Lord Hardwicke, in Plummer v. May, in 1st Vesey 426, were relied upon; but it is obvious that the bill in that case prayed relief, Lord Hardwicke saying, that there were charges in it which, if proved, would entitle the plaintiff to a decree against the defendant for an account. The Bishop of London v. Fytche, in 1st Brown 95, was also relied upon as an instance in which a bill of discovery was filed against a defendant who was not a party to the action. I have had the registrar's book searched, and it appears, under date 13th of June 1780, reg. lib. at folio 506, that the report in that respect is erroneous, and that Eyre, the clerk, was not a party to the bill of discovery. Dummer v. The Corporation of Chippenham, 14 Vesey 245, has also been referred to; but Lord Eldon's observations, in page 253, only showed that, in his opinion, the principle of permitting a plaintiff in a suit against a corporation to seek discovery from an officer of the corporation might be extended to individual members of it. Batch v. Wastell, in 1st Peere Williams 245, appears to be a bill for relief and not for discovery only, and the object was to make assets in the hands of the defendant liable to the plaintiff's judgment. The cases of officers of corporations stand on principles entirely peculiar to themselves, and have obviously no application to the present case. Angerstein v. Wentworth, 1st Fowler 227, does not prove much, but as far as it goes, it is an authority in favour of the demurrer.

[275] Thus all the cases which have been supposed to support the doctrine upon which the judgment of the Court below proceeded, when examined into, are proved to want those circumstances which, from the mistake of the reporters, have been supposed to make them authorities for that purpose. A proposition was suggested, which is, I believe, quite new, namely, that a bill of discovery may be filed against any one whose admissions may be used for the plaintiff at law. This proposition I conceive to be wholly untenable, and what affords the most certain answer to it is, that in Fenton v. Hughes the declarations of Bate, assuming the facts to be as stated in the bill and admitted in the demurrer, would have been admissible in favour of the plaintiff to the bill of discovery. It is true that examining a person as a witness, who has important papers in his possession, is far less effectual than obtaining his answer to a bill of discovery; but this was fully considered by Lord Eldon in Fenton v. Hughes [7 Ves. 287, 289], and yet he held that this consideration, though well founded in fact, did not justify filing a bill against a person who might be examined as a witness. The demurring party might in this case be examined as a witness for the plaintiff to the bill of discovery, the defendant at law; as may the assured, not a party to the record for the underwriter, as stated by Lord Abinger in his judgment on this case.

The case of the lessor of the plaintiff in ejectment being compelled to answer a bill of discovery is no authority against the rule, but he is considered in all respects as a party to the record, which the assured is not, and therefore may be examined as a witness; and, therefore, if your Lordships were to sanction the principle upon which the judgment of the Court below has [276] proceeded, a very mischievous innovation would be made in the rules and practice of courts of equity as to compelling discovery, and an inquisitorial power would be established, by which persons not parties to any litigation might be compelled, in a contest between others, to discover the secrets of their own affairs, upon an allegation, which could not perhaps be denied, that they had some interest in the subject matter of a litigation between others; and as, if the defendant at law be entitled to the discovery in aid of his defence, the action cannot be permitted to proceed till such discovery be obtained, an easy expedient would be afforded of defeating the enforcement of legal rights by action at law, by filing bills of discovery against persons not parties to the record and out of the jurisdiction, upon an allegation of their being interested in the subject matter of the action. Of the possibility of such an abuse the present case furnishes a striking example. The rules of courts of equity, as they have hitherto existed, cannot lead to such an abuse; and I trust that your Lordships will maintain those rules, and thereby prevent the recurrence of such injustice in future. I therefore move that the judgment of the Court below be reversed, and the demurrer allowed.

Lord Lyndhurst.—It is quite unnecessary for me to go through the cases which have been referred to; it is sufficient for me to say, that I entirely concur in the opinion which has been pronounced upon this case. I consider the decision in Fenton v. Hughes as a decision precisely in point upon the present occasion. It was suggested that Bate had no interest; the record has been searched, and the notes of the case have been [277] examined, and it appears that he had a direct interest; that it was so asserted upon the record, that Bate was to share a part of the money that was to be recovered, and was liable or undertook to pay the whole or a part of the costs. The decision in Fenton v. Hughes [7 Ves. 287] has been acted upon from that time to the present, in two instances by Lord Chancellor Eldon, who considered the case with great care and great attention at the time. It has been confirmed by the case of Powell v. Yeats, about which the Master of the Rolls, Sir Thomas Plumer, at first doubted; but when the facts of Fenton v. Hughes were distinctly brought to his attention, he confirmed the judgment in that case, and acted upon it in the decision he pronounced in Powell v. Yeats.

The same point came before the Court during the time I held the Great Seal. I considered the law as settled by the case of Fenton v. Hughes, and acted upon it in the case referred to. Since that time it has come before the Court in two or three instances during the time of the present Vice Chancellor, who pronounced a most elaborate judgment in the case of Irving v. Thompson [9 Sim. 23] on this very point; the judgment being, I believe, the more elaborate in consequence of the decision from which this is an appeal. The decision which is now appealed from was founded on a misapprehension of the case of Fenton v. Hughes as to the facts of that case, and there is undoubtedly something equivocal, ambiguous, and vague in the report, in consequence of which the Vice Chancellor got the original brief containing the facts, and containing the bill in which the facts are such as my noble and learned friend has stated, and such as I have mentioned.

There was another case which has been relied upon, [278] which was considered as an authority for the judgment in this case; I mean the case of The Bishop of London v. Fytche [1 Bro. C.C. 96]; that was founded upon the apprehension that Eyre was one of the defendants on that record, whereas upon examining the record it appears that Fytche was the only defendant. It appears to me that that is not an authority to oppose to the authority of Fenton v. Hughes, which has been considered as law from that time to the present. I repeat what I before said, that any person looking to the judgment of Lord Eldon, in the case decided by him, will see that he considered the case with his usual attention and his usual care, and that in pronouncing the judgment he must be considered as pronouncing no law, but that which has been from that time considered as the rule of Court. I am therefore humbly of opinion that the judgment ought to be reversed.

Lord Brougham.—My Lords, agreeing entirely as I do with my noble and learned friends who have addressed your Lordships, I shall not trouble your Lordships further than by expressing my entire concurrence. I agree entirely as to the cause for postponing this judgment; the judgment has been postponed principally for the purpose of having those cases looked into upon which it was said that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer had been founded. The case of Fenton v. Hughes [7 Ves. 287] was a good deal commented upon at the bar in the course of the argument, as also the case of the Bishop of London v. Fytche. There is no doubt that the error which has prevailed in the reports of those cases, and the great vagueness of the case of Fenton v. Hughes, have given rise to this decision in [279] the Court of Exchequer. The manifest error in the case of the Bishop of London v. Fytche, and, I think, another error which appears in the report of some third case gave rise to considerable discussion, and to some doubt at the hearing; and according to my recollection, it was principally with a view of having this mistake and difference with respect to the cases examined, that the postponement of the judgment has taken place. It really does appear now very satisfactorily, from the full inquiry into all those cases in the late case of Irving v. Thompson before the Vice Chancellor, that those cases have been either mistaken or misrepresented, and that from those circumstances the error in this judgment of the Court of Exchequer has arisen.

Lord Lyndhurst.—I believe the third case to which my noble and learned friend alludes is not a single case, but I believe it is that class of decisions which is supposed to have existed in insurance cases.

Lord Brougham.—I believe so.

Lord Lyndhurst.—It would be desirable to ascertain whether those were bills of discovery or bills for relief; upon examination it turns out that the whole course of proceeding in those cases was not in the nature of bills for discovery, but bills for relief; and I apprehend, therefore, what is supposed to be the modern practice arises from misapprehension of the form of those bills.

Lord Wynford.—I rise to address your Lordships certainly with considerable reluctance, because I am bound to state to your Lordships that I agree in opinion with the noble and learned judge (my Lord Abinger) who decided the case in the Court below, and [280] I have the misfortune to differ from my noble and learned friends who have given their opinion upon this occasion.

I never heard before of any case being misreported, except the case of the Bishop of London v. Fytche [1 Bro. C. C. 96]. It was certainly stated at the time of the hearing here, that there was a mistake in the report of the Bishop of London v. Fytche, inasmuch as a person of the name of Eyre, who was supposed to have been a party in that suit, was actually not a party; but with respect to any mistake or misreport in the case of Fenton v. Hughes [2 Ves. 287], I never heard of any.

Lord Brougham.—I did not say that it was misreported, but that there was an uncertainty with respect to the facts of that case which has since been cleared up.

Lord Wynferd.—I was not aware that there was any uncertainty as to the facts; and as the facts are stated in the report which we had to refer to at the time this case was under consideration, it appeared to me then, as it appears now, that it was a very strong authority indeed against the opinion which my noble and learned friend has this day pronounced.

Your Lordships are not in possession of any of the circumstances of this case, or you would at once perceive that such gross injustice never was worked in any cause as will be worked in this, if your Lordships pronounce the judgment which it is recommended to you to pronounce in this cause. It is fit that you should be put in possession of some of these facts, and should know how some of the facts have been dealt with in another country. I have been in the habit of thinking that our laws were the wisest in the world,—that they [281] were better administered in this country than in any other; I shall be bound to confess, after the judgment which I am afraid will be pronounced to-day, “that they manage things better in France.” While we have been sleeping over this cause, they have in France got at the facts, and in France they have decided according to the justice of the case. They have disposed of the Queen of Portugal and her agents in that country as I had hoped your Lordships would have been enabled in this country to dispose of Her Majesty the Queen of Portugal, and her agent, Mr. Soares, in this country.

My noble and learned friend on the woolsack has stated, that if your Lordships uphold the judgment of my noble and learned friend, commercial people, holders of bills of exchange, will be in a fearful situation, because it would only be necessary to make some prince in Europe or America (but fortunately for the purpose of this cause, but though unfortunately for other purposes, there is but one prince in America who can be made) a party to any such cause;—that by making any foreign prince a party to the cause the action may be tied up, and no holder of a bill of exchange can ever recover upon it. There is a very short answer to that argument; how can that be done when it is stated, as it is in this cause, that the Queen of Portugal is the sole party to the cause and has the sole interest, and that Mr. Soares, the person whose name appears upon the record, is her agent,—a fact which is admitted? Can it be said, that if you decide that such a person is bound to make a disclosure, you would be opening a door for the filing of bills calling upon any sovereign of Europe or America to answer to the bill? That allegation, I [282] conceive, cannot be supported. I confess I am a little surprised that my noble and learned friend, who has so general and accurate a knowledge in matters of equity, should have had recourse to such an argument as that which he has used.

I found my observations in this cause upon the simple allegation, that the Queen of Portugal, who refuses to answer, is the sole person who can know any thing of the facts; that the Queen of Portugal, who refuses to answer, is the sole person who has any interest in the cause; for my noble and learned friend has admitted that what is charged in this bill, if not denied, must be taken to be true. It is charged in the bill, and it is not denied, that Mr. Soares had admitted that he has no interest whatever in this cause; that the only party upon the record who has the whole interest in this cause is the Queen of Portugal, who refuses to make any disclosure, and by refusing to make any disclosure will obtain a sum of money from the merchants of this country to which she has not the slightest pretence upon earth: a fouler fraud,—if I may use such a word as applicable to parties in the situation in which these parties are,—a fouler fraud was never committed upon the merchants of this country than will be committed if this judgment should pass, as I am very much afraid it will pass.

What are the facts of the case? Some time about the year 1829 the government of Portugal was de facto in the hands of Don Miguel. Don Miguel negotiated a loan with two persons in France of the names of Outrequin and Jauge, and bonds were given to those persons, which bonds were to be delivered to different persons in the form of scrip. To the persons who con-[283]-tributed to that loan the loan was to be paid; bonds were given to those parties, and the loan was to be raised by bills drawn upon persons in England and in France,—bills exactly under the same circumstances with those in the present case. The decision in the court of France, which has disposed of the Queen of Portugal, is a direct decision upon this very point now under consideration. Bills were to be given in satisfaction of raising this loan on merchants in England and France. The bills upon England were endorsed by a person then a minister of the Court of Portugal, a person of the name of Couto; they were transmitted to this country, and were presented for acceptance to the present defendants, they were accepted by the present defendants. Those bills were to be given to the person who was the endorsee of the second set of bills. At this time Don Miguel was de facto the Governor of Portugal. By Don Miguel this loan was raised. Don Miguel was in the meantime dismissed from the Court of Portugal; he was turned out as an usurper, and Donna Maria was placed in his stead. The first act of Donna Maria was this: she repudiated the loan of Don Miguel. Perhaps she was right in that; she said that Don Miguel was an usurper, and therefore the bonds he had given and the loan he had raised were not binding upon the kingdom of Portugal, and would not be paid. So far she was right; but if it was right to say that the bonds were only invalid, it was only right to remit, to those who had given the bills, the bills which were advanced for the purpose of raising that loan. But though the loan was declared void, that was not thought proper by the council of Portugal. The council of Portugal, after Don Miguel had left that [284] country, sent for Mr. Couto, who had been actually deposed from his situation, who was appointed to that situation by Don Miguel,—never held any situation of that kind under Donna Maria, and he was compelled against his inclination, for he had some scruples of honesty about him, to endorse these bills to a Mr. Soares, in order that Mr. Soares might recover the money for those bills in this country, and remit it to Donna Maria, who had repudiated the loan, and who had therefore no more pretension to touch those bills than I have, or than any one of your Lordships. Immediately upon this Don Miguel gave notice to the acceptor of the bills not to pay them to Soares, and not to accept them on account of Soares. Outrequin and Jauge, the two persons in France, gave also the same notice not to pay the bills, because they said Soares was endeavouring to recover a sum of money for the Queen of Portugal which she had no right to, having repudiated the loan, and having declared that the bonds were void.

Now, after this, can any one allow on any pretence the Queen of Portugal, who is the real party in this cause, and the only party in this cause, to recover in this action upon bills of exchange, the consideration of which she herself by her own act has repudiated? I state that it would be an act of such gross injustice,—I hear my noble and learned friend say, and I am obliged to him for the admission, that it would be an act of gross injustice,—it cannot be denied to be an act of gross injustice; and I should be very sorry, if, in consequence of any supposed technical rules of the Court of Chancery, your Lordships were to be made parties to such injustice. This is a case of so much importance, not only with respect to these parties to whom it is of [285] very great consequence, but with respect to the administration of justice in general, that I, for one, with all my respect for the Court of Chancery, would rather that it should be blown up, than that this cause should be decided in the manner in which it is proposed to be. If we cannot do better here than they do in France, if we cannot get at the facts and decide upon the justice of the case, but are tied up by these absurd forms, for which no reason has been attempted to be given by my noble and learned friends, it would be better that we should have no Court of Chancery at all than one so fettered.

Lord Lyndhurst.—They did not examine the Queen of Portugal in France.

Lord Wynford.—They did not examine the Queen of Portugal, I am obliged to my noble and learned friend; we do not propose to examine the Queen of Portugal here; I know we cannot examine her here, but we can get some information as to who the persons are who may be examined here. We may do that which is asked for by this bill; we may have a commission sent not only to Portugal but to France, to examine the only persons who can know any thing of the facts connected with the cause.

Lord Lyndhurst.—We do not decide that a commission may not issue.

Lord Wynford.—My noble and learned friend says, we do not decide that a commission may not issue. I know that; but who can issue that commission, unless the Queen of Portugal will, through some minister of hers, kindly inform us who are the persons to whom the commission is to be sent, and from whom the information is to be obtained. We are kept entirely in [286] the dark upon this subject, and by keeping us in the dark the Queen of Portugal will get into her pocket money which she has no more pretence for getting into her pocket than she has for taking the money of your Lordships.

But it is said, there is a distinct rule in the Court of Chancery, which prevents this being done. I am bound to suppose that there is such a rule, after my noble and learned friends, for every one of whom I entertain so much respect, have stated that there is such a rule, and that the thing is not to be doubted about. I am bound to suppose that all the reporters must be mistaken; but if the reporters are not mistaken, there is no such rule in the court of equity. If there is such a rule in the court of equity in this country, I beg to say in a vast number of cases it is absolutely impossible that justice can be got at. Suppose a bill of exchange obtained in the most fraudulent manner in the world, under circumstances of disgusting fraud, the man who gets hold of the bill of exchange will never bring an action upon that bill himself; he will hand it over to some person,—put an endorsement on it; he will get half a dozen endorsements put upon that bill, if, in consequence of that, he cannot be called upon to answer, and disclose all those circumstances. I am aware that if you have all those endorsers you may examine them as witnesses in the case, but you cannot get at the man by whom the bill has been passed from hand to hand, but whose name did not appear upon the back of the bill.

But there is another thing. It is of very little use to get hold of any facts in court unless you have a knowledge of those facts beforehand, in order so to use those facts at the time of the trial that they may be rendered [287] advantageous to the party. My noble and learned friend has admitted that a bill of discovery is much better in many cases than the examination of a witness. In the examination of a witness the answers come upon you by surprise, but by means of a bill of discovery you have it in your possession, and have an opportunity of thinking of it before it is used in court; and you not only know how the information is to be used when it is obtained, but you find out the means by which other matters can be examined in a court of justice, which it is impossible you could know any thing about, or be aware of, if the parties were not to be called upon to give evidence upon them before they come to a court of justice.

I will, in the first place, take the liberty of stating to your Lordships, that it does not appear to me that Lord Redesdale, one of the most eminent men who ever practised in a court of equity, was ever aware of any such rule as that which is now suggested. It is there that a bill of this nature, that is, a bill of discovery, must state the matter touching which a discovery is sought, the interest of the plaintiff and defendant in the subject, and the right of the first to require the discovery from the other.

Further, in the same book Lord Redesdale states that bills have been filed to impeach deeds on the ground of fraud. Now here not only no such rule as this which is relied on upon this case, for the purpose of defeating the merchants of England and putting the money into the pocket of the Queen of Portugal, is advanced, but the direct contrary is stated by Lord Redesdale, for it is equivalent to that. The noble and learned Lord says, "Where bills have been filed to impeach deeds on the [288] ground of fraud, attornies who have prepared the deed and other persons have been made defendants, for the purpose of obtaining a full discovery." Those were bills of mere discovery, and in bills of mere discovery attornies, who, your Lordships know, cannot be parties to the cause, and other persons, certainly not meaning other parties to the cause, may be made witnesses, for the purpose of getting at a full disclosure of the fraud, or any thing of that nature. If you were tied down to an examination merely of persons whose names are upon the record, I am sure in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred they will escape, as fraud of the grossest kind will unquestionably escape in the case now under discussion.

Lord Redesdale says in another passage, "As the object of the Court in compelling a discovery is either to enable itself or some other Court to decide on matters in dispute between the parties, the discovery sought must be material either to the relief prayed by the bill, or to some other suit actually instituted or capable of being instituted." Now, I should think, your Lordships will say that this light never broke in upon Lord Redesdale, or he would not have written that part of his treatise respecting bills of discovery if such a thing had occurred to him.

Now this is the best book I can find, and the text book upon this subject. Your Lordships will find that in the case of Wych v. Meah, in 3d Peere Williams 310, Lord Talbot ordered the secretary of the East India Company to put in an answer, because the Company would not answer on oath; and he said, though the answer might not be read against the Company, yet it might be of use to direct the plaintiff how to draw his inter-[289]-rogatories. There is not a word said by Lord Talbot in that case applicable to this distinction, and we do not look into cases merely to find exactly the same facts, or to find parties exactly under the same circumstances; but we look into cases to discover general principles. I say, this case establishes the principle laid down by Lord Redesdale, that the Court will grant a discovery where it is necessary for the purposes of justice, the parties seeking it having an interest in obtaining it from the party from whom it is sought. My noble and learned friends, one or two of them, mentioned this case of the secretary of the East India Company, but none of them, upon principle, attempted to distinguish it from the present case. The secretary to the East India Company was no party to the record, but he was examined in the case, because the parties who were parties to the cause could not be compelled to make a disclosure upon oath. If the Queen of Portugal cannot be made a party, and cannot be obliged to make a discovery, or to state who her officers are, or give us any means by which we can find out the circumstances under which she has obtained these bills, or afford us any opportunity whatever of investigating the transaction,—if, I say, she can get this money into her hands, allowing the record of the court of equity in this country to charge her without denial on her part, that will occasion one of the grossest frauds that was ever committed in any country.

I do not recollect whether any objection was made to the accuracy of the report, in Vesey senior, of Plummer v. May. A bill was brought in that case by an heir-at-law against witnesses.

The demurrer was overruled on the ground that the [290] deed admitted every thing that was well pleaded, and that there was an express allegation in the bill that the defendant pretended to some right or interest under the bill. It will appear whether there was any thing further passed that I am not aware of, but nothing more appears, from the note which I made, to have passed. The reason given was that the witnesses had not an interest; if that be any part of the reason, it is very applicable to this case. The Queen of Portugal stands in a very different situation from the witnesses; as the plaintiff, she not only has an interest, but she has the whole and entire interest, and all which is now doing is doing for her. If my noble and learned friends can prevail upon your Lordships to overturn this judgment, the Queen of Portugal will obtain this money in her pocket, which otherwise she will never get.

With respect to the case of Fenton v. Hughes [7 Ves. 287], it is said that that judgment is discovered not to have been given on the ground stated by Vesey; but of that I know nothing. An action qui tam was brought in the name of the defendant, as the foundation of a bill of discovery and a bill of relief. The action was brought at the instance of the other defendant, Bate, under prayer for discovery, and a prayer for relief against both defendants, and that the plaintiff might have the benefit of the trial of the action. That does not look like a bill brought for relief, but for the purpose of obtaining facts to be used in an action at law commenced in the name of the defendant Hughes, not Hughes and Bate. Bate demurred to the bill, that the plaintiff had not shown any right to call upon him in equity for discovery, and that he might be examined as a witness. The demurrer was allowed on what ground? On the ground that Bate [291] was a mere witness, having no interest. It was decided upon that ground, and I suppose that to be an accurate report. It must be a very inaccurate one if that is not the case; there is in that report no notice taken of his not being a party in the cause. If this be the rule of courts of equity, would not Lord Eldon, who, we know, had a short way of disposing of causes (for he was in the habit very much of disposing of causes in a short way, without going through all the points,) would not he have said at once, you cannot go on here, Bate is no party to the cause, there is an end of it. But Lord Eldon goes into all the cases, and decides it upon the point, that the party who called upon Bate had no interest.

The case I am about to allude to is a decision of the noble and learned judge in this very case. I think that every word is entitled to attention, not only from the great authority of that noble and learned judge——

Lord Lyndhurst.—Hear, hear.

Lord Wynford.—Though he has not had so much experience in courts of equity as my noble and learned friends now present have had, yet he has heard more of what passes in causes in general than almost any man in the country, and certainly was one of the most distinguished advocates ever at the bar.

Lord Lyndhurst.—Hear, hear.

Lord Wynford.—Though Lord Abinger has not attended so much to the courts of equity, he has been called upon, in the courts of common law, to attend to pleadings and answers in courts of equity. Lord Abinger says in this case, “The question is, whether a party suing is agent for another?” That is the very point which has not been touched upon yet; so there is [292] in this case—Soares is the agent for the Queen of Portugal. Facit per alium facit per se: what the Queen of Portugal does by her agent she does by herself, though her name is not upon the record. The name of Soares is upon the record in no other way than as agent for the Queen of Portugal. It would appear ridiculous to say, you shall not put the Queen of Portugal to answer because she does not appear upon the record, though it is admitted that the very persons who did appear had no interest in the concern, and that her Majesty was the person solely interested. Lord Abinger, after observing that Soares proceeding in his own name, but really on behalf of the Queen of Portugal, he ought to be restrained in his action until the party for whom he acts puts in his answer to the bill of discovery, goes on to say, “Why not apply that principle to an action brought on a bill of exchange or other security?” I say, why not? Is it possible on principle to distinguish these cases? It is known that most of the persons required to answer are not parties to the record; but they are the persons who can give the best information, and they are therefore required to give that information. That is the rule of common sense, and I trust it will not be prevented operating by the Court's being bound down by the technical rules of the Court of Chancery, even if I were obliged to confess, which I do not, that the authorities were all decidedly against me.

There is another case which I ought to mention, decided by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, the case of Glyn v. Soares, in 3 Mylne and Keen:—“The acceptors have undoubted right to have that [293] fact ascertained, whether the party holding the bill is or is not the person who derived title under the individual or officer to whose order the bills were made payable; beyond that, they have no interest in the subject matter. It cannot be material to them how Messrs. Outrequin and Jauge had the money in their hands,—why it was they wished to remit it to Portugal. This is not a bill for the purpose of administering equities between the parties; it is not a bill in which the question who is entitled to the money can be discussed. It is merely a bill to aid the defence to an action at law, and it cannot correctly or properly raise any question which is not material for that purpose.” My Lords, I entirely concur in that; you cannot go into any question which is not material for the purpose for which the bill is filed, that is, to get at evidence which is shown to be material for the purpose of defeating an action unjustly brought against the person who filed the bill.

On these grounds I feel it to be my duty to support the judgment my noble and learned friend has pronounced; and after having heard the opinions my noble and learned friends have stated to your Lordships, I take them to proceed upon a mere technical ground, for which there is no pretence, in my humble judgment; and if that which they have expressed is declared to be the law, if I continued my attendance in parliament, I certainly would have brought in a bill to try whether I could prevail on the House to get rid of a law which must be pregnant with so much mischief, and which will tend to inflict so much injury upon the country. I have felt this a very painful duty. I have stated the judgment which, in my opinion, you ought to give, and [294] feeling decided in my opinion, I could not reconcile it to my conscience not to come here and to state to your Lordships that I enter my protest against the decision about to be made.

Lord Brougham.—I did not say that Fenton v. Hughes [7 Ves. 287] was reported upon other grounds than those upon which the judgment was pronounced. What I said was, that there was some vagueness on the part of the reporter which had misled the Court below, and it is quite clear that the Lord Chief Baron was misled respecting the grounds of that decision by what passed before the Vice Chancellor; for he says Lord Eldon took time to consider and said, "that he had looked with great anxiety into the bill to see if he could discover any sort of interest that Bate had to make him any thing but a witness, and he goes through the topics to show that Bate was clearly a witness at law for the party who filed that bill; that if he could not be a witness on the other side by reason of any interest yet undiscovered, that was for the advantage of the plaintiff in equity." Then my Lord Chief Baron says, that Lord Eldon came to the conclusion that there is not such a charge of interest in Bate as justified him in retaining the bill against him; and then the Lord Chief Baron adds, that if the bill had stated that the plaintiff in the action and Bate had agreed to divide the profits, or if it had stated that Bate had some such interest in the suit as identified him in interest with the plaintiff in the action, though not himself a plaintiff upon the record,—it says, my Lord Chief Baron "should have thought it probable, from Lord Eldon's judgment, that he would not have allowed the de-[295]-murrer." Now, I say, there must have been some want of clearness in that report to have led the Lord Chief Baron to come to that conclusion, because, if Lord Eldon had examined the bill with that anxiety with which he usually did examine bills before him, he would have necessarily discovered that which appeared on this bill being examined by the Vice Chancellor with a view to another case, but again partly re-examined by him with a view to this case of Irving v. Thompson [9 Sim. 23], to which his attention was more particularly called in consequence of this very case then pending for judgment. He examined this bill, and what did he find? He found those very things which were the points of difference, that had led the Lord Chief Baron to suppose that what existed in Fenton v. Hughes did not exist in that case; for he says, "I have examined the bill, and I find that it was charged that Bate was interested in the success of the action, and was to be entitled to all or some part of the money to be recovered thereby; and that he was or would be liable to pay all or some part of the costs in case Hughes should not recover, or that there had been some agreement, bargain, or understanding between Bate and Hughes and the attorney who carried on the action respecting the costs of such action, which was carried on at the risk and expense of Bate." So that his honour the Vice Chancellor might very well proceed to conclude that there were actually those very allegations in the bill which the Lord Chief Baron supposed if Lord Eldon had seen fit in Fenton v. Hughes, he would have come to a different conclusion from that which he adopted; and that, notwithstanding, seeing those very allegations, he came to the conclusion of allowing the demurrer.

Lord Wynford.—I am much obliged to my noble and learned friend for having stated this, but it does not show that Lord Eldon took notice of the circumstance that Bate was interested.

Lord Brougham.—I only mean that it goes to show that Fenton v. Hughes [7 Ves. 287] was not decided on grounds other than those stated by the Vice Chancellor.

Lord Lyndhurst.—If the report is looked at, it will not be found inconsistent with that which is stated to be the effect of it. I have looked at Fenton v. Hughes, and it is not at all inconsistent.

Lord Chancellor.—The allegations in Fenton v. Hughes are as nearly as possible the allegations in this cause. They allege that Bate was the party really interested, that the person suing was not suing for his own benefit, and that the absent party Bate was so much interested in the result of the suit that he was to pay the costs. I say nothing about what may be the ultimate decree of the Court. My noble and learned friend seems to suppose that I apply the decision on this point to the facts of the case. Now, it is a rule in equity, that when a case comes on upon demurrer we must take the facts as stated for the purpose of the demurrer. We know nothing of the facts; it may be a mere fiction, a mere fable. It will lie upon the parties to prove these facts respecting Don Miguel or Donna Maria; we must take the facts as stated on the bill for the purpose of trying the demurrer, but for no other purpose. I do not mean to say that the facts may not [297] be those stated by my noble and learned friend, for we really have not the facts before us in any shape; we must try the demurrer upon the facts as alleged in the bill, without regard to any other point.

Lord Wynford.—I conceive the principle which the Courts have adopted is this, that the Court says, unless you condescend to answer the bill you shall not go on with the action.

Lord Chancellor.—Then, again, my noble and learned friend has not distinguished very happily between bills for relief and bills for discovery, which is a very important distinction; this is a mere bill of discovery.

It is ordered, That the said order complained of in the said appeal be reversed; and that the demurrer to the plaintiff's bill in the Court below be allowed.

FROM THE COURT OF CHANCERY IN ENGLAND.

Sir FELIX BOOTH, Baronet, WILLIAM MILLER, CHRISTY, WILLIAM CURLING, JOHN PETER DARTHEZ the younger, GEORGE HOLGATE FOSTER, WILLIAM ORMSBY GORE, WILLIAM HUGHES HUGHES, JOHN CHRISTOPHER LOCHNER, WILLIAM MITCALFE, AMBROSE MOORE, JOHN M'TAGGART, Sir FRANCIS PALGRAVE, THOMAS PHILLPOTTS, JOSHUA SCHOLEFIELD, GEORGE SCHOLEFIELD, WILLIAM SHADBOLT, THOMAS STOOKS, GEORGE TAYLER, WILLIAM VENABLES, and GEORGE POLLARD,—Appellants; The GOVERNOR and COMPANY of the BANK OF ENGLAND,—Respondents [9th and 20th July 1840].

[Mews' Dig. i. 350, 353, 977; iv. 150. S.C. 7 Cl. and F. 509, q.r.]

The London Joint Stock Bank, being a copartnership consisting of more than six persons, and carrying on the business of bankers in the city of London, agrees with a Canada bank to provide the necessary funds to pay at maturity all such bills as may be drawn by the Canada bank upon and accepted by George Pollard, manager of the London Joint Stock Bank, to a limited extent beyond the effects in their hands, and an agreement to that effect is signed by the trustees of the com-[299]-pany. In pursuance of this agreement the president of the Canada bank, on behalf of such bank, draws a bill of exchange, payable to the order of Francis A. Harper sixty days after sight, for the sum of £1000, directed to George Pollard as manager of the London Joint Stock Bank, and accepted by him at the London Joint Stock Bank. Held, eleven of the judges being present and concurring, that, having regard to the acts in force respecting the Bank of England, the acceptance by Pollard under the above agreement was illegal; that his acceptance was equivalent to an acceptance by the Joint Stock Bank; that it was equally a violation of their privileges, whether the London Joint Stock Bank at the time of the acceptance had or had not funds in their hands on account of the bank in Canada, equal to the amount of the bill accepted; and that in either case an action on the case could be maintained by the Bank of England against the London Joint Stock Bank for a violation of the privileges conferred upon the Bank of England by the bank acts.

On the 30th November 1837 the respondents, the Bank of England, filed their bill in the Court of Chancery against the appellants, whereby, after stating the several acts of parliament relating to the Bank of England, they stated, that in the year 1836 certain persons associated themselves together for the purpose of establishing a banking establishment in the city of London under the style or firm of "The London Joint Stock Bank," and that they issued the following prospectus:—"The London Joint Stock Bank, Princes Street, Mansion House. Capital three millions, in 60,000 shares of £50 each. Directors, Sir Felix Booth and others. Manager, George Pollard, esquire. The business of the bank is conducted on the follow-[300]-ing principles: accounts of parties, properly introduced, are received agreeably to the present custom of London bankers, with this advantage, that interest is allowed on current accounts and on deposits. On the first day of every month interest at the rate of £2 per cent. per annum will be allowed on the smallest balance which may appear to the credit of each account at the close of any day during the preceding month. Sums of money received on deposit at such rate of interest and for such periods as may be agreed upon, reference being had to the state of the money market; and if required, bills or promissory notes, at not less than six months' date, will be delivered to depositors in lieu of receipts for sums of not less than £100. Interest at the rate of £2 10s. per cent. per annum allowed on sums not exceeding £2000 deposited without special agreement, which may be withdrawn at any time on giving ten days' notice. The agency of joint stock and other country and foreign banks undertaken on such terms as may be agreed upon. Investments in and sales of all descriptions of British and foreign securities, bullion, specie, etc. effected, dividends received, and every other description of banking business and money agency transacted. A bill committee of the directors sits daily, from 12 till 2 o'clock, to receive applications for discounts, which are considered confidential, and promptly decided upon. The board of directors meets weekly, when a full statement of the affairs of the bank is laid before them."

That in the year 1836 such company or partnership was formed for the purpose of carrying on the [301] trade or business of banking in London, under the style or firm of "the London Joint Stock Bank," in Princes Street, in the city of London.

The bill then stated, that the plaintiffs had discovered that the object and design of the said company was not only to carry on the business of a bank of deposit and the issue of bills and promissory notes, as stated in their said prospectus, but to borrow, owe, and take up money on their bills or notes at a shorter date than six months from the issuing thereof.

That in the deed or agreement of copartnership of the said company, which was signed by each person who became a partner therein, there was contained a power to the directors, or some other officers of the said company or partnership, to authorize persons to sign bills or notes and other negotiable securities.

That the said London Joint Stock Bank Company so carrying on the said trade or business of banking, under the said style or firm of "The London Joint Stock Bank," at the formation of the said company established a house for the purpose of carrying on the said trade or business of banking in Princes Street, Mansion House, in the city of London; and the said company or partnership have, ever since the formation thereof, carried on the trade or business of banking at such place aforesaid, and now do carry on such trade or business there, and have ever since the formation thereof and now have the whole of their banking establishment in London: that the entire management of all the affairs and property of the said company or partnership was in the board of directors and manager.

That there was a banking establishment carrying on business at Kingston, Upper Canada, in North America, [302] under the style of the Commercial Bank, Midland District: that previously to the month of May 1837, and subsequent thereto, the Commercial Bank, Midland District, issued bills of exchange and promissory notes for various sums of money payable on demand, or at less time than six months from the time of the acceptance thereof, and such notes and bills of exchange were by the Commercial Bank, Midland District, declared to be payable and were made payable by the London Joint Stock Bank.

That the said Commercial Bank, Midland District, had drawn divers bills of exchange and promissory notes, payable at a less time than six months from the time of the acceptance thereof, upon the said London Joint Stock Bank, for various sums of money, and which said promissory notes and bills of exchange had been accepted by the said London Joint Stock Bank.

That the Commercial Bank, Midland District, had drawn and negotiated such bills of exchange and promissory notes upon the said London Joint Stock Bank company or partnership, with a view to maintain a circulation of paper money for the benefit of the London Joint Stock Bank company; and that the London Joint Stock Bank received the profit made thereby, by arrangement and agreement between them and the said Commercial Bank, Midland District.

That the London Joint Stock Bank, on the 26th April 1837, authorized George Tayler to write to the plaintiffs the following letter:—

“ London Joint Stock Bank, 26th April 1837.

“ Gentlemen,—Having received from a transatlantic chartered bank the offer of their agency, which would involve the necessity of this bank accepting their drafts [303] payable at a shorter date than six months, the directors of this bank are desirous of knowing whether the directors of the Bank of England would interpose any difficulty in the way of this bank accepting such drafts.—I have the honour to be, your very obedient servant,

GEORGE TAYLER, Chairman.

“ To the Governor and Court of Directors of the Bank of England.”

That the plaintiffs, on the 27th day of April 1837, sent, by their secretary, to the said George Tayler, in reply, the following letter:—

“ Bank of England, 27th April 1837.

“ Sir,—I am desired to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th instant, addressed to the governor and court of directors of the Bank of England, in which you ask whether the directors of the bank of England will interpose any difficulty in the way of the London Joint Stock Bank accepting drafts payable at a shorter date than six months; and in reply I have to state, that such acceptances would be an infraction of the privileges of the bank of England, and as respects the public would be illegal and void, and consequently could not be permitted by this corporation.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN KNIGHT.

“ To George Tayler, esquire, chairman of the London Joint Stock Bank.”

That at the end of the month of September 1837 plaintiffs received certain remittances from North America, and amongst various bills of exchange, which [304] formed part of such remittances, plaintiffs received a bill of exchange drawn by John S. Cartwright, who is president of the Commercial Bank, Midland District, on behalf of such last-mentioned bank, which bill of exchange was as follows:—“ £1000 sterling. Kingston, Upper Canada, 25th July 1837. Sixty days after sight pay this my first of exchange, second and third unpaid, to the order of F. A. Harper, cashier, the sum of £1000 sterling, value received, which place to account of the Commercial Bank, Midland District, with or without further advice. John S. Cartwright, president. To George Pollard, esquire, manager, London Joint Stock Bank, London.”

That plaintiffs, on the 2d of October 1837, duly presented the same at the office of the London Joint Stock Bank for acceptance, and the same was accepted by George Pollard, as the manager of the London Joint Stock Bank, on their behalf and for their benefit; and such acceptance was written upon the said bill of exchange, and was as follows:—“Accepted, 2d October 1837, at the London Joint Stock Bank, Geo. Pollard.”

That the said word “at,” included in the said words “Accepted, 2d October 1837, at the London Joint Stock Bank, Geo. Pollard,” was fraudulently inserted for the purpose of defrauding the public and the plaintiffs; and that the said bill of exchange was really accepted by the London Joint Stock Bank, and the London Joint Stock Bank held themselves and their assets responsible and liable to pay the same.

That, after the said bill of exchange had been so accepted, plaintiffs caused it again to be taken to the office of the London Joint Stock Bank, and required [305] an acceptance in words according to the tenor of the bill of exchange; and in answer to such requisition, one of the clerks of the London Joint Stock Bank stated that the acceptance was sufficient, and that the London Joint Stock Bank were ready and willing to discount the bill.

That on the 26th day of October 1837 plaintiffs caused their solicitors to write and send to the London Joint Stock Bank the following letter:—

“ 26th October 1837.

“ Gentlemen,—The attention of the governor and directors of the Bank of England has been drawn to bills of exchange which have recently appeared drawn by a bank in Upper Canada, for which it appears you act as London agents, upon your manager, and accepted at your office. The bank are advised that the acceptance of such bills, having less than six months to run, is a violation of their exclusive privilege, and we request to know whether it is intended to persist in the practice, as in that case we are instructed to take immediate proceedings to obtain an injunction from a court of equity.”

That the secretary to the London Joint Stock Bank by their direction, in answer to such last-mentioned letter, wrote and sent to plaintiffs' solicitors, on the 2d November 1837, the following letter:—

“ London Joint Stock Bank, 2d November 1837.

“ Gentlemen,—Your letter of the 26th ult., addressed to the directors of this bank, was laid before the board yesterday, and in reply thereto I am instructed to state, that the directors deny that any practice has been adopted by the London Joint Stock Bank which is a violation of [306] the exclusive privilege of the bank of England, the London Joint Stock Bank never having accepted, nor directed nor authorized their manager or any other person to accept, any bills of exchange having less than six months to run.”

The bill amongst other things charged, that the directors had authorized George Pollard to accept bills of exchange and promissory notes drawn upon the Joint Stock Bank company, in the manner and form in which the said bill of exchange, dated the 25th day of July 1837, had been accepted by Pollard.

That the form of acceptance had been resorted to in consequence of the acts of parliament giving such privilege as aforesaid to the plaintiffs, and with the intent and for the purpose of evading, eluding, or avoiding the operation of the said acts.

The bill likewise charged, that George Pollard had no connexion with the Commercial Bank, Upper Canada, in his individual character, and had held no correspondence with the Commercial Bank, Upper Canada, except as manager, agent, or servant of the London Joint Stock Bank.

That all the bills of exchange accepted by George Pollard were debited in books of account against the London Joint Stock Bank, and that the said bills of exchange were paid out of monies belonging to the said London Joint Stock Bank.

And the bill prayed, that an account might be taken of all bills of exchange and promissory notes accepted or caused to be accepted, or authorized to be accepted by the said defendants for or on behalf of the company, or accepted or caused to be accepted by the said London Joint Stock Bank company, payable at a less [307] time than six months from the acceptance thereof, and particularly of all bills of exchange and promissory notes drawn upon the said London Joint Stock Bank, accepted by George Pollard or any agent of the London Joint Stock Bank, in the form in which the bill of exchange dated the 25th day of July 1837 was accepted, payable at less time than six months from the acceptance thereof, and of the gains and profits of the said London Joint Stock Bank made by accepting the same; and that they might pay the amount of such gains and profits to plaintiffs; and that it might be declared, that the accepting by George Pollard of the said bill of exchange, dated the 25th day of July 1837, was a fraud upon plaintiffs; and that the said defendants might be restrained, during the continuance of the privileges so granted to plaintiffs, from accepting or causing to be accepted, for or on behalf of the said London Joint Stock Bank, any bill of exchange or promissory note payable at less than six months from the acceptance thereof, and from accepting or causing to be accepted by George Pollard or any agent of theirs, in the form in which the said bill of exchange dated the 25th day of July 1837 was accepted, any bill of exchange or promissory note drawn upon the said London Joint Stock Bank, payable at less time than six months from the acceptance thereof; and that the defendant George Pollard, and every agent and servant of the London

Joint Stock Bank, might in like manner be restrained from accepting any bill of exchange or promissory note in the form in which the said bill of exchange dated the 25th day of July 1837 was accepted, and that all the said defendants might in like manner be restrained from in any other manner borrowing, owing, [308] or taking up in England, for and on behalf of the said London Joint Stock Bank company or partnership, any sum or sums of money on the bills or notes of the said London Joint Stock Bank company or partnership, payable on demand or at any less time than six months from the borrowing thereof; and that the said London Joint Stock Bank, and each and every partner therein or shareholder thereof, might in like manner be restrained from accepting or causing to be accepted, for and on behalf of the said London Joint Stock Bank, any such bill of exchange or promissory note as aforesaid, and from in any other manner borrowing, owing, and taking up in England, for and on the behalf of the said London Joint Stock Bank, any sum or sums of money on such bills or notes as aforesaid of the said London Joint Stock Bank.

The appellants, except George Pollard, were the directors of the London Joint Stock Bank. They filed a joint and several answer; and George Pollard, who was the manager, but not a director, partner, or shareholder, filed a separate answer.

By these answers it appeared that on the 21st November 1836 the London Joint Stock Bank commenced business, and a deed of copartnership was executed, dated the 31st day of October 1836, between some of the directors of the first part, and the other directors who were trustees of the second part, and the several other persons whose names and seals were or should be subscribed and affixed thereto of the third part; whereby it was provided, that the business of the company should at all times be under the control of nineteen directors being shareholders, and that they should have the entire management of the business of the company, and ma-[309]-nagement and ordering of the capital and effects of the company, and the appointment and removal of every officer or servant of the company; and such person or persons as they should authorize should have the power to sign, draw, endorse, or accept all bills of exchange, promissory notes, and other negotiable securities; and the appointment of four or more persons to be trustees for the company, by whom all such contracts might be made as the directors might think fit, and all instruments might be made, on behalf of the company; and it was provided, that the directors might execute any power of attorney enabling any person to act on behalf of the company in any business or matter which should be stated in such power of attorney.

That at a board of directors, holden on the 19th of November 1836, the directors authorized Mr. George Pollard, manager of the bank, exclusively to endorse all such bills of exchange, promissory notes, and other negotiable securities, and to draw such checks, in the name or on account of the company or the trustees thereof, as might be necessary in the usual course of business.

In consequence of a letter received by Mr. Pollard, on the 22d of April 1837, from Mr. Harper, the cashier of the Commercial Bank of the Midland District, Upper Canada, to know upon what terms the London Joint Stock Bank would undertake their agency in London, and after the letter of the 27th April 1837, before stated, had been written by the bank of England, at a board holden on the 6th of May 1837 it was resolved, that a communication should be made to the Commercial Bank, Upper Canada, stating their readiness to accept [310] their account, on condition that their drafts to the extent of £40,000 on the manager of the London Joint Stock Bank be accepted by him in his individual capacity.

On the same day Pollard wrote a letter to Mr. Harper, stating that by the charter of the bank of England no joint stock bank could accept bills of exchange in London, or within sixty-five miles of it, at a less date than six months at least; but proposing, that, instead of their drawing bills requiring an acceptance, they should either issue promissory notes payable at the London Joint Stock Bank, or should draw upon him in the following form:—"To George Pollard, esquire, manager of the London Joint Stock Bank, London:" and that the due payment of his acceptances should be guaranteed by the London Joint Stock Bank.

On the 22d day of July 1837 George Pollard received from Harper a letter, dated Kingston, 21st June 1837, stating that the board of the Canada bank had taken into consideration both the modes proposed, so as not to come within the power of the act in favour of the Bank of England, and preferred that of drawing on Pollard as manager at sixty days sight, being the dates at which bills were commonly negotiated, and which the public would prefer; and desiring that a guarantee of the bank might be sent to protect the drafts of the president of the Canada bank. This letter was submitted to a board of directors of the London Joint Stock Bank, holden on the 26th day of July 1837, when it was resolved, that in conformity with the request of the Kingston Commercial Bank, of the Midland District, Upper Canada, a letter should be written to the president and directors of such bank, enclosing [311] two of the printed forms of agreement, signed by the trustees of this bank, with the following additional words:—"And that the said London Joint Stock Bank will provide on your behalf the necessary funds to pay at maturity all such bills as may be drawn by the said bank upon and accepted by Mr. George Pollard, manager of the said London Joint Stock Bank, such bills being accepted by him in his individual capacity, with a request that the president and directors will return one of the said agreements, signed by them."

On the 29th day of July 1837 the directors of the London Joint Stock Bank, in pursuance of such resolution, caused their secretary to write to the president and directors of the Commercial Bank a letter approving of the mode of drawing, and enclosing agreements, one signed by the trustees of the London Joint Stock Bank, whereby they engaged that the capital stock and funds of the company should be liable for any balance that might become due to the Kingston Commercial Bank on their accounts with it, and that the London Joint Stock Bank would provide the necessary funds to pay at maturity all such bills as might be drawn by the Kingston bank upon and accepted by Mr. George Pollard, manager of the said London Joint Stock Bank; the other to be signed by the president of the Kingston bank, whereby the Kingston bank contracted to pay to the trustees of the London Joint Stock Bank on demand such sums of money as might at any time be due from them to the London Joint Stock Bank.

The president of the Commercial Bank drew the bill of exchange dated the 25th July 1837, which was accepted by Pollard in the way mentioned in the bill; [312] and it was afterwards agreed between Pollard and Harper that the bills should be addressed "to George Pollard, esquire, at the London Joint Stock Bank, London," omitting the word "manager."

The appellants denied that they had authorized George Pollard to accept any bill of exchange drawn upon the London Joint Stock Bank, and George Pollard denied that he had accepted the same on their behalf, but that the same was accepted on behalf of himself and for the benefit of the Commercial Bank in Canada; and they denied that the assets of the Joint Stock Bank were liable for the payment thereof, but they admitted that the London Joint Stock Bank, in conformity with the arrangement entered into between them and the Kingston Commercial Bank, out of money belonging to the said Commercial Bank in the possession of the London Joint Stock Bank, or out of their own money, from time to time paid all the bills of exchange of the said Commercial Bank drawn upon and accepted by Pollard in the form following; that is to say, addressed sometimes "To George Pollard, esquire, manager of the London Joint Stock Bank, London," and at other times "To George Pollard, esquire, manager, London Joint Stock Bank, London;" and accepted at first, "Accepted (date) at the London Joint Stock Bank,—George Pollard," and subsequently, "Accepted (date), payable at the London Joint Stock Bank,—George Pollard;" and Pollard denied that the bills of exchange were entered in the books of the London Joint Stock Bank, but were entered in his own private book; but when paid, the amount of the payments was entered in the books of the London Joint Stock Bank.

On the coming in of the answers notice was given to [313] the appellants that a motion would be made before the Master of the Rolls to restrain the appellants, the directors of the London Joint Stock Bank, and their officers, from accepting or causing to be accepted bills of exchange or promissory notes payable at less than six months from the acceptance thereof.

On the 5th day of May 1838 the motion came on to be heard before the Master of the Rolls, and on the 16th day of June an order was made, restraining the society or partnership called the London Joint Stock Bank, and every partner therein, and the appellant George Pollard, and every clerk, servant, or agent of the same partnership, from accepting or causing to be accepted in the name of the said partnership, or in the name of the said George Pollard or any other name, on behalf of the said partnership, in the course of their banking transactions, any bill or bills of exchange payable on demand or at any time less than six months from the acceptance thereof.

From the order of the 16th day of June 1838 the appellants appealed, and the appeal came on to be argued, the judges being present.

Mr. Kindersley for the Appellants.—The words upon which the question turns are the same in all the acts:—"That it shall not be lawful for any body politic other than the Bank of England, or other persons united in covenants or partnership exceeding the number of six persons in England, to borrow, owe, or take up any sum or sums of money on their bills or notes payable on demand or at any less time than six months from the borrowing thereof," limited by the [314] 7th George the 4th, c. 46. to the distance of sixty-five miles from London. The object of this clause in the acts was not to prevent an individual but a number of persons issuing paper upon which they might be sued. The acts must be construed strictly, as being in restraint of trade. The word "owing" comes between "borrowing" and "taking up;" there must be an owing in the nature of a borrowing and taking up. If Pollard was alone liable upon the bill of exchange, how can it be said that it was the bill of the London Joint Stock Bank; they were liable upon their guarantee, but not upon their bill. Thomas v. Bishop (2 Strange, 955), Leadbitter v. Farrer (5 Maule and Selwyn, 345), Emly v. Lye (15 East, 7), Jackson v. Hudson (2 Campbell, 447).

George Pollard was not authorized by the London Joint Stock Bank to accept bills on their behalf; it was his individual acceptance, and the acceptance of no other person.

Sir Frederick Pollock and Mr. Pemberton for the Respondents.—This case has been disposed of by Anderson and the bank of England. The Joint Stock Bank are the acceptors of this bill, and if an action were brought evidence might be adduced to show that it was an acceptance by the bank, by the means of their agent. The bank absolutely engages to pay the bills out of their own funds; it does not guarantee the payment, only in case of the death or bankruptcy of Pollard; and Pollard has no connexion with the Kingston bank except what arises from his being manager of the London Joint Stock Bank. From such a state of facts [315] it would follow that this was a mode adopted by them of accepting bills through their agent George Pollard, and that was the name in which they chose to accept bills and carry on business. If, supposing the bank had drawn their bills in the name of John Stiles, and it could be shown that they were paid at and by the bank, can any body doubt that a jury would find that the bank would be liable? If an agent makes a contract in his own name for his principal, it is competent for a jury to find that the name was used on behalf of the principal, and make the principal liable upon the contract.

The Joint Stock Bank owes the money due upon the bill; it is equally a debt, though the day of payment is postponed. This bill has been accepted by Pollard with a view fraudulently to evade the law; and, with the exception of Scotch marriages, all acts done to evade a law are fraudulent. An attempt to evade the stamp laws by passing over to another country would be void. Though an action could not be maintained against the Joint Stock Bank upon their bill, yet they may be shown to have violated the privileges of the bank; Collis v. Emmet (1 H. Blackstone, 313), Minet v. Gibson (3 Term Reports, 481), Farlee v. Herring (3 Bing. 625), Wilson v. Barthrop (2 Meeson and Welsby, 863), Thomas v. Bishop (2 Strange, 955), Leadbitter v. Farrow (5 Maule and Selwyn, 345).

It is said, will a court of equity interfere to prevent a violation of the stamp acts? No, any more than it will interfere to prevent smuggling, because it is not founded upon contract. This contract is founded upon valuable consideration—advances by the bank.

[316] Sir William Follett in reply.—This judgment cannot be supported by the law of England. The Bank of England v. Anderson (2 Keen, 328), decided, upon an inland bill, that it was a borrowing, owing, and taking up at interest of an inland bill. The judges confined themselves to the particular point decided by them, but declined to give an opinion whether more than six persons not in trade can accept a bill. This is the case of a foreign bill; the consequences of this judgment would be that more than six persons accepting a bill of exchange would violate the acts of parliament; Harvey v. Kay (9 B. and C. 363), Bramah v. Roberts (9 Bingham, N. C. 963).

The East India Company has been in the habit of accepting bills of exchange at a less period than six months. The words of the act are, a borrowing, owing, and taking up money on their bills; there is no prohibition of their accepting bills of exchange. In every act bill of exchange is described as bill of exchange, and in no other terms.

The guarantee is not the guarantee of the company, but of six individuals, who cannot bind the company. The company is not liable to be sued upon it, but only the six individuals. The Joint Stock Bank is not liable to sue or be sued by their agent. Assuming that the Joint Stock Bank were liable upon the bill, it is not liable beyond its guarantee; but Pollard was liable upon the bill, and it is a settled principle of law that two persons cannot be liable. Thomas v. Bishop decides that the company is not liable. If it were necessary to inquire into the liability of parties, the negotiability of [317] bills would be entirely destroyed. There cannot be two acceptors of a bill of exchange; there is a series of authorities to show that if persons are not parties to a bill they cannot be sued upon it; Emly v. Lye.

The Joint Stock Bank could only be liable upon the ground that the name of Pollard was their name of business. There cannot be two principal joint debtors; it is an engagement from Pollard to pay the bill, with a guarantee from the Joint Stock Bank. But does this Joint Stock Bank owe money on their bills? It is not a borrowing of money, but an actual advance by them, and it must be a borrowing, owing, and taking up in England.

At the time of the establishment of the bank by the statute of Anne bills of exchange were perfectly well-known. Foreign bills depend upon the general law of merchants; no act of parliament has altered or interfered with foreign bills; they stand upon the general commercial law of the world; they were negotiable and transferable, no others were negotiable. But banks were perfectly well known. The goldsmiths notes are acknowledgment on receipt of money; not transferable, but only payable to bearer. The 5th and 6th of William the Third enabled them to issue bills and notes. In all the acts there is a distinction between bills and bills of exchange.

The words of this statute do not apply to borrowing. When is the borrowing? Is it at the time Pollard accepts the bill? Suppose it is not accepted, is it a borrowing? No actual borrowing, no liability on the bill. Whether there is any owing depends upon circumstances. When do they owe? But then it is said that it is a fraudulent evasion of an act of parliament. Is there any such case [318] as an evasion of an act of parliament? If it comes within the meaning of an act of parliament it is illegal; if otherwise, it is not. If a person goes abroad for the purpose of writing on unstamped paper, he may do it. A gift, with a power of revocation, for the purpose of evading the legacy duty, is good. A fraudulent preference is not an evasion of the act, but it is within its provisions. A person going to a foreign country to evade the laws of marriage may do it. Instead of having the advantage of the banker's acceptance, there is only the acceptance of Pollard. The public is not deceived; the object of the acts was to prevent a number of persons pledging their credit. There is no difference between a court of equity and a court of law in the construction of an act of parliament; if it is a violation of the law, it is a violation of the rules of equity; but not otherwise. The Master of the Rolls says that these bills must be considered their bills. How is it their bill? A foreign bill drawn by the Canada company. It is not issued on the credit of the Joint Stock Bank; no credit, but a foreign bank, and accepted by an individual. It is no part of the circulating medium of the country. It differs from the Bank of England v. Anderson in three particulars:—first, it is a foreign bill of exchange; second, accepted; third, there are funds in the hands of the bank to answer the demand.

Lord Chancellor (9th July).—If any doubt was entertained with respect to the accuracy of the decision in the case of the Bank of England v. Anderson [2 Keen 328], this House would not proceed to adjudicate upon this case, assuming that to be the law; but this House would call upon the [319] learned counsel to argue the case upon that ground, in order that it might come to a conclusion whether that was an accurate decision or not, having the advantage of the assistance of the learned judges. But after examining that case, I certainly cannot bring myself to entertain any doubt with respect to the accuracy of the law there laid down, and I cannot conceive that the appellants have lost anything by its being assumed, for the purpose of the argument, that that case was properly decided.

Then, if we are to take that to be the law, the question is, how far the circumstances of this case create any distinction, so as to make the rule of law inapplicable to this case which was applied to the circumstances in the case of the bank of England v. Anderson? And in proposing the questions for the judges, your Lordships object will be so to put them as to draw from the learned judges an opinion, how far the difference of the circumstances in the two cases would affect the decision in point of law.

There are three circumstances relied upon as distinguishing this case from the case to which I have referred: the first is, that the bill of exchange that was accepted in that case was an inland bill of exchange, and in the present case it is a foreign bill of exchange. The next circumstance, and the most important one, no doubt, is the mode in which the acceptance was made, not being made by the company nor in the name of the company, but by George Pollard, under the circumstances that appear upon the face of these proceedings. And another circumstance is, that in the case of the bank of England v. Anderson it was a fact stated, that at the time the company accepted the bill they had [320] funds in their hands equal to the amount for which the bill was accepted; whereas in this case the contract is not confined to the circumstance of the company in London having funds in hand, but it is part of the contract that they should accept bills, looking to the company in Canada remitting the money, though not in hand at the time, but in time to meet the acceptance when due. With regard to the first point I do not perceive how there can be any distinction between the two cases, arising from the circumstance of the bill being a foreign bill in the one case and an inland bill in the other. The object of the acts of parliament is to protect the bank of England; and what they had to guard against, and which they have endeavoured to guard against, is the credit attached to a paper circulation within certain limits, arising from the credit of more than six persons being associated together within those limits; and therefore the circumstance of a transaction within the prescribed limits, having its origin beyond the limits of this country, does not appear to me to affect this question.

The first question is, "The London Joint Stock Bank, under circumstances which would have made it illegal in them as a company, and a violation of the rights and privileges of the bank of England, to have accepted and issued the bills herein-after mentioned, if drawn upon them, enter into an agreement with a bank in Canada to procure bills, drawn by such bank upon George Pollard, the manager of the London Joint Stock Bank, to be accepted by the said George Pollard, and to provide funds for the due payment of such bills, the money transaction arising therefrom being, in the accounts between the two banks, to be [321] treated in all respects as transactions between the said two banks. Is the acceptance of such bills by the said George Pollard in execution of this agreement lawful, regard being had to the acts in force respecting the bank of England?" That raises the question, how far the mode of acceptance excludes the transaction from the operation of those acts, or includes it within it.

The next question will be, "Would the acceptance of such bills be lawful, assuming that the London Joint Stock Bank, at the time of such acceptances, had funds in their hands on account of the bank in Canada, equal to the amount of the bills so accepted?"

The third question is to meet the case of their not having such funds; "Would the acceptance of such bills be lawful, assuming that the London Joint Stock Bank had not at the time of such acceptances any funds in hand belonging to the bank in Canada, but that such bills were accepted upon the credit of a contract by such bank to remit sufficient funds to the London Joint Stock Bank, to meet such acceptances before the time at which the bills would become payable?"

There is another mode in which this question might be tried, namely, Whether the transactions that took place would or would not have entitled the bank of England to have brought an action against the London Joint Stock Bank, for a violation of the privileges which the acts of parliament are supposed to confer upon them?

Another question, also, which might be raised, and upon which we should have the opinion of the learned judges, is, whether what has taken place is such [322] a violation of the acts of parliament as would subject the parties to a prosecution by way of indictment? To meet those points I propose to submit to the learned judges a fourth question in these words: "Could the bank of England maintain any action against the London Joint Stock Bank founded upon such transactions, or would any of the parties therein be liable to be personally proceeded against by way of indictment under either of the states of circumstances above supposed?" That last question, which applies to the action and prosecution, merely states the same proposition in two ways; it would be better to confine the last question to the liability of the parties to an action.

Lord Chief Justice Tindal (20th July).—My Lords, the facts stated by your Lordships as the ground-work of the questions proposed to Her Majesty's judges are these:—

The London Joint Stock Bank, under circumstances which would have made it illegal in them as a company, and a violation of the rights and privileges of the bank of England, to have accepted and issued the bills hereinafter mentioned, if drawn upon them, enter into an agreement with a bank in Canada to procure bills, drawn by such bank upon George Pollard, the manager of the London Joint Stock Bank, to be accepted by the said George Pollard, and to provide funds for the due payment of such bills, the money transactions arising therefrom, being in the accounts between the two banks, to be treated in all respects as transactions between the said two banks; and the first question proposed by your [323] Lordships on this state of facts is, whether the acceptance of such bills by the said George Pollard in execution of this agreement is lawful, regard being had to the acts in force respecting the bank of England? In answer to that question I beg to state to your Lordships that it is the unanimous opinion of those judges who heard this case discussed at the bar of your Lordships House (Tindal, C. J.; Littledale, J.; Parke, B.; Bosanquet, J.; Patteson, J.; Gurney, B.; Williams, J.; Coleridge, J.; Coltman, J.; Maule, J.; Rolfe, B.), that, assuming, according to the terms of that question, that the acceptance of such bills by the London Joint Stock Bank, if drawn directly on that company, would have been illegal and a violation of the rights and privileges of the bank of England, it appears to us to be a necessary consequence that the procurement by the London bank that bills drawn upon George Pollard, their manager, shall be accepted by the said George Pollard, under the agreement above stated for the providing of funds for the due payment of such bills, must equally be a violation of the rights and privileges of the bank of England, upon the principle that whatever is prohibited by law to be done directly cannot legally be effected by an indirect and circuitous contrivance.

The exclusive privileges conferred on the bank of England by parliament are founded on a contract between that body and the public. For the original grant, and also for the renewal and confirmation of such privileges, the bank of England has from time to time paid very large sums of money to the public, and no member of that public can justify either doing or procuring to be done any act which, for the protection of [324] such rights and privileges, has been forbidden by law. Now it is impossible not to see that the substantial parties to the transaction stated by your Lordships are the Canada bank and the London Joint Stock Bank, and that the manager used to cover the real transaction. It is the London bank, not the manager, who is to pay the bill, and the Canada bank engages to remit funds for that purpose before the bill becomes due. By means of this transaction the London bank takes upon itself the duty of an acceptor, that is, to pay the bill, not in default of the nominal acceptor, but in the first instance, in consideration of an arrangement that funds shall be remitted by the Canada bank (the drawers) for that purpose to them, the London bank. The plain object and intent of the various statutes which have been passed for the protection of the bank of England is, that the funds of a joint stock banking company shall not be pledged for the payment of a bill issued within a limited distance from London, and having less than six months to run. Such a pledge given by the acceptance of a bill by such a company has already been decided, by the case of the bank of England v. Anderson, to be a violation of the rights and privileges of the bank of England. But if the bill be accepted by a servant or nominee of the banking company, and they contract with the drawer that they, the company, will pay it, their funds are bound for the payment; the bill is circulated upon their credit, not upon that of their servant or nominee, for it is impossible to suppose for a moment that bills accepted in such form and under such circumstances can be circulated in London upon the individual credit of the [325] nominal acceptor, or upon any other credit than that of the banking company, by whose procurement and direction and for whose benefit the acceptance is really given.

The consequence of such a transaction is, that a competition is necessarily created between a paper currency circulating upon the credit of the banking company and the paper issued by the bank of England, which is the very mischief intended to be prevented, for it is obvious that if the transaction is legal with respect to a bill at less than six months, it is equally so with respect to a bill at six days, or even at a shorter period. It is contended, on the part of the London Joint Stock Bank, that they are authorized to take any course with impunity which does not fall directly within the precise terms and letter of the prohibitory clauses, contained in the several acts which secure the privileges of the bank of England. It is to be recollected, however, that the clauses protecting those privileges are not merely prohibitory laws. The privilege granted to the bank of England by parliament is a positive right, conferred upon that body for a valuable consideration, which the law will no more permit to be infringed by third persons without responsibility than it will a monopoly, granted by letters patent under the statute of James the First. If, therefore, the acceptance of a bill by the London bank would be an infringement of such privilege, it cannot be less an infringement, if attended with the same injurious consequences to the bank of England, to procure another person to accept the bill for the benefit of the London bank, though such acceptance be made in the name of their appointed nominee, whom they are bound to indemnify.

[326] The second question proposed by your Lordships upon the above statement of facts is this, Whether the acceptance of such bills would be lawful, assuming that the London Joint Stock Bank at the time of such acceptances had funds in their hands on account of the bank in Canada equal to the amount of the bills so accepted?

And if the answer given to the first question be correct, the acceptance by a person procured for that purpose by the London Joint Stock Bank must be considered in the same light as if the acceptance had been made by the banking company in its own name; and if that be so, the answer to the second question will be found in the opinion given by the Court of Common Pleas to the Master of the Rolls, upon a case stated to that Court, and confirmed by that noble and learned judge, in the case of the bank of England v. Anderson [2 Keen 328]. The opinion of the Court of Common Pleas upon this point was thus expressed:—"The relation of debtor and creditor, created by the acceptance of the bill, appears to be considered by the legislature as equivalent to the actual borrowing of the money, owed on the one hand and credited on the other." And the Master of the Rolls, when reviewing the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas, says, "From the time of borrowing means from the time of owing the money on the bills or notes referred to, or, in the case now under consideration, from the time of the acceptance." This case of the bank of England v. Anderson was very fully argued, and was much considered both in the court of law and in the court of equity. From the latter court an appeal might have been made to your Lordships House; such an appeal, indeed, is said to [327] have been at first made, but afterwards abandoned, and the decision of the courts of law and equity was thereby acquiesced in. The authority of this case was not disputed in the argument at your Lordships bar upon the present occasion, and we see no reason to doubt the propriety of the opinions therein expressed.

The third question proposed is this: Would the acceptance of such bills be lawful, assuming that the London Joint Stock Bank had not at the time of such acceptances any funds in hand belonging to the bank in Canada, but that such bills were accepted on the credit of a contract by such bank to remit sufficient funds to the London Joint Stock Bank to meet such acceptances before the time at which the bills would become payable? And, notwithstanding the difference in the state of facts adverted to in this question, it appears to us, that the answer we must give to it is the same as that which we have already given to the second question.

If a bill be accepted upon the undertaking of the drawer to supply funds for the payment of it, a mutual contract of lending on the one hand and borrowing on the other is thereby created; and, although the drawer may not fulfil his engagement by actually remitting the amount agreed upon before the acceptance, or even before the day on which the bill becomes due, the transaction is not the less a transaction of lending and borrowing to the amount of the money represented by the bill; which transaction takes effect as "a borrowing upon the bill" as soon as the bill is accepted. If, therefore, the bill be drawn, under such an engagement as above mentioned, at less than six months from the date, it must necessarily be considered as a bill payable [328] at less than six months from the borrowing of the money.

It is manifest that the introduction into the acts of the word "borrowing" instead of "date," to express the time of the currency of the bill, was only resorted to for the purpose of preventing the issue of bills appearing to be drawn at longer periods than six months from the date, but in fact issued at periods when the bill would fall due within a shorter time than six months from the issuing of them; and it is to be observed that bills or notes payable on demand are prohibited absolutely, without reference to any transaction of borrowing, upon which they may have been issued. The word "borrowing" is only employed with respect to bills and notes payable at a future time, in order to designate the period from which the six months are to be reckoned. A "borrowing" is assumed to exist as soon as the banking company begins to owe the money specified in the bill or note, that is, as soon as the acceptance or the note is put in circulation; and the expression "borrowing" is not used as descriptive of the consideration upon which the debt contracted by the bill or note is founded, but to denote the time from which the six months are to begin to run.

The last question proposed to us is this: Could the bank of England maintain any action against the London Joint Stock Bank, founded upon such transactions under either of the states of circumstances above supposed? And, in answer to this question, we are of opinion that an action might be maintained in either case.

It has already been observed, in answer to your Lordships first question, that the exclusive privilege [329] secured to the bank of England by parliament is in the nature of a right, granted to them by contract for valuable consideration. In the possession of such right they are entitled to be protected, and any infringement of such right is a private injury to that body, for which they are enabled to seek redress by action at law. Whether the right so granted be directly assailed by an act of the London bank in its own name, or through the medium and intervention of another person acting at their request, and by their procurement and for their benefit,—if they do or cause to be done in effect (though under cover of doing something different) that which is forbidden to be done by the acts passed for the purpose of securing to the bank of England the rights which they have contracted for, such banking company is, in our opinion, liable to be sued in an action on the case for an infringement of those rights.

In actions for the infringement of patent rights, it is of constant recurrence that the gravamen is laid, not as a direct infringement, but as something amounting to a colourable evasion of the right secured to the party; and we think that the acts of the London Joint Stock Bank, described in the foregoing questions put by your Lordships, do amount to an infringement of the rights and privileges of the bank of England.

Lord Chancellor.—The magnitude of the interests which are involved in the appeal, upon which the Lord Chief Justice has given your Lordships the benefit of the unanimous opinion of the learned judges, is such that I cannot regret that we have had the opinion of the learned judges; although it did not appear to me, on the argument, that any difficulty likely to arise [330] would have made it necessary to have taken the opinion of the learned judges, assuming that the law, as laid down in The Bank of England v. Anderson [2 Keen, 328], is good law, as to which no reasonable doubt can be entertained, and as to which I am very glad to find that the Lord Chief Justice has taken the opportunity of stating the opinion of the learned judges. There really can be no doubt as to the proper decision of the present question, because, if these rights do belong to the bank, established as they are, and as they are asserted in the case of The Bank of England v. Anderson, it is quite impossible that those rights should be permitted to be destroyed by the arrangement which was resorted to in the present case. That appears to be the ground upon which the learned judges have come to the opinion of which they have now given your Lordships the benefit. It is an opinion I entertained from the commencement of the argument, and under those circumstances I move your Lordships, that the order of the Court below be affirmed, with costs.

Lord Brougham.—I entirely agree in opinion on this case with my noble and learned friend; indeed, I must say, as he has stated, that I never have entertained any doubt at all upon this case; and more especially when it is placed upon the footing on which it is here put, that of adopting the case of The Bank of England v. Anderson, and applying the principle laid down in that case to the facts of this case; and the facts in this case do not appear to me, any more than to my noble and learned friend or the learned judges, to be different. We must in future consider that The Bank of England v. Anderson, though originally a decision of only one [331] court, has now received the sanction of all the learned judges, of whose assistance your Lordships have had the benefit in this case; and the affirmance of the judgment in this case is in fact an affirmance of the judgment in The Bank of England v. Anderson, for the case stands on precisely the same principle.

Petition and appeal dismissed, and the order therein complained of affirmed, with costs.

ROBERT SIMPSON,—Appellant; JAMES O'SULLIVAN, HONORA O'SULLIVAN, and JOHN KEANE,—Respondents [20th July 1840].

[Mews' Dig. i. 103, 356; x. 1268, 1574; xiv. 1374. S.C. 7 Cl. and F. 550; and see 3 Dr. and War. 446; Dr. 89. See Hinds v. Hinds, 1850, 2 Ir. Ch. R. 230; Makings v. Makings, 1860, 1 De G. F. and F. 355; Balfour v. Cooper, 1883, 23 Ch.D. 472, as to interest. On point as to priority of powers, cited with approval in In re Creagh, 1890, 25 L.R. Ir. 140.]

By marriage settlement leasehold property is conveyed to trustees, to the use of James O'Sullivan for life, and after his death, to pay £100 a year, by way of jointure, to his wife for her life; and subject thereto, to the use of the heirs male of their bodies; with liberty for J. O'Sullivan to raise by deed, mortgage, or other writing, £1000, to be applied to any purpose he should please; but not to be raised by sale of the property. J. O'Sullivan mortgages his interest in the leasehold property and the £1000 for securing a debt, and becomes bankrupt. The bankrupt's interest therein being sold upon the death of the bankrupt, the purchaser files a bill against the quasi tenant in tail, the widow of the bankrupt, and the surviving trustee of the settlement, in whom the legal estate is vested, for the purpose of raising the sum of £1000 by sale of the leasehold property. Held, that an inquiry, directed upon the hearing of the cause, as to what was the annual value of the property and the value of the life interest of the bankrupt therein at the time of the sale, was an immaterial inquiry, and had no reference to what was to be adjudicated between the parties to the cause.

Semble, that the £1000 is a prior charge to the jointure of £100 per annum.

[333] James O'Sullivan the elder was possessed of all that part of the lands called the island or bog of Monamucky, otherwise Labonamucky, with its appurtenances, for a term of 999 years, by virtue of a certain indenture of lease of the 29th April 1795; and having built several houses on part thereof, on the 10th of May 1805 demised unto Jonathan Smith and Joshua Smith, both of the city of Limerick, a certain part of the said lands and tenements; viz., all that piece or plot of building ground in and connected with New Clare Street, set out and described in a map annexed to the said lease, being part of the said bog of Monamucky, otherwise Labonamucky, for a term of 889 years, reserving thereout a yearly profit rent of £317 8s. sterling, to be paid half-yearly.

By indenture dated the 25th January 1808 between the said James O'Sullivan of the first part, James O'Sullivan the younger, second son of the said James O'Sullivan the elder, of the second part, the said respondent John Keane, and William Ferguson, of the third part, and the said respondent Honora O'Sullivan, then Honora Keane, of the fourth part, being the settlement executed previously to and in contemplation of a marriage, which was afterwards had and solemnized between James O'Sullivan, junior, with Honora Keane, James O'Sullivan the elder conveyed unto the said John Keane and William Ferguson, their executors, administrators, and assigns, all that piece or plot of building ground so demised to the said Jonathan and Joshua Smith by the said James O'Sullivan, and also one of the houses in Clare Street in the said city of Limerick, built by the said James, viz., the house next Mrs. Gavin's, and then lately occupied by Mrs. Dwyer, [334] discharged from all rents, taxes, and charges whatsoever, save window and hearth tax for the said house, to hold the said several premises to James O'Sullivan the younger for life, and from and after his decease, upon trust, to pay £100 sterling per annum to Honora, his said intended wife, and her assigns, for life, for her jointure, and subject thereto, to the use of the heirs male of the body of the said Honora by the said James her intended husband lawfully to be begotten, and for want of issue lawfully to be begotten between the said Honora and the said James, to the use and behoof of the said James O'Sullivan the younger, as his absolute profit; and it was by the said indenture of settlement covenanted by and between the said several parties thereto, that James O'Sullivan the younger should be at liberty to raise, by deed, mortgage, or by any other writing, a sum of £1000, to be applied to any purpose James O'Sullivan the younger should please, but that the same was not to be raised by way of the sale of the said lands, tenements, and hereditaments aforesaid.

That the said Jonathan Smith and Joshua Smith having suffered a considerable arrear of rent, reserved by the said lease of the 10th of May 1805, to accrue due, an ejectment for nonpayment of rent was, some time in the year 1809, brought against them by James O'Sullivan the younger and the trustees named in the said marriage settlement, who obtained judgment in the said ejectment suit, and the possession of the premises demised by the said lease was recovered under a writ of habere, which issued thereon.

By indenture of mortgage, dated the 24th day of January 1811, made between the said James O'Sullivan the younger, of the one part, and Quintin Hamilton, of [335] the other part, James O'Sullivan the younger assigned the estate comprised in the settlement, and appointed the sum of £1000, which he was thereby empowered to raise, to Quintin Hamilton, for securing the sum of £1500 lent to him by the house of Hamilton, Crowden, and Co., together with interest and costs, as therein mentioned, subject to a proviso that when the debt of £1500, with interest and costs, should be discharged, that then the said deed of mortgage should become void.

On or about the 1st of February 1817 a commission of bankruptcy was awarded and issued against James O'Sullivan the younger, who was thereunder duly found and declared a bankrupt; and Henry O'Sullivan of the city of Limerick, merchant, having been duly elected sole assignee of the estate and effects of the bankrupt, such estate and effects were accordingly duly conveyed and assigned to and vested in Henry O'Sullivan, as sole assignee under the commission.

On the 27th April 1818, under an order of the Court of Chancery, the bankrupt's estate in the premises comprised in the settlement, and his interest in the sum of £1000, were sold by auction to the appellant for £850; and by indenture of assignment of the 7th of October 1818, in consideration of £850 paid by the appellant to Quinton Hamilton, in part discharge of £967 19s. 10d. then due on his mortgage, were conveyed by Henry O'Sullivan and Quintin Hamilton to the appellant, his executors, administrators, and assigns, discharged, as to the £1000, from all equity of redemption. The equitable interest in the premises only passed under this conveyance, the legal estate therein being in the respondent John Keane, who was the surviving trustee under [336] the settlement. In the month of August 1836 James O'Sullivan the younger died, leaving the respondent James O'Sullivan, his eldest son by his marriage with Honora O'Sullivan, him surviving.

Under these circumstances, in the month of February 1837, the appellant filed his bill against the respondents, for the purpose, amongst other things, of its being declared that he was entitled to the said charge of £1000, and that the same, with interest, might be declared to affect the whole of the premises comprised in the settlement and mortgage, and that a sale thereof might be made for the payment of what might be found due to the appellant in respect of the said sum of £1000 and interest.

The respondent James O'Sullivan put in his answer to the bill, insisting that the appellant ought not to have been considered as a purchaser, the purchase money not exceeding four years and a half purchase of the premises; and the respondent Honora O'Sullivan submitted by her answer, that her jointure ought to be freed and discharged from all claims in respect of the charge of £1000.

On the 1st June 1833 the cause came on to be heard before the Lord High Chancellor of Ireland, when his Lordship ordered and decreed that it should be referred to the master, to inquire and report what was the annual value of the lands, tenements, and hereditaments comprised in and conveyed to the appellant by the deed of assignment, dated the 7th day of October 1818, at the time of the sale thereof to the appellant; and what was the value at such time of the life interest of James O'Sullivan, the bankrupt, therein at the time of such sale, having regard to the situation thereof at that time [337] with respect to the deeds of the 25th day of January 1808 and 24th January 1811; and his Lordship reserved further directions until the return of the master's report.

From this decree the present appeal is brought.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Reynolds for the Appellant.—These inquiries cannot affect the defendants in this case, or lead to any result. No further directions can be taken upon them, even if it should appear that an inadequate price had been obtained for the property; but such a case is not made by the record, nor is there any party before the Court interested in that question.

Mr. Knight Bruce and Mr. Wakefield for the Respondents.—The small sum which had been obtained for the property is a sufficient ground for inquiry. The difficulty is, that the right of the assignee is not represented. The question is, whether, upon such an extraordinary purchase, the Court ought to have proceeded without the assignee being made a party? What is the meaning of the power? The tenant for life of the jointure is not liable to be affected by the charge. What is to become of the widow, when a party has a right to enter and hold the profits? A jointure means immediate provision.

Lord Chancellor (20th July).—It is unnecessary to call upon the counsel for the appellant to reply. I think, as the matter now stands, there is an end of this inquiry. It is [338] clear that the defendant in this case can have nothing to do with any question as to the price paid, as between the vendor and the person who has purchased this property.

The tenant for life of the property in question had the power of raising £1000; he did so, and became bankrupt; and the party now plaintiff claims, under an assignment of 1818, the benefit of that mortgage of £1000 and the estate for life of the bankrupt, and, therefore, became entitled by his purchase to the estate for life of the bankrupt, and to whatever interest the bankrupt had created under this charge of £1000, which was to be enjoyed by any body who had made it the subject of purchase, and which enjoyment he had a right to enforce against any subsequent charge. And whether he gave too little, or whether he gave too much, for the purchase of that £1000, is a matter of perfect indifference to the party who represents the inheritance. He is not a person who can be prejudiced by his having given an inadequate sum for it, or purchased it under circumstances which would entitle a party really interested in that question to set it aside. The defendant has no right to come before the Court for any such purpose; and why should he? What does it signify whether the assignee of the bankrupt has any thing to say against that transaction? So long as it remains unimpeached, the plaintiff is entitled to all the advantages which can be derived from that purchase. The plaintiff, therefore, having become entitled to whatever belonged to the tenant for life, there cannot be a question that he is entitled to recover it in respect of this purchase, whatever objections may exist, though not proved, against the original transaction of 1818.

[339] It remains, therefore, to be considered what title the plaintiff acquired to that £1000! The settlement, certainly, is very inartificially framed, but I cannot conceive that there can be a doubt as to his having acquired an interest in that £1000, the power of creating which was, under the settlement, incident to the tenant for life, as appears from passages to be found in different parts of the deed. It is incident to the tenant for life, because it was a power to be executed by the tenant for life. He was tenant for life, with the power of raising by mortgage the sum of £1000 out of the estate; and I do not see any ground on which it can be said that this was intended to be a restricted power, as the provision is, that he shall be at liberty to raise by deed, mortgage, or by any other writing the sum of £1000, to be applied to any purposes he shall please. This power to raise by mortgage £1000, to be applied to any purposes he might please, was in addition to the value of the life estate he acquired. The jointure, of course, would come into operation only after the expiration of the life estate. It is not to be supposed, that if he had raised the £1000 the mortgagee was to be deprived of his interest, if the estate produced enough to raise that interest and also the £1000. It is not consistent with the practice of your Lordships' House to declare so much as to give an opinion beyond the immediate question, but as the question has been somewhat raised, I will say that I do not feel any doubt that the £1000, when raised, was to be a charge upon the estate from the period when it was raised, the interest to be paid by the tenant for life, and the party who lent the money to be the first person who had a charge upon the estate after the expiration of the tenancy for life.

[340] The Court below, under some misapprehension, probably, of the relative situation of these parties and their respective rights, has declined to make a decree for raising that £1000 from the produce of the estate, and has directed an inquiry and report "what was the annual value of the land, tenements, and hereditaments comprised in and conveyed to the appellant by the deed of assignment dated 7th October 1818, at the time of the sale thereof to the appellant, and what was the value at such time of the life interest of the said James O'Sullivan, the bankrupt, therein at the time of such sale, having regard to the situation thereof at that time with respect to the deeds of the 25th day of January 1808 and 24th January 1811." Now, it is obvious that the effect of that is, that it has no reference to what is to be adjudicated between the plaintiff and the defendant, and that whatever might be the result of that inquiry—whatever the Court might do upon it, it left the question between the plaintiff and the defendant where it was. That must have arisen from some misapprehension as to the situation in which those parties stood with regard to each other. It is clear, therefore, that that decree must be reversed. Your Lordships have before you a case in which the Court below, from a misapprehension of the course to be pursued, has directed an inquiry which does not touch any questions existing between the parties. It is the duty of this House, therefore, to remove that impediment by an assertion of the plaintiff's rights, and I apprehend that your Lordships, seeing that no decree has been made by the Court such as ought to have been made,—that the real question has not been entertained by the Court, in consequence of this mistake, the course [341] will be to declare the right, and then to leave the mode in which that right is to be enforced to the judgment of the Court below. I apprehend the order of the House, consistently with the practice, will be, to reverse the decree below, and to declare that the plaintiff is entitled, by virtue of the assignment of the 7th of October 1818, to the benefit of the charge created by the deed of the 24th of January 1811, and with this declaration to remit the cause, leaving to the Court below to make such decree as may be just and consistent with that declaration. That declaration will establish the plaintiff's title to the charge; the mode in which it is to be raised and the detail will be to be considered by the Court below, having the benefit of your Lordships' declaration as to the plaintiff's right, leaving the question open as to other matters. I do not know very well how that question with regard to the jointure could be declared; at the same time I have not much doubt about it; it is raised in the pleadings by the answer. Perhaps it might save the possibility of another appeal to declare the title, but there is a difficulty in doing it.

It is ordered, that the said decretal order, complained of in the said appeal, be reversed; and it is declared, that the plaintiff in the Court below became entitled, by virtue of the assignment of the 7th of October 1818, to the sum of £1000 under the deed of the 24th of January 1811, in addition to the life interest of the bankrupt, James O'Sullivan.

[342] ON A WRIT OF ERROR FROM THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

LAWRENCE GWYNNE, Esquire,—Plaintiff in Error; JOHN BURNELL and JOSEPH MERCERON, Esquires, (Survivors of JAMES COLLINS, Esquire, deceased),—Defendants in Error [4th July 1839 and 28th July 1840].

[S.C. 7 Cl. and F. 572.]

Payment of money received by a collector for a given year to the account of a former year, is a breach of the condition of a bond for due payment. It is not competent for a court of error to award a repleader.

To an action on a bond by the commissioners of taxes against the sureties, the defendant by plea states, that the collector had lands and goods of which the plaintiffs had notice: the replication asserts that he had no lands and goods of which they had notice; and the rejoinder asserts that the collector had lands and goods which might have been sold, but omits to put in issue that the commissioners had notice; whereupon issue is joined. The jury having found that the collector had lands and goods,—Held, that the issue being found for the defendant, he was entitled to a verdict, but not to judgment, inasmuch as the issue, if it were any issue at all, was immaterial or insufficient; and that judgment could not be entered for the plaintiff non obstante veredicto, as the rejoinder could not be taken to be an implied confession that the commissioners [343] had no notice; and the plea, if true, would form a good defence to the action. Nor, taking into consideration the other pleas, could judgment be entered up for the plaintiff on the whole record, as the plea, that the collector had lands of which the commissioners had notice, not being put in issue by the pleadings nor disproved, remains a good bar to the action.

The plaintiff in error, together with Richard Bigg, a collector of assessed taxes for the year 1828 ending the 5th April 1829, and Samuel Cordozo entered into a bond, dated the 27th day of August 1828, with the defendants and James Collins, deceased, as commissioners under the land tax and assessed taxes act, in the penal sum of £4048. The condition of the bond (amongst other things) was, that the said Richard Bigg should well and truly pay or cause to be paid unto the receiver general of the said taxes, rates, and duties for the county of Middlesex all such sum and sums of money as should come to his hands as such collector upon the days and at the times by the said acts appointed for the payment thereof, and according to the true intent and meaning of the said acts.

To an action brought on the bond by the commissioners against the sureties the defendants pleaded various pleas, but the only material plea was the second plea, which was a plea of general performance, on which the plaintiffs in their replication assigned, for one of their breaches, that Bigg had not paid over to the receiver general the monies received by him as collector of the taxes, in respect of the rates and assessments mentioned in the condition for the year 1828-29, and the fifth plea, and the pleadings arising thereon.

The fifth plea stated, that Bigg had lands and goods [344] within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, of which they had notice, which might have been seized and sold, but which continued unsold. To this plea plaintiffs replied, that Bigg had no lands within the jurisdiction of the commissioners which they could seize and sell, of which they had notice, and that all the goods and chattels of Bigg within their jurisdiction, of which they had notice, were seized and sold, and applied towards the satisfaction of the sums collected, but that the same were insufficient to satisfy Bigg's deficiencies, and that there were not any other goods and chattels of Bigg, of which they had notice. To this replication the plaintiff in error rejoined, that Bigg had divers lands and goods within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, which might and ought to have been discovered and found, but which were not seized and sold, and tendered an issue thereon, in which defendants in error joined.

The action came on for trial at the Guildhall of the city of London, before Alderson J., when the jury found that Richard Bigg paid over to the receiver general all the sums received by him for the assessments for the year 1828-29, but that he did not pay all those sums to the service of that year, the sum of £2430 having been paid to the service of that year, and £693 to that of former years: that Richard Bigg had lands or houses, after the default, of the value of £121, which could have been seized or sold, and that he had goods, in like manner, of the value of £200, at the time of default, which could have been seized and sold: that the commissioners had not notice of the possession of houses or lands on the part of Richard Bigg, but that they had reasonable grounds for believing that he possessed household goods at the time of the default.

[345] On the 17th January 1833 the Court of Common Pleas decided, that the payment by Bigg of all the sums received by him for assessments for the year 1828-29, not to the service of that year, but to that of former years, was a breach of the condition of the bond; and that the sale of the collector's lands and goods did not form a condition precedent to the right to put the bond in suit against the surety, where the commissioners had no knowledge of their existence before the action was brought, 9 Bingham, 544. The special case being turned into a special verdict was brought before the Court of Exchequer Chamber on a writ of error, when the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas was affirmed; Lord Denman and Williams, J., being of opinion, that the sale of the property of the collector was a condition precedent to an action being brought by the commissioners against the surety; Littledale, J., Bolland, B., and Patteson, J., being of opinion, that a sale of the property of the collector known to the commissioners was a condition precedent to bringing such action; Lord Abinger and Parke, B., being of opinion, that a sale was not a condition precedent to bringing such action, even though the commissioners had notice of such property; see Bingham's N. C. p. 7.

To reverse this judgment the present plaintiff brought a writ of error in parliament.

On the 27th and 28th of June 1837 this case was argued, the judges being present (the judges present were, Littledale, J.; Parke, B.; Vaughan, J.; Bosanquet, J.; Patteson, J.; Gurney, B.; Williams, J.; Coleridge, J.; Coltman, J.); Sir William Follett for the [346] plaintiff in error and Serjeant Taddy for the defendants in error, when the following questions were put to the judges:—

A bond is given by the defendant as surety for A. B., a collector of assessed taxes for the parish of D., in the county of E., for the year 1828, to the commissioners of the assessed taxes, with a condition to the following effect:—"That if the above-bounden A. B. do and shall well and faithfully demand and collect all and every the sum and sums of money, in the said assessments charged and specified, of the respective persons from whom the same shall or may be payable, and shall and do, in case of nonpayment thereof, duly enforce the powers of the said acts against such persons who may make default therein; and also well and truly pay or cause to be paid unto the receiver general of the said taxes, rates, and duties for the said county of Middlesex all such sum and sums of money as shall come to the hands of the said A. B. as such collector, upon the days and at the times by the said acts appointed for the payment thereof, and according to the true intent and meaning of the said acts; and also do and shall, when thereunto required, at such times and places as shall be appointed for that purpose, give and render or cause to be given and rendered, unto the commissioners appointed or to be appointed to put the said acts in execution, or to any two of them, a just and true account in writing of all such sum and sums of money which he the said A. B. shall have collected and received by virtue or on account of the said assessments, and shall forthwith pay and deliver the same [347] unto the said commissioners, or any two of them, or unto such person or persons whom they or any two or more shall appoint, then this obligation to be void, or else to remain in full force and effect."

A. B. paid to the receiver general of the taxes for the said county all the sums of money collected and received by him, and which came to his hands as collector, for the year 1828, at the proper days and times mentioned in the condition, and appointed by the acts of parliament (the 43 George 3d, c. 99, and 3 George 4th, c. 88) for payment thereof (see special verdict); but he did not pay all those sums to the account or service of that year, but a part only, and the residue he paid to the account or service of former years for which he had been collector, (but the defendant not having been surety for the said A. B. for the former years,) and by such payment the account of former years was paid up and satisfied. Was this conduct of A. B. a breach of the condition of the bond?

2dly, A. B. had, after the time of such breach (supposing that a breach took place), certain lands and goods in the district and within the jurisdiction of the said commission, of which the commissioners had knowledge before an action was brought on the bond. An action being brought, is it a defence to that action that the commissioners did not, before suit, seize and sell the said lands and goods?

3dly, Is it a defence to such action that the commissioners did not seize and sell, supposing that the commissioners had no knowledge, before the commence-[348]-ment of the suit, of the existence of such lands or goods?

4thly, To an action on such a bond by the commissioners a plea was pleaded similar to the fifth plea, to which there was a replication and rejoinder similar to those to that plea; the jury found that there were lands and goods of A. B. within the jurisdiction after the default, and before the commencement of the suit, but that the commissioners had not notice thereof. Ought the issue raised by the rejoinder to be found for the plaintiff or the defendant?

5thly, Supposing the verdict be entered for the defendant on the said issue, and supposing it is not a defence to the action that the lands and goods of A. B. were not sold by the commissioners, unless they had notice (meaning knowledge) of their existence, can the verdict be entered for the plaintiff non obstante veredicto on the implied confession in rejoinder, that if there were lands and goods, etc. the commissioners (the plaintiffs) had no notice of their existence?

6thly, Supposing the judgment could not be so entered, and the issue raised by the said rejoinder be immaterial, can a court of error award a repleader, and ought it to do so in this case?

7thly, Supposing a court of error cannot or do not award a repleader, what judgment ought it to pronounce? Ought it to be a judgment for the plaintiff on the whole record, on the ground that the other pleas, or the issues found thereon, contain a sufficient confession, or afford sufficient proof whereon to found a judgment for the plaintiffs, disregarding the immaterial issue?

[349] On the 4th July 1839 the opinions of the judges were delivered as follows:—

Coltman, J.—The first question proposed by your Lordships in this case does not appear to me to be doubtful.

The condition of the bond is (amongst other things) that Richard Bigg shall well and truly pay to the receiver general all such sums of money as shall come to the hands of the said Richard Bigg, as such collector, upon the days and at the times by the said acts appointed for the payment thereof, and according to the true intent and meaning of the said acts. Now, the monies in question not having been paid to the service or account of that year in respect of which they had been assessed, but in payment of what must for this purpose be considered as the private debt of the collector, cannot, I think, be considered as having been paid according to the true intent and meaning of the acts; the condition of the bond, therefore, has been broken, and the bond forfeited.

To the second question proposed by your Lordships it ought, I think, to be answered, that the defence suggested would be a valid defence to an action brought against the surety. The question turns upon the proviso in the thirteenth section of 43 Geo. 3. c. 99. construed with reference to the fifty-second section of the same act. In stating the opinion I have formed, I speak with all deference for those who may differ from me on this and other points; but it seems to me, that, unless it is held that the commissioners are bound to exert legal diligence against the principal before suing the surety, the surety will be deprived of the benefit which the act intended to give him. [350] The statute, section fifty-two, gives power to the commissioners to seize and sell the whole real and personal estate of the collector making default.

It is obvious that the exercise of this power may be, and is likely to be, highly advantageous to the surety, and I conceive that the intention of the act was to give the surety the benefit, in the first instance, of this process, instead of compelling him to pay the whole amount of the arrears, and leaving him to seek for his indemnification by an action at law, or other more circuitous course, against his principal, at the risk of being defeated by accident or chicanery. This construction appears to me to be also most agreeable to the natural and obvious meaning of the words made use of in the proviso, and to be the sense in which any ordinary persons about to enter into a contract of suretiship would understand them. By putting a refined and artificial sense on the expressions, and by construing them otherwise than as the party contracting would be likely to understand them, we should be making the act of parliament a snare to those who might bind themselves as sureties upon the faith of its provisions.

To the third question proposed it should, I think, be answered, that it is no defence to the supposed action that the commissioners did not seize and sell lands, of the existence of which they had no knowledge before the commencement of the suit.

By the statute 43 Geo. 3. c. 99 § 13. it is provided, that no bond shall be put in suit against any surety for any deficiency other than what shall remain unsatisfied after sale of the lands, etc. of such collector, in pursuance and by virtue of the directions and powers given to the commissioners by that act. The question [351] thereupon for consideration is, what the lands are which are to be sold under the directions and powers given by the fifty-second section of the act? By that section the commissioners, in their respective jurisdictions, are authorized and empowered to seize and secure the estate, real and personal, of the collector, to him belonging, or which shall descend to his heirs, executors, or administrators, wheresoever the same can be discovered and found. Now, although the word "wheresoever" is an adverb of place, and its proper sense should seem here to be in what place or in what hands soever, yet, taking the whole sentence together, it obviously implies that the collector may have property which cannot be discovered by the commissioners; and when the section goes on to direct the commissioners to sell and dispose of all such estates as shall be for the cause aforesaid seized and secured, it seems to me that by necessary implication the words "such estates" must be construed to mean such estates as the commissioners shall have discovered, for they cannot have seized and secured any other. This construction seems to me to be called for by considerations of public convenience, and to be in no wise unjust towards the surety, who may reasonably be expected, and, from a regard to his own interest, will naturally take care, to inform the commissioners of any property belonging to his principal which can be discovered.

I cannot but look upon the surety as being in a considerable degree identified with the party for whose acts he has undertaken to be responsible, and at least as having much better means of knowledge as to his circumstances than the commissioners; and if the surety is not able to discover the concealed property of his [352] principal, it seems to me unreasonable to expect that the commissioners shall do it.

To the fourth question the answer, I think, ought to be, that the issue raised by the rejoinder must be deemed to have been found for the defendant.

To clear the way for the consideration of this question, it is necessary to state with particularity the substance of the pleadings.

The fifth plea alleges three matters of substance; first, that the collector was possessed of divers lands and goods which were subject and liable to be seized and sold, and might have been seized and sold; secondly, that the plaintiff had notice of this; thirdly, that the lands and goods had not been sold.

The replication alleges that the collector had not any lands of which the plaintiff had notice, and that some of his goods had been seized and sold, and that there were no other goods belonging to him within the jurisdiction, of which the plaintiff had notice.

The rejoinder is, that the collector had divers lands which the commissioners could and might have seized and sold, and that all the goods of the collector which could, and might, and ought to have been discovered were not seized and sold in manner and form as the plaintiff had alleged, and thereof the defendant put himself upon the country.

Now, in the allegations of this rejoinder, as it seems to me, no assertion of notice to the plaintiff is involved. That it is not asserted in express terms is clear, and I see no reason to think that the defendant intended to involve it; on the contrary, he appears to have omitted it designedly, and to have inserted what seems intended as a substitution for the allegation of notice, when he avers [353] that the goods could, and might, and ought to have been discovered. I cannot, therefore, see any ground for extending the sense of the issue tendered beyond what the words naturally import.

Taking this to be the effect of the rejoinder, it cannot but occur to ask whether any issue at all is joined? For the rejoinder contains nothing contradictory to the allegations in the replication; on the contrary, the two are entirely consistent.

To make an issue, regularly, there should be an affirmative on one side and a negative on the other, meeting each other directly; and various cases are to be found in our law books in which, for a neglect of this rule, it has been held that no issue had been joined, and that the defect was not aided after verdict, but that the verdict was a nullity. See Sandback v. Turrey, Croke, Jac. 585; Oxford v. Rivett, Croke, Car. 79—93; Derby v. Hemming, Croke, Car. 593; Kirle v. Lees, 3 Leon, 66.

There are other cases, however, in which the same strictness has not been observed, and in which, after one party has made an allegation and offered to go to the country upon it, and thereupon the similitur has been added and a trial had, it has been considered as an agreement by both parties to go to trial upon that allegation, and an informal mode of joining issue upon it, which, as far as that informality is concerned, is aided, after verdict, by the statute 32 Henry 8. c. 30; see the cases of Walthall v. Aldrich, Croke, Jac. 588; Parker v. Taylor, Croke, Car. 316; Burton v. Chapman, Sid. 241; 2 Keble, 278. 280. It is difficult to reconcile these two classes of cases with each other; but it appears to me reasonable to adhere to the latter class, and to hold that where the parties have, by going to the country [354] on a particular point, agreed to treat it as an issue joined, it should be considered, after verdict, as being such, though informally joined.

The result is, that the parties in this case are to be considered as having joined issue upon the allegations contained in the rejoinder, that rejoinder not importing any allegation of notice.

I consider, therefore, the issue as being in substance only this, whether Richard Bigg had any lands and goods which were not seized and sold.

The rejoinder in terms says, in addition, that the lands might have been seized and sold, and that the goods could, and might, and ought to have been discovered; but it does not appear to me that under these terms any separate issuable matter of fact is asserted, or that by the insertion of them the nature of the issue is changed; for, when it is said that the lands could and might have been seized and sold, it is but the statement of a conclusion resulting necessarily from the existence of the lands; and when it is said that the goods could and might have been discovered, the assertion, standing nakedly, as it does, is but the assertion of a possibility, which necessarily results from the fact of their existence. When it is alleged that the goods ought to have been discovered, that is not an allegation of a fact to be proved, but of a legal obligation supposed to result from the facts alleged.

Considering, therefore, the only fact in issue to be, whether Richard Bigg had lands and goods not sold before the action brought, and it being found by the verdict that he had, I think that the issue raised on the fifth plea is found for the defendant.

But although the informal mode in which the issue is [355] joined is, I think, cured, after verdict, by the statute, there is another defect in the issue which is not aided by the statute, namely, its immateriality; for, notwithstanding some early cases to the contrary, it is now well settled that a verdict, though it may cure an informal, cannot cure an immaterial, issue. The verdict, therefore, though found for the defendant, cannot give him any title to a judgment in his favour.

The case is the same if the true view of the pleadings is, that no issue at all is joined; for in that case the verdict is to be considered as a nullity, as far as the fifth plea is concerned, and consequently the defendant cannot be entitled to judgment upon it; Sandback v. Turvey.

To your Lordships' fifth question it ought, I think, to be answered, that judgment cannot be entered for the plaintiff non obstante veredicto, on the implied confession in the rejoinder, that the plaintiff had no notice of the existence of the lands and goods in question.

The ground on which such a judgment may be given is explained by Lord Holt in Staple v. Heydon, 2 Lord Raymond, 924, 6 Mod. 10, 2 Salk. 579, 3 Salk. 121, where he is reported in substance to have said, "Where the defendant confesses a trespass, and avoids it by such a matter as can never be made good by any sort of plea, there, in such case, judgment shall be given upon the confession, without regard to the finding upon an immaterial issue; but where the matter of justification is such a matter as, if it were well pleaded, would be a good justification, there, though it be ill pleaded, yet that shall not be taken to be a confession of the plaintiff's action; and the books do, [356] all of them, if they be narrowly looked into, turn upon this difference, where the confession is full and the matter of the plea is ill in substance;" and the form of entering up the judgment is quite consistent with the principle here laid down by Lord Holt. See Viner's Abridgement, Judgment, D. plac. 1, Willes, 366.

The present case does not fall within the rule so laid down, for the defendant's plea, if true, in point of fact, is a valid defence to the action; and no instance can be found in which judgment has been given non obstante veredicto, except where the plea pleaded by the defendant has been insufficient in point of law.

But it is said, that the Court must consider it as established upon this record, that one of the material allegations of the plea, namely, that of notice to the plaintiff, is not true; for the replication asserts that the collector had not any lands of which the plaintiff had notice, nor any goods, but those sold, of which they had notice; and the rejoinder, by not re-asserting the notice, must be considered as having admitted its non-existence, and consequently the record must be considered as if the plea had not contained any allegation of notice, in which case it would have been insufficient in law.

Now, although it should be conceded that, upon the trial of the issue raised, the want of notice must be considered as admitted, it would not follow that when the issue is found to be immaterial, and the question arises whether there ought to be a repleader or a judgment non obstante veredicto, the non-existence of notice is to be considered as an established fact.

The case seems rather to range itself in the class of those in which the defendant may have failed through mispleading, rather than an inherent defect in the [357] substance of his defence. He may have mistaken the law, and selected the wrong fact to put in issue; but if a repleader were awarded, he might, for any thing the Court can see, succeed in establishing the plea originally put forward as the ground of his defence.

But it may be argued, that, in the case supposed in your Lordships question, the finding of the jury has established the non-existence of notice. To this the answer is, that the finding in question is of a matter not within the compass of the issue; and the Court, I conceive, cannot pay any regard to a finding by the jury which has no tendency to decide the issues raised by the pleading, for the jury is sworn only to decide the issues joined, and the parties cannot be supposed to have come prepared to try any thing else. The jury, in the case supposed, have found as a fact that there was no notice to the commissioners; but the question, whether there was such notice or not, not having been put in issue, cannot be considered as ever having been tried, and judicially determined.

These reasons, combined with the absence of all precedent for pronouncing a judgment non obstante veredicto, in a case where a valid and sufficient plea was pleaded in the first instance, have led me to the conclusion that such a judgment cannot be given in the present case.

To your Lordships sixth question the answer is, that a court of error cannot award a repleader.

In the case of Holbeck against Bennett, 2 Saunders 319, 2 Keb. 769. 689. 825, 2 Lev. 11, it was said by Lord Hale, that, in the King's Bench, on error from the Common Pleas, it was anciently the custom to award a repleader, for which he cited many records; but he [358] said it was obsolete, and not in use in his time, and had not been done for 100 years.

Subsequently to this case it has been commonly received in the law, and it is to be found in many text writers, that a repleader cannot be awarded by a court of error, and I think rightly so; for it is to be observed, that to deny a repleader where it ought to be awarded, is error; Staple v. Heydon [Ld. Raym. 924; 6 Mod. 10; 2 Salk. 579; 3 Salk. 121]. And it seems to follow, that if a court of error can award a repleader, it would be bound to do so in all cases in which the inferior Court ought to have done so. If, then, it were held that courts of error have the power to award a repleader, it would follow that they have done wrong in the course they have been pursuing for so many years; a supposition which cannot be admitted, under a system of laws professing, as the English code does, to rest mainly upon precedent.

To your Lordships seventh question it should be answered, that if judgment cannot be entered for the plaintiff non obstante veredicto, and if the Court cannot or do not award a repleader, the judgment given in the Court below ought to be reversed, and that judgment cannot be pronounced for the plaintiffs on the whole record, on the ground suggested.

Your Lordships question renders it necessary to consider the doctrine on which the case of Goodburne v. Bowman, 9 Bingham, 532, rests; and it will appear, on consideration, that the present case does not fall within the principle on which that case, as I understand it, proceeded.

The declaration in Goodburne v. Bowman was for a libel. The defendant pleaded the general issue, and several special pleas justifying the libel as true. The [359] verdict was for the plaintiff on the general issue and on one of the pleas of justification, and for the defendant on the other pleas.

The plaintiff applied for judgment non obstante veredicto. The Court were of opinion that the special pleas contained a confession of the action, and that the answer set up was insufficient by way of avoidance.

But it was observable in that case, that some of the allegations of the declaration were admitted by implication only, and not in express terms; and a doubt might be suggested whether there was a sufficient confession of all the material allegations of the declaration; the Court, therefore, went on to say (as I understand their meaning) that, even if they were not fully confessed by the special pleas, yet, inasmuch as they were put in issue by the plea of the general issue, and had been proved upon the trial, and a verdict had thereupon, they were as effectually established on record as if directly and in terms confessed; and the justification being bad in substance, they held that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment on the whole record.

But the present case is different; no question is made here whether there is a sufficient admission of the material allegations contained in the plaintiff's declaration; but the ground on which the plaintiff is not entitled to judgment is, that the Court cannot see that the avoidance is insufficient, inasmuch as, upon an examination of the fifth plea, and the issue raised upon it, the Court cannot see sufficient ground for assuming the falsity of the allegation of notice contained in the plea. Now, if it had appeared judicially, from any other part of the record, that the plaintiff had had no such notice, the case of Goodburne v. Bowman would have furnished a precedent in the plaintiff's favour.

But I see nothing in any other part of the record which can clear up the ambiguity on this point, the finding of the jury respecting notice not being entitled to be considered as a judicial determination on that point, for the reasons adverted to in a former answer.

In this state of the case it seems to me, that the judgment which ought to be pronounced should be, simply, a judgment of reversal, which will leave it open to the parties litigant to bring a new action, if so advised.

Coleridge, J.:—In answer to the first question propounded by your Lordships I beg to state, that, in my opinion, the conduct of A. B. in the case supposed was a breach of the condition of the bond. Upon this question it will not be necessary to state the reasons for my opinion at any great length.

The bond and the condition are framed to secure the due discharge of the duties of the collector in his office. His office is but for a year's duration, and his duty (amongst other things) is to pay the receiver general, at the times specified, the monies which he shall collect upon the assessments for the year, in discharge of those assessments. To pay them in discharge of the arrears of former assessments is no more such a payment than to pay them on any private account to the receiver general, or to any other person, would be. Whether this were done with or without the participation or collusion of that officer seems to me immaterial.

The condition is broken, if, with the knowledge and [361] by the act of the collector, in whole or in part, the monies collected are not paid in discharge of that assessment under which they were collected.

In the case supposed in your Lordships second question, I am of opinion that it is a defence to the action, that the commissioners did not, before the suit, seize and sell the lands and goods there mentioned, if such action be brought against the surety. This seems to me to flow, as a necessary and direct consequence, from the language of the first proviso in the 13th section of the 43d George the Third, cap. 99, and I can give no effect to that proviso, which was evidently framed to make a distinction between the principal and surety in favour of the latter, unless by so construing it. The bond is taken under the provisions of that section, and it seems to me that the proviso is virtually incorporated in the condition of the bond; and that it limits the liability of the surety to the making good the deficiency remaining after sale of the collector's lands and goods. Many reasons in support of this view of the case occur to the mind, and have already been suggested in the printed judgment already delivered in the case of Gwynne v. Burnell and another, now before your Lordships; but it seems to me more satisfactory to rely on the unambiguous language of the proviso itself. According to that, the surety is made liable to be sued, not for every deficiency, but a particular and limited deficiency, i.e., that which shall remain after sale of the lands, tenements, goods, and chattels of the collector. That liability only he must be taken to have contemplated when he sealed the bond. To hold that he may be sued, before sale, for the general deficiency, is to [362] subject him to a different and enlarged liability, and in effect to expunge the proviso from the statute.

3d. I am equally of opinion, that the want of seizure and sale by the commissioners will be an answer to the action, although they had no knowledge, before the commencement of the suit, of the existence of the lands and goods.

This opinion I express with much diffidence, because I have reason to fear that it differs from that entertained by some of my brethren; but I arrive at it upon the same principle which led me to my answer to your Lordships' second question; the principle, namely, of collecting the meaning and intention of the statute from the unambiguous expressions used, rather than from any notions which I may entertain of what is just or expedient.

Having considered, with attention and respect, the reasons that have been stated in support of a contrary opinion, I am bound to say that they have not satisfied my mind. The question arises, simply, on the construction of the proviso before referred to; in terms it is silent as to notice to the commissioners, or knowledge had by them. The words are, "no such bond shall be put in suit against any surety for any deficiency, other than what shall remain unsatisfied after sale of the lands, etc. of such collector, in pursuance and by virtue of the directions and powers given to the commissioners by this act;" and the question is, whether these words are to be understood as if, instead of them, the statute had said, "all lands, etc. of such collector, of the existence whereof, or otherwise, the said commissioners shall have been apprized by the said surety [363] before the commencement of such suit." This is the question, and the test by which I think it ought to be tried is this, whether this addition is a necessary implication from the words already used, in order to give them a sensible meaning and effect. If by this test I can see that the proposed addition is already necessarily contained, although not expressed, in the statute, it is of course not the less cogent, because not expressed; but I cannot concede that we are at liberty, upon any ground whatever, to add a new term to the statute. In saying this I am not unmindful of the dicta to be found in our books, nor of decisions upon old statutes, which seem to warrant a more free dealing with the written law; and whenever acts of parliament shall again be framed with the generality and conciseness with which the legislature spoke some centuries since, it may be fit to consider the soundness of that principle of interpretation which they involve; but it is enough to say, that it is wholly inapplicable to a modern statute, in which the legislature is careful to express all it intends in so many words, that to go beyond their necessary implication is to make, not to interpret, law. The principle, then, on which I rely will not let in the consideration of particular circumstances in each case, or a regard to a greater or less degree of convenience,—a more or less complete effect to be given to the presumed intent of the legislature; nothing, in short, which is founded on what the legislature might better have done, nor simply even what the legislature intended. The sole legitimate inquiry is, I conceive, what intention is to be found in the words of the act expressed or implied; unless, by words written or words necessarily implied, [364] and, therefore, virtually written, the intention has been declared, we cannot give effect to it.

Now that the words are sensible by themselves, as read without any implied addition,—nay, that the proviso being framed confessedly for the benefit of the surety,—the absence of the proposed addition will more largely effectuate its general intent, can, I think, scarcely be denied. The argument, indeed, takes another direction, that it is necessary to qualify or restrain the proviso, by implying the necessity of knowledge in the commissioners, in order to prevent the words from having their full natural operation, because that would defeat the very object of the section itself. This seems to me avowedly to be an alteration of the statute, and, therefore, I should not feel removed from my position if I were to concede that the effect of my interpretation would be what is alleged; I am not, however, driven to such a concession. If the commissioners do their duty, they will, before the appointment of collectors in any of the three modes pointed out by the 9th, 13th, and 14th sections of the statute, and before the admission of any persons to be sureties, take care to inform themselves of the properties of the collectors, in such a manner as to prevent any practical difficulty arising from the proviso. I observed, in passing, that, though there are three modes of appointment mentioned in the statute, and in one of them the commissioners themselves are the parties to select the collector, yet the same form of condition, and the same proviso, applies to all; a circumstance not without its weight in respect of the argument founded on the difference as to the knowledge of the circumstances of the collector, which, [365] it is said, may be presumed to exist between the commissioners and the sureties.

I do not notice in detail the different suggestions which have been made in favour of the qualified interpretation of the proviso, and which are founded on considerations of inconvenience, or liability to fraud, in the literal one, because my argument, if a sound one, denies the admissibility of any such considerations. But one argument which has been usual demands an answer: it is said, that, the proviso being for the benefit of the surety, justice requires that he should inform the commissioners of those circumstances which bring him within its reach. I own this appears to me to beg the question, or to misrepresent the situation of the parties. If my contract has only been to be answerable for what shall remain after seizure and sale of my principal's property, if you cannot sue me for any thing till you have exhausted that primary fund, what principle of justice requires that I should undertake the responsibility of discovering that fund? Why am I to help you to the performance of this condition, which is to give you a right of action against myself? If, indeed, it can be shown that I collude with my principal, or take any step to conceal or make away with his property, any presumption may properly be made against me. Something analogous to this, though not expressly in point, is the course of decisions with regard to the landlord's re-entry, under the 4th George 2, cap. 28, where no sufficient distress is found on the premises. The burthen of search in every part of the premises, and of proof that no distress was there, is cast on the landlord; but if the tenant is shown to impede such search in [366] any way, the presumption immediately shifts, and is cast upon the tenant.

I cannot but feel, in conclusion, that the argument on the other side is but a disguised attempt to alter a law which is thought to be imperfectly expressed. To do this is always unjust in the particular case, because it works an ex post facto alteration of the contract between the parties, and unsound in legal principle. My sense of the practical importance of this doctrine must be my excuse for having troubled your Lordships so long with my answer to the third question.

4th. In answer to your Lordships' fourth question, I beg to state that, in my opinion, on the facts supposed, the issue raised by the rejoinder ought to be found for the defendant. The allegation and denial of notice in the plea and replication appear to me immaterial; the rejoinder, therefore, rightly passed them over, and tendered the issue on that which was material, on which there has been a sensible finding by the jury.

5th. As a judgment of non obstante veredicto is always upon the merits, and assumes, not only that the defence, even if good in form and true in fact, is bad in law, but that it discloses a confession of the plaintiff's case, the hinge upon which the answer to your Lordships' fifth question will turn must be, whether the rejoinder, being by the supposition, but not in my opinion, bad in point of law, though true in fact, also confesses the remaining allegations of the replication which it has not denied? In terms a pleading of this description, which merely selects for denial one of many facts alleged in the previous pleading, admits nothing as to the residue. For the purpose, indeed, of trial before [367] the jury, every thing is admitted but that which is denied; where, however, the fact so denied and found is immaterial, a distinction has always been taken between a pleading of this sort and one which confesses and avoids. In the case of Plummer v. Lee, 2 Meeson and Welsby, 495, the Court of Exchequer acted upon this distinction. The same distinction in principle appears to have been recognized as early as in the case of Potts v. Polehampton, 1 Lord Raymond, 390, in which Lord Holt took this difference,—that where the defendant's plea confesses the duty demanded by the plaintiff, and does not avoid it sufficiently, if the issue be immaterial and found for the plaintiff, he shall have judgment; but if the defendant's plea goes in discharge of the action, and the issue is taken immaterially, and a verdict for the plaintiff, a replader shall be granted. I therefore beg to answer this question in the negative.

6th. In the case of Bennett v. Holbeck, Lord Hale said that it had even then become obsolete for the Court of King's Bench to award a replader on a writ of error, and it has ever since, I believe, been the understood practice that a replader cannot be awarded by a court of error. Your Lordships are not in possession of the record, and I do not see how you can carry into effect that which judgment of replader is intended to produce. This judgment directs that the parties replead, and the cause begins again from the point at which the defect in the pleading appears; it is calculated, therefore, to bring them to a material issue in fact or law; and the House would be called on to perform the functions of an original court, for the trial of the error, without having the record in its possession, or the means of summoning a jury, giving a day to the parties, [368] or using any of that machinery by which, in the Courts below, causes are regularly carried on to judgment.

7th. Your Lordships' seventh question is new; in answering it, I must assume that the opinion which I have ventured to express in answer to your third question is erroneous; and also, that if there had only been the fifth plea pleaded, the Court below should have directed the parties to replead. In that state of things, as I have already stated that I think your Lordships cannot award that judgment, I see no other course, that would have been open for this House, but, simply, to have reversed the judgment for the plaintiff, pronounced below. The question then arises, whether the fact of there being other pleas and other issues on the record, so found that upon them a satisfactory judgment could have been pronounced for the plaintiffs below, if the fifth plea had not been pleaded, will enable this House now to pronounce that judgment, although the fifth plea be there, and the issue arising on it not disposed of satisfactorily? Upon principle, I should have no difficulty in answering this question in the negative; the fifth plea is pleaded to the whole cause of action. In what way a material issue raised upon it may be disposed of, the House cannot at all anticipate judicially; it may be for the defendant below, and if so, all the other issues become wholly immaterial. To pronounce judgment then, as to the whole record, in this state of it, is to exclude one party from a defence on which he relies,—to prejudge one defence by conclusions drawn from the demerits of other defences. This injustice is prevented by the rule, which I had always considered universal and inflexible, that [369] each plea was to be looked at by itself for all purposes, except where, by reference, it incorporates any of the allegations of another.

If, indeed, the House saw that the issue on any one good plea was in favour of the defendant, the merits of the other pleas might be disregarded ; but that is only because they then become immaterial as to the final issue of the cause.

I have stated that, upon principle, this did not appear to me a difficult question ; but I am aware of the case of Goodburne v. Bowman, where, in a considered judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, expressions are to be found at variance with the opinion I have expressed. I feel the full weight of that high authority, but I am bound to express to your Lordships the opinion which I still entertain ; and it is some satisfaction to me to observe, that the principle on which I rely is expressly asserted in the same judgment, and that the departure from it, which I cannot acquiesce in, is not necessary to the decision then made by that Court. Upon the whole, therefore, my answer to this question is, that, on the supposition made, the judgment below ought to be simply reversed.

Williams, J.—1st. As it so happens, singularly enough, it seems, that upon the first question proposed there is no difference of opinion, I shall trouble your Lordships very shortly in answer to it. I think that the payment of part of the money received by the collector for the year 1828 to the account or service of former years was a clear breach of the condition of the bond ; it seems to me that such application of the money differs in no respect from the payment by the collector of any other [370] debt contracted at any other time and in any other manner.

2d. The answer to the second question must depend upon the true construction of the proviso in the thirteenth section of 43 Geo. 3. c. 99 ; that section, after declaring that collectors, if required, shall find good and sufficient security by bond, in the manner prescribed, has the following proviso : “ That no such bond shall be put in suit against any surety or sureties for any deficiency other than what shall remain unsatisfied after sale of the lands, tenements, goods, and chattels of such collector, in pursuance and by virtue of the directions and powers given to the respective commissioners by this act.” In considering the true intent and meaning of this proviso, I pass by the opposite inconveniences, which have been pressed in argument, by observing, that they may probably be considered as balancing each other. Our business, however, is with the construction of the statute, and if that be ascertained, consequences are to be neglected, and the proper construction is, to give effect to the intention of the legislature as far as possible ; and if there be provisions seemingly inconsistent, to reconcile them, so as to further that intention. This, I apprehend, is true generally, and will probably not be doubted. If, however, any authorities be requisite, they may be found in Comyn's Digest, Parl. R. 10. Now, that the proviso was introduced expressly for the benefit of the surety, seems to me to admit of no doubt ; I can attribute to it no meaning or effect at all, except that be the object. The language seems to me to be perfectly plain and appropriate ; the object also is quite consistent with the position of the surety, and has relation to the principal, because there is nothing in the bond in [371] question or in that relation to raise an inference that the former should be liable except upon failure of the latter. This proviso also is introduced in a manner equally consistent with this view of the subject ; in the earlier part of the section the liability of the surety is described, and then comes the proviso imposing a restriction upon that liability ; except, therefore, the application of the land and goods, if any, be deemed a condition precedent to calling upon the surety to make good the deficiency, no effect is given to the proviso, and it might as well be expunged altogether ; either the proviso does impose this condition, or, in my opinion, it does nothing. I am desirous to bring before your Lordships, in as compact a form as possible, what occurs to me upon this part of the subject ; it has been pursued more fully and in detail, if that should be thought worthy of reference, on a former occasion. I have before observed that the words of the proviso seem to me plain and unambiguous ; they are, “ no such bond shall be put in suit for any deficiency other than what shall remain unsatisfied after sale of the lands, goods, etc. of the collector ; ” that is, no bond shall be put in suit for the arrears of the collector, but only for the deficiency, if any, after his property has been applied, as in reason and justice it ought to discharge those arrears, as far as it will go.

The distinction seems to me to be obvious, and plainly marked, between the collector and the surety. By the fifty-second section, which contains the directions and powers alluded to, in the proviso the commissioners are authorized and empowered (not required) to make sale of the lands and goods of the collector ; against him, therefore, the bond may be put in suit before sale, for he [372] is not within the benefit of the proviso; whereas that was framed expressly for the protection of the surety, and he (the latter), in my opinion, cannot be sued before sale made, if practicable.

When I before observed to your Lordships that the language of the proviso seemed to me to be free from doubt, I was not unmindful of the criticism which has been made upon the words "no bond shall be put in suit," as if they were distinguishable, and might have a different meaning, from "no action shall be brought" or "no proceeding shall be had or taken." I, however, am unable to perceive any distinction, and cannot but think that, both in common parlance and in legal acceptance, the terms are identical, and have precisely the same meaning. That they would be so understood in a popular sense, I think, is beyond a doubt, and that they ought to be so understood legally, I also think. I observe that Lord Tenterden, in the case of Pepper and Others v. Cooper, 2 B. and A. 431, where the question was upon this same act of parliament, uses two of the phrases in exactly the same sense. His Lordship, whose general precision and accuracy of expression are well known, observes, "I am clearly of opinion that the bond might be put in suit without selling the goods of Pepper, who was a mere surety, for, though it appears on the face of the bond that he was a collector also, still he is not the collector contemplated by the act, whose lands and goods must be sold before proceedings are had upon the bond against the surety." And what is the distinction between "proceedings had upon the bond" and "action brought upon the bond?" Mr. Justice Holroyd says, "I also think that this bond may be put in suit against [373] the surety, although it may happen that another person has been jointly appointed collector, with first selling the lands and goods of that person, for the collector contemplated by the act, whose goods are to be sold previously to the bond being put in suit, is the collector who has made default." Having mentioned this case with a view to the understanding of the expressions upon which I was commenting, I beg leave to observe, that I would by no means press or strain any inference deducible therefrom; I am quite aware that it is no authority bearing upon the present case, nor any thing like it. The decision merely is, that, whereas two collectors had been appointed, and one only had made default, it was not necessary to sell the non-defaulting collector's lands and goods before having recourse to the surety; but it is at the same time undeniable that both the learned judges do expressly allude, to say no more, to the sale of the defaulting collector's lands and goods as a condition precedent to resorting to the surety. This view of the subject seems to be in conformity to what was very early laid down upon it in chap. 8. of Magna Charta:—"How sureties shall be charged to the king. We, or our bailiffs, shall not seize any land or rent for any debt as long as the present goods and chattels of the debtor himself be ready to satisfy; therefore neither shall the pledges of the debtor be distrained as long as the principal debtor is sufficient for the payment of the debt; and if the principal debtor fail in payment of the debt, having nothing wherewith to pay, or will not pay where he is able, the pledges shall answer for the debt; and if they will, they shall have the rents and lands of the debtor until they be satisfied of that which [374] they before paid for him, except that the debtor can show himself to be acquitted against the said sureties."

The third question I must beg leave to answer with some qualification, the reason for which I hope to make apparent, when, in answer to the next question, I shall have to consider the effect of the rejoinder to the replication to the fifth plea, the finding of the jury thereon, and the general result therefrom. If I am to suppose that the commissioners "had no knowledge," after due and reasonable diligence exerted by them to ascertain the fact of the existence of lands and goods of the collector which they might have seized and sold, it seems to me that, under such circumstances, a good defence could not be made by the surety. If, however, the commissioners "had no knowledge," from the same cause that always occasions ignorance, simply not trying to learn I think there may be a good defence from the fact of the possession of the lands and goods by the collector, after his default, and before action brought, even though the commissioners, upon the supposition last made, were ignorant of the existence of either. This is said upon an assumption at present (to be considered more fully presently) that neither from the statute nor from any general rule of law is the surety bound to give any notice, or furnish any knowledge (your Lordships, it seems, understanding the expression to be equivalent,) whatever to the commissioners of the existence of the lands or goods of the collector. I will endeavour to explain my meaning by reference to the pleadings themselves: suppose the fifth plea to have stood as it does, omitting the allegation of notice; if the replication, by appropriate allegations, had shown reasonable diligence [375] in the commissioners to discover lands and goods of the collector, and that none could be found, it seems to me that such replication would have been an answer to the plea; if, on the other hand, the replication had merely stated that the commissioners had no notice or no knowledge of any lands or goods, it would, in my opinion, contain no answer at all, and would be bad on general demurrer.

4th. The fourth question raises the point upon which so great a difference and variety of opinion unfortunately exist amongst the judges; and in our answer to the question I adopt the supposition contained in it, namely, that issue has been joined upon the rejoinder, and upon that issue that there is a finding of the jury in the words stated in the question, and that finding is in its terms for the defendant below. Whether it be so in substance remains to be considered; and for this purpose it may be necessary to advert to the course and state of the pleadings from the said fifth plea downwards. That plea alleges, that, before the exhibiting of the bill, the collector had lands and goods within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, which might have been seized, etc., of which the plaintiffs had notice. The replication thereto is, that the collector had no lands of which the plaintiffs had notice, and that all the goods of which the plaintiffs had notice were seized and sold, and that after such seizure there were no goods, etc. of which the plaintiffs had notice, liable to be seized, etc. The rejoinder (dropping all mention of notice) states, that, after failure by the collector, he had lands which ought to have been seized and sold, and that all the goods, etc. of the collector at his failure, which could and might have been discovered and found, were not seized and sold, and [376] concludes to the country, and the plaintiffs do the like. And how far the facts contained in that rejoinder and the corresponding finding of the jury amount to a defence, without the fact of the plaintiffs below having notice of such lands and goods, is the question; and that, perhaps, may be tried, as conveniently as in any other manner, by examining whether the fifth plea would have been a good defence to the action, if the allegation of notice had been omitted altogether. The statute is entirely silent upon the subject; the proviso, in especial aid and protection of the surety, contains no allusion to notice being requisite from him; nor is there, in my opinion, any thing in the relation of the surety to his principal requiring any such notice from him. The language of the fifty-second section, "wheresoever the same can be discovered and found," to which reference has been made upon this part of the case, seems to me to have relation merely to the powers of the commissioners in the pursuit of the property of the collector, and to enlarge those powers. I cannot think that it bears upon the question of notice from the surety, or that it is possible to construe the meaning of the expression to be, that such property as the commissioners had not notice of from the surety must be deemed property "that could not be discovered and found;" and, moreover, when, it may be asked, is notice to be given by the surety? It is not pretended that any is due to him, and, accordingly, the first information he will receive of the failure of his principal, and his own liability, will probably be by the service of the writ.

But, further, it seems to be material to ascertain what the rule of law generally is with respect to the necessity of averring notice; and upon this point I take [377] it to be clear that, where a fact lies equally within the knowledge of both parties, the party pleading need not aver notice to the other; and still less is it necessary where the means of knowledge are more especially within the reach of that other. Upon a point, I presume, partly questionable, I should be sorry to weary your Lordships with unnecessary citation, and will, therefore, refer generally to the case of Cutler v. Southern, 1 Saund. 117, and note 2. by Serjeant Williams, and to 2 Saund. 62 a., note 4. As this point, however, seems to me to have an important bearing upon the whole subject, I will refer more particularly to one case only, of some notoriety, in which this question arose. I allude to the case of Rex v. Holland, 5 Term Reports, 607, which was an information against the defendant, with others, for malversation in office, whilst one of the council at Madras, for not having foreseen and provided against the outbreak of Tippoo Sultan. The seventh count of that information charged, especially, that the defendant had not sent notice of the rupture between the Sultan and the East India Company to the governor at one place and a general at another. To the information there was a general demurrer, and the objection to the said seventh count was, that there was no averment of notice to the defendant of the said rupture, which he was charged with not notifying to others. The court, observing that the case was one of great importance, took time to consider of their judgment, which Lord Kenyon afterwards delivered. Upon this point he is reported to have said, "The objection" (that is, to the seventh count,) "that notice to the defendant was not sufficiently averred, seemed to be pretty much abandoned by the defendant's counsel, [378] in consequence of what fell from the court. The rules stated by Mr. Wood in his argument seemed to show the true grounds upon which notice is or is not required to be averred;" and, upon reference, it will be found that the rule which received the matured approbation and adoption of the court is thus laid down:—"Notice here means knowledge," (as your Lordships understand it in this case,) "and where the matter is as much in the knowledge of the defendant, or more than in any other person, the law presumes that he had knowledge;" 16 Vin. Abridg. Notice, A. 2, placita 10 and 12. No one is bound by the law to give notice to another of that which that other person may otherwise inform himself of. And again, "Notice is not necessary where the thing lies as much in the cognizance of the one as the other." "Now, here" (continued the late very learned Baron) "all the facts, of which the defendant should have had notice, are of such a nature that it was his duty, as a member of the council, to know them."

It remains, therefore, to consider how the matter stands, as between the surety and the commissioners, in this particular, and in so doing I shall reject all attempts at an inference arising from general probabilities, (such as, the care and foresight of the surety in entering into the engagement, or the contrary,—what inquiries he might or might not make into the substance of his principal,) as utterly precarious and insecure. It seems to me that our duty is to examine what and with whom the means of knowledge are, according to the provisions of the act of parliament itself. Now, so far as the surety is concerned, the statute, as might be expected, is silent; as to the recommendation of caution, or means [379] of information, he is left to himself. With the commissioners, however, the case is otherwise. By the ninth section the commissioners are to appoint assessors, who are to act upon oath, and, moreover, are to be charged and instructed by the commissioners in the requisites for discharging their duty. Further, by the same section, the assessors are to return two or more able and sufficient persons, of the places for which the assessors act, to be collectors. It seems to be clear, therefore, that, in the due performance of their duty, the assessors are bound to inquire into the sufficiency of the persons returned, including, of course, their substance and property; and if the matter had rested here, it might, perhaps, have been not unreasonably considered as a statutory mode, pointed out to the commissioners, of ascertaining, by deputed authority, the means of the persons to be appointed. But the section goes further, and enacts, that the persons so returned by the assessors are to be appointed by the commissioners; and, as persons are presumed to do their duty, (and particularly when acting upon oath,—for the commissioners also are sworn,) it must be taken as against them (the commissioners), that they became acquainted with the property of the persons about to be appointed, and of this collector Bigg among the rest. And this supposition and construction are the more probable and reasonable, because the collector is not required by the thirteenth section to find security at all events, but only if required by the commissioners. This, therefore, seems to imply that the commissioners ought to inquire in each case, or else how can they exercise a discretion as to requiring or dispensing with security in the case of each appoint-[380]ment; and why, then, is notice to be required from the surety of those who, by the very supposition of having done their duty, have acquired knowledge already?

Upon the whole it seems to me, that this case is brought abundantly within both or either of the rules or conditions dispensing with the necessity of averring notice. When, therefore, I find that the rejoinder contains the same allegations which would have been sufficient to make the fifth plea good and a defence to the action, and that on the twelfth issue (in the terms stated in the question) raised upon the rejoinder, the finding is for the defendant below, my opinion is that the issue ought to be found for him. It is true that the jury do also find (in the manner stated) "that the commissioners had not notice." But it is to be observed, first, that this fact is not included in the issue, and next, that, admitting the finding of such a fact to be within the competence of the jury, it is not, without more, (for the reasons, such as they are, already given at a length, I fear, inconvenient to your Lordships,) available for the plaintiffs below. This circumstance, therefore, does not affect the conclusion at which I have arrived, and which is as above stated.

I have mentioned, at the outset, that my answer to this question proceeds upon the supposition, that there is an issue joined, and that too in the terms of the rejoinder to the replication to the fifth plea. I must, however, take leave to state to your Lordships, that I entertain great doubt (to say no more) whether there be any issue joined at all; because there certainly is not an affirmation and denial of the same fact or facts in that replication and rejoinder, except, indeed, all that is alleged in [381] the replication about notice can be considered as wholly without meaning, which it seems very difficult to say.

5th. To avoid repetition, I have endeavoured to bring together, in answer to the third and last questions, almost all that occurs to me upon the whole subject; and from those answers it is obvious that my opinion is against a part of the suppositions contained in this (the 5th) question. Adopting, however, as I am bound to do, those suppositions, my answer is still in the negative; because, first, I do not think there is any such admission as that alluded to, and next, if there be, that the consequence would follow, that judgment non obstante veredicto can be entered for the plaintiff below. It surely cannot be carried to the extent of admitting no notice or knowledge after due means used to obtain it. Differing, as I have the misfortune to do, from my brother Littledale, upon the point of notice, I agree entirely with his observations upon this part of the case in the Court below. He is thus reported: "The plaintiffs below may contend that they are entitled to judgment non obstante veredicto, but there seems to be a great difficulty in doing that, for the rejoinder is not one which shows that the defendant below has no defence upon the whole case, which is the ground for entering such a judgment; for the finding of the jury, that Bigg had lands and goods, is not like an allegation which furnishes no defence; but it is part of an allegation which, coupled with something else, would constitute a defence, and that something else is imperfect, and does not form part of the issue which the jury ought to try, and which, if found one way, would show that was a defence, but in the other way not."

[382] If, as is certainly done continually, a venire de novo may be awarded by a court of error, it seems difficult to assign any very good reason why it may not award a repleader. My learned brothers, however, have almost all expressed an opinion that it cannot be done. Lord Hale is reported to have said, (after referring to many cases in which a repleader had been awarded,) "that it is obsolete, and not in use at this day." The books of practice assume that it cannot be done, and I cannot find any instance of the revival of the usage since the time of Lord Hale. I am not prepared to say, therefore, that a repleader can be awarded.

7th. The latter part of this (the 7th) question has been, in substance, answered by what I have already said upon the 5th, viz., that the other pleas, or the issues found thereon, do not, in my opinion, contain a sufficient confession, or afford sufficient proof whereon to found a judgment for the plaintiffs upon the whole record. The earlier part involves in it the result of the whole inquiry, which is, in my opinion, that the judgment of the Court below ought to be reversed; but inasmuch as there does not appear to be any appropriate issue whereon to sustain the finding of the jury in favour of the defendant, which otherwise would have entitled him to it, I do not think that judgment can be pronounced for him.

Patteson, J.—1st. In answer to the first question proposed by your Lordships, I am of opinion that the conduct of A.B., as therein described, was a breach of the condition of the bond therein mentioned. The words of the condition of that bond are, that he shall "well and truly pay or cause to be paid, unto the [383] receiver general of the said taxes, rates, and duties for the county of Middlesex, all such sum and sums of money as shall come to his hands as such collector, upon the days and at the times by the said acts appointed for the payment thereof, and according to the true intent and meaning of the said acts." The intent and meaning of the said acts (amongst other things) was, that the monies collected in each year should be carried to the account of such year. Now, though A.B. paid to the receiver general all the monies collected by him in the year in question, yet he did not pay the whole to the account of that year; he did not, therefore, pay the monies according to the true intent and meaning of the acts; he paid them in discharge of a debt which he owed in respect of the collection of former years, in violation of the intent and meaning of the acts; whether with the consent of the receiver general or not, seems to be immaterial; and his conduct in so doing seems to me to be as much a breach of the condition of the bond, as if he had applied the monies to the payment of any other debt which he owed.

2d. To the second question proposed by your Lordships I answer, that in my opinion, it is a defence to an action brought by the commissioners on the bond, that they did not, before suit, sell and seize the lands and goods of A. B., of which they had knowledge.

This is an action against a surety who has entered into a bond under the provisions of an act of parliament, 43 Geo. 3, c. 99. Before entering into that bond, he would naturally look at that act, with a view to discover the nature of his engagement, the liabilities he was to incur, and the means of protection afforded him. He would construe the act, in the plain and obvious sense [384] which its language imports, and surely he would have great reason to complain if a court of law, upon any question of his liability arising, should put a forced and technical construction on that language to his prejudice. He finds that the act, in the 13th section, directs the commissioners, in case of default in the collector, to prosecute, that is, put in suit the bond:—"Provided always, that no such bond shall be put in suit against any surety or sureties for any deficiency other than what shall remain unsatisfied after sale of the lands, tenements, goods, and chattels of such collector, in pursuance and by virtue of the directions and powers given to the respective commissioners by this act." Those directions and powers are contained in the 52d section of the act, which authorizes and empowers (not requires) the commissioners, in case of default, to make sale, in a summary manner, of the collector's lands and goods, wheresoever the same can be discovered and found. The commissioners are not obliged to seize and sell the collector's property; they may put the bond in suit against him without doing so, for he is not within the proviso in the 13th section; yet they may first seize and sell the collector's property, if they please, and may afterwards put the bond in suit against him; and if they do so, it is plain that, as the bond comes within the 8th and 9th William 3, cap. 11, sec. 8, they cannot recover more than what remains due, after deducting the produce of the sale. Now, the proviso in the 13th section was obviously intended to put the surety in a better situation than the collector; but if that proviso be not held to constitute a condition precedent, their situation will be precisely the same; and indeed it seems to me to be impossible to give any effect at all to [385] that proviso, except by construing it as any unlearned man would do, viz., as a condition precedent. It has been suggested, that the commissioners might exercise their powers under the 52d section for the benefit of the surety, after enforcing the bond against him, and so give effect to the proviso; but, on examining again the words of the 52d section, it is clear to my mind that the commissioners could not be justified under it in making sale of the collector's property, to satisfy a debt which had been already discharged by the surety, and, as far as the commissioners are concerned, been altogether satisfied. That section empowers the commissioners to seize the collector's property if he shall neglect to pay any sums received by him; but they are not at once to sell; they are to give ten days' public notice of a meeting, and in case the monies be not paid and satisfied, they are required to sell, to satisfy, and pay into the hands of the receiver general the sums due, with costs and charges, and render the overplus to the owner of the property. It seems to me, that if the surety has paid the monies due before any seizure of the collector's property, it cannot be said that the collector has neglected to pay, so as to authorize the commissioners to seize, within the meaning of that section; nor, again, if they could seize, and hold a meeting with ten days' public notice, could it be said that the monies due were not paid and satisfied, so as to require or empower them to sell; nor, if they did sell, could they pay the monies into the hands of the receiver general, he having already obtained the amount from the surety. The powers given by that section are, as I apprehend, primarily intended for the benefit of the commissioners in the [386] exercise of their public duty; and if they have no longer any public duty to perform, which they have not as soon as the monies due are paid, they have no right to exercise those powers. The benefit to the surety from the exercise of those powers seems to be a secondary object, and arises only from the proviso contained in the 13th section. Without that proviso, the surety could have no right at any time to call for the exercise of those powers for his benefit; and as the terms of that proviso plainly relate only to a sale antecedent to his being sued, I am at a loss to see by what construction of the act he could call for the exercise of those powers after he had paid the money.

3d. The third question proposed by your Lordships is one upon which I have entertained much doubt; but I have come to the conclusion that it is a defence to the action, that the commissioners did not seize and sell the lands or goods of the collector, if any such existed, although they had no knowledge of their existence. No words can be found in the act of parliament which require any such knowledge, and there are provisions as to the appointment of collectors, by which the commissioners have the means of knowing whether they are able and sufficient persons. Those provisions, indeed, apply only to the time when the collectors are appointed, and do not give the commissioners any greater facilities for discovering the property of the collectors than any other person may have. It may be said, that if the mere existence of any such property, though unknown, and perhaps concealed, and therefore not seized and sold, were to defeat the remedy against the surety, it is obvious that much opportunity [387] for collusion and fraud would be afforded, and all attempts to enforce the payment of monies by the surety might be from time to time defeated, without any real neglect on the part of the commissioners; and that it is very reasonable to require, that the party, for whose benefit a seizure and sale are to take place, should give such information to the commissioners as will enable them to make such seizure; or, at all events, should not set up the want of such seizure as a defence, unless he can establish that the commissioners have been guilty of a culpable neglect in not making it. Every act of parliament, as well as any other document, must have a reasonable construction; and I apprehend that such construction ought to prevail as will effectuate the obvious intention of the legislature, provided no violence be done to the language which it has adopted. It may also be said, that the very object and intention of the legislature, in requiring that the collector should find sureties, would be frustrated, if it be held, that the existence of any unknown or concealed property of the collector would defeat the remedy against the surety; at the same time that the benefit intended for the surety might be amply preserved, by requiring the seizure and sale of the known property of the collector, as a condition precedent to his being sued for the monies due. These reasons led me upon a former occasion to entertain the opinion, that knowledge of the existence of such lands and goods was necessarily implied in the proviso which limits the power of suing the surety. I am, however, free to confess, that, after further consideration of the act of parliament, I am not so sure of the intention of the legislature as to feel that I was warranted in entertaining that opinion; and, as it may [388] be possible, that, by putting such a construction upon the act, I am altering or adding to it, instead of simply interpreting it, I feel myself bound to abide by the literal meaning of the words, and to hold that the existence of any unsold lands or goods, which the commissioners might have seized and sold, is a bar to the action, whether they knew of them or not.

4th. In answer to the fourth question proposed by your Lordships, I am of opinion that the issue raised by the rejoinder, (if any issue at all be raised,) ought, upon the finding of the jury, to be found for the defendant. In considering the effect of similar pleadings upon a former occasion, I came to the conclusion that the issue, though informal, involved the question of notice. I am free to confess that, upon further consideration, I think that I then came to a wrong conclusion. The replication here asserts that A. B. had no lands of which the plaintiffs had notice; that all the goods of A. B., of which the plaintiffs had notice, were seized and sold, and that A. B. had no other goods of which the plaintiffs had notice. The rejoinder asserts that A. B. had lands which might have been sold, and that all the goods of A. B. which might have been discovered and sold were not seized and sold, and concludes to the country; and the plaintiffs join the similiter. Here is no assertion on the one side and denial on the other. Put the replication and the rejoinder together, and the separate assertions of the plaintiffs and defendant will be found jointly to amount to this: that A. B. had lands and goods which might have been sold, but of which the plaintiffs had no notice. The plaintiffs have not denied the existence of lands and other goods besides those sold simpliciter, but only the existence of [389] lands and other goods of which they had notice. The defendant has not asserted the existence of lands and other goods simpliciter, but only the existence of lands and other goods which might have been sold. The replication relates to lands and goods of A. B. in a particular condition or predicament; the rejoinder relates to lands and goods of A. B. in another and different condition or predicament. The more I consider the matter, the more satisfied I feel that no issue at all is raised by the rejoinder; neither an informal issue, which would be cured by verdict, nor an immaterial one, which cannot now be cured at all. But if any issue be raised, I think that it must be an issue in the words used by the defendant in his rejoinder, which concludes to the country, and which do not involve the question of notice; and if it be an issue in those words, it ought to be found for the defendant.

5th. The fifth question proposed by your Lordships is one which, according to my view of it, is of very general importance, as a question of pleading. It involves the consideration whether any pleading which concludes to the country, except, perhaps, the anomalous statutable plea of bankruptcy, contains any confession of the matters stated in the previous pleading, and not denied.

Here I take the issue, if any there be, as I have already stated, to be in the words of the rejoinder, and to be an immaterial issue, for want of involving the question of notice; assuming always, as this question does, that notice is material. Still, as the rejoinder concludes to the contrary, and tenders an issue, it must be taken to traverse the whole or some part of the replication. Clearly it does not traverse the whole; it [390] omits that part of the replication which relates to notice, and traverses the seizure and sale of all the lands and goods which might have been seized and sold. Now, the distinction between pleadings by way of traverse and pleadings by way of confession and avoidance is familiar to all lawyers, and it is the latter only upon which questions of this sort have hitherto arisen. One of the last cases on this subject is that of Gale v. Capern, 1 Adol. and El. 102, in which the defendant pleaded, by way of set off, a promissory note alleged to have been made by the plaintiff to a third person, and by him indorsed to the defendant; the plaintiff replied, that the said supposed debt on the said promissory note did not arise within six years. It was contended that this replication was no confession of the making and indorsing of the note; that it was not only a denial of its having been made and indorsed within six years, but that it was ever made and indorsed. The court, however, held otherwise, and considered the replication as a pleading by way of confession and avoidance, and not by way of traverse. The replication there concluded, as it of necessity must, to the court, because it introduced new matter. The case of Lambert v. Taylor, 4 B. and C. 138, does not go to the same length. Indeed, in the judgment there delivered by Lord Tenterden, it is admitted for the purposes of the cause, that the plea of the statute of limitations, as generally pleaded, does not admit a cause of action. Unquestionably, for the purposes of trial, a traverse of one out of several allegations in the preceding pleading admits the facts stated in the other allegations, and renders it unnecessary to adduce any evidence in support of them, and so far it is an implied confession of them; yet it seems to [391] be only a confession sub modo, and not an absolute confession, as all pleadings are which go on to attempt an avoidance. I have always understood that judgment non obstante veredicto is only to be allowed in a very clear case, where the defence set up is good in form and true in fact, but insufficient in law; and so the pleadings show that the defendant has no defence upon the merits, in any way of putting his case. Now, that is by no means the result where the plaintiff has averred some fact amongst others, showing together a sufficient cause of action; but which fact, being separately traversed, turns out to be immaterial. In such a case, how can it be said, that if the traverse had been properly taken, the jury might not still have found for the defendant? For I am not now considering the effect of any special finding of the jury, but, simply, of their finding in the words of the issue; besides which, there is in this case a good plea, containing an averment of notice, and that plea is not disproved in any material part of it; for the issue which arises out of it is, by the hypothesis, immaterial. Unless, therefore, the averment of notice be treated as struck out of that plea, and so the plea be rendered bad, the plaintiffs cannot have judgment non obstante veredicto. Now, the dropping of that averment in the rejoinder can, at the most, amount only to a departure in pleading, which makes the rejoinder bad; it cannot have the effect of striking out that averment from the plea itself. In a very late case, in the Court of Exchequer, the distinction between judgment non obstante veredicto and a repleader was much considered; I allude to the case of Plummer v. Lee. That was an action of debt on an award by an administratrix; the declaration stated, that, on the 12th of July 1833, a [392] settlement of part of the accounts took place between the deceased and the defendant; it then stated a submission to arbitration by the plaintiff as administratrix and the defendant and an award. The first plea traversed the making of an award; the second traversed that the settlement took place on the day mentioned in the declaration; the third traversed the making of such settlement at any time. On the trial the plaintiff had a verdict on the first and third issues, the defendant on the second. After argument, and time taken to consider, the Court held that the second plea did not contain any confession, and that judgment non obstante veredicto could not be given, but awarded a repleader. This case appears to me to be a direct authority to show, that the traverse of an immaterial allegation is not to be taken as an absolute confession of the other allegations in any pleading. Upon the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that the verdict cannot be entered for the plaintiffs on an implied confession in the rejoinder.

6th. In answer to the sixth question, I am of opinion, that a repleader ought to have been awarded, in the case stated, by the Court below. I think, however, that a court of error cannot so award. Lord Chief Justice Hale expressly states, that in his time the practice of awarding a repleader in the Court of King's Bench, upon error from the Common Pleas, was obsolete, and not in use; Bennet v. Holbeck; and so it has been laid down in our books of practice ever since. Upon a writ of error the parties are not before the Court upon a day given, and though a practice may have prevailed in ancient times for the Court of King's Bench to award a repleader, into which Court the record itself was always removed from other courts on a [393] writ of error, and became a record of the King's Bench, yet it does not appear that any such practice ever prevailed in the House of Lords; nor, I believe, is any instance known in which parties have pleaded before the House of Lords, or in which that House has ever issued jury process, or given any judgment except on a writ of error brought. Yet such must be the consequence, if a repleader be awarded in the case supposed by the sixth question, unless, indeed, the transcript of the record be remitted to the Court in which the original pleadings took place, with a direction that the parties should replead before that Court; a course of proceeding for which no precedent can, I believe, be found.

7th. The seventh question proposed by your Lordships raises a considerable difficulty. In answer to it I am of opinion, that if there be but one issue on the record, and that be an immaterial issue, of such a nature that the Court below ought to have awarded a repleader, but has in fact given judgment for one of the parties, a court of error ought, simply, to reverse such judgment, without giving any judgment in favour of the other party; but where there are several pleas, some or one of which, or the issues found thereon, contain a sufficient confession, or afford sufficient proof wherein to found a judgment for the plaintiff,—whether the immaterial issue on the other plea shall thereby be aided, is a matter of some nicety.

No authority can, of course, be found upon this subject in the older reports before the statute of Anne, which introduced several pleas; nor have I been able to find any direct authority since that time, except the case of Goodburne v. Bowman. In that case the rule, that, in considering the merits or demerits of one plea, re-[394] course cannot be had to another, unless expressly referred to, is fully recognized; but it is said that an application to enter judgment non obstante veredicto is founded upon the whole record, and, therefore, that all the pleas may be taken into consideration. With the greatest respect for that Court, I must confess that I have great doubts as to the soundness of the view there taken as to the effect of several pleas. It seems to me to be essential to the due course of pleading, and to avoid confusion, that no blending of pleas should in any instance be permitted; and that, whatever may be the number of pleas placed upon the record, each plea should be treated, both in itself and in its consequences, as if it were the only plea on the record. It is to be observed, that in that case the court intimated an opinion that the pleas respectively did contain a sufficient confession, and, therefore, what was said as to the finding on the plea of not guilty, being received in aid of any supposed defect in the other pleas, was in some measure extrajudicial, though entitled to the highest respect. The present case, however, is distinguishable from Goodburne v. Bowman, inasmuch as in that case the pleas themselves, out of which the immaterial issues arose, were held bad; but here the plea, out of which the immaterial issue arose, is good; and, therefore, even if the finding on that issue be disregarded, still the plaintiffs cannot have judgment, for the good plea, not disproved, still remains a good bar to the action. The case of Goodburne v. Bowman came under consideration in the Court of Exchequer in the case of Plummer v. Lee, which I have already cited; but a distinction was taken between them, inasmuch as in the latter case no one of the pleas concluded to the court, and no one [395] contained an absolute confession. In that case the immaterial traverse was of an allegation in the declaration; and, even supposing that the Court might, under those circumstances, have entirely disregarded the finding on that issue, not so as to have aided that immaterial issue by the allegations in the other pleas, but treating it as if no such traverse had been taken, yet in the present case that course cannot be pursued, because to disregard the immaterial issue would be also to disregard the plea out of which it arises; which is an affirmative plea, and contains a good answer to the action, and has not been disproved in any material part of it. My answer, therefore, is, that upon these pleadings judgment cannot be given for the plaintiff, disregarding the immaterial issue, neither can judgment be given for the defendant; but the judgment of the Court below must, simply, be reversed.

Bosanquet, J.—I am of opinion that the conduct of Richard Bigg amounted to a breach of the condition of the bond. Payment of the money collected in 1828 to the account of former years was as much a breach of duty as payment to one of the creditors.

2d. To the second question, I am of opinion that the neglect of the commissioners to seize and sell lands and goods of A. B., of which they had knowledge, before action brought, is a defence to such action. It appears to me that the proviso, which is introduced for the benefit of the surety, makes such seizure and sale a condition precedent to putting the bond in suit, where the commissioners have knowledge of the existence of such lands and goods.

3d. But I think, that, unless the commissioners had [396] such knowledge before the commencement of the action, the existence of such lands and goods within their jurisdiction is not a defence, for the proviso must receive a reasonable construction. The thirteenth section directs the commissioners to prosecute if the collector makes default; which direction is followed by a proviso, that the bond shall not be put in suit for any deficiency other than such as shall remain after sale of the lands and goods of the defaulter. But if the commissioners have no knowledge of such lands or goods, they are bound by the directions of the statute to prosecute. The legislature cannot, with reason, be supposed to intend that the commissioners should delay the commencement of a prosecution against the sureties until they have ascertained, by all possible means, whether the collector is possessed of any lands or goods, and that if, after such suit commenced, any, the smallest portion, of the property shall be discovered, a suit honestly commenced, pursuant to the direction of the statute, shall be defeated by a plea of the existence of such minute amount of property within their jurisdiction. Possibly, if the existence of property were communicated to the commissioners after action brought, proceedings against the surety might be stayed until the property had been sold, and the deficiency ascertained; but whatever might be the effect of an application for a stay of proceedings, the question now is, whether the proviso creates an unqualified condition precedent, or only a condition qualified by knowledge of the commissioners? And I cannot think that it was intended, by the introduction of this proviso, to render it impossible for the commissioners with any safety to comply with the directions to prosecute.

[397] It has been suggested, as an objection to this construction, that, if by notice to the commissioners is meant notice to all the commissioners, it would be next to impossible to comply with such condition, considering the great number of persons who fill that character; and that, if notice to less than all be sufficient, a notice to one who may have no knowledge of the bond would be sufficient to defeat an action duly commenced by the obligees. But, in putting what I think a necessary limitation on the words of the statute, to prevent unreasonable consequences, I do not feel myself driven to adopt a condition, the compliance with which would be either impracticable or nugatory.

The commissioners are directed to appoint a clerk, and any two commissioners may act. There can be no doubt that notice to such clerk would be sufficient; so likewise would notice to the obligees in the bond, or to either of them, or to either of the commissioners, who direct the bond to be put in suit in the name of the obligees. But I neither think that notice to all the commissioners is necessary, nor that notice to a person who, though a commissioner, does not act as such, would be sufficient to constitute a defence. The notice of which the necessity is brought into question upon the pleadings in this case is a notice to the plaintiffs, the obligees in the bond, previous to their commencement of the action; and I think that, whatever would amount to notice to them, would be sufficient, but nothing less.

4th. I think that the issue joined on the fifth plea ought to be entered for the defendant. The issue tendered by him, viz., that there were lands and goods of A. B. within the jurisdiction, has been found in his favour. [398] The notice, which is negatived by the finding, forms no part of the issue, nor the allegation that the commissioners could and ought to have sold, which is an inference of law.

5th. Supposing the verdict to be entered for the defendant on the said issue, and supposing it is not a defence to the action, that the lands and goods of A. B. were not sold by the commissioners, unless they had notice (meaning knowledge) of their existence, still I think that the judgment cannot be entered for the plaintiffs non obstante veredicto, on an implied confession in the rejoinder that if there were lands and goods the commissioners had no notice of their existence. The plea alleges that A. B. was possessed of divers lands and goods of which the plaintiff had notice, and which might have been seized and sold, but which lands and goods then continued unsold. The replication avers that there were no lands which the commissioners could seize and sell, of which they had notice, and that they had seized all the goods and chattels of which they had notice. It admits the existence of some property, and that the commissioners had notice of it, but insists upon the sale of all the property of which they had notice; notice of unsold property is therefore alleged on the one side, and the want of notice of any property unsold is asserted on the other. The frame of the replication clearly invited the defendant to take issue in the terms of it, by which the sale of all the property known to the commissioners would have been denied; but the defendant, by his rejoinder, avoided such denial, departed from the good defence set up by his plea, and chose to reply on the mere existence of property within the jurisdiction as a new ground of defence. Nevertheless, [399] I cannot say that, by omitting to re-assert in his rejoinder the notice which he had alleged in his plea, he has so confessed the want of notice as to authorize a judgment against him, founded on such a confession.

In Staple v. Haydon Lord Chief Justice Holt took this difference, that "where the defendant confesses a trespass, and avoids it by such matter as can never be made good by any sort of plea, then in such case judgment shall be given upon the confession, without regard to such immaterial issue; but where the matter of the justification is such a matter as, if it were well pleaded, would be a good justification, there, though it be ill pleaded, yet that shall not be taken to be a confession of the plaintiff's action;" and he added, "the books do, all of them, if they be narrowly looked into, turn upon this difference,—where the confession is full, and the matter of the plea is ill in substance."

6th. That, though judgment non obstante veredicto cannot be given upon an implied confession in this plea of want of notice, it does by no means follow that a replender ought in such a case as this to be awarded. If the fault of the rejoinder had consisted in a defective mode of pleading the matter relied on, some ground might be afforded for a replender, supposing that proceeding could be awarded after a writ of error; but here the ground taken for the defence in the rejoinder is defective upon the merits, and cannot by any pleading be made available. The defendant having studiously declined to insist upon the notice mentioned in the plea, and chosen to put his defence upon the mere existence of lands and goods within the jurisdiction, could not [400] make that defence good by any sort of amendment; his omission to include in his traverse the want of notice was no mistake or mere error in form.

A judgment non obstante veredicto is always upon the merits; a replender upon the form or manner of pleading; see Tidd's Practice, 953. But whether a replender ought or ought not to have been awarded in the Court below, it cannot, I apprehend, be awarded by a court of error, according to the express authority of Lord Hale in Bennett v. Holbeck; and even if it could, I am humbly of opinion that it ought not to be awarded in this case, since it could have no other effect but that of enabling the defendant to set up some new defence.

7th. The seventh question involves two inquiries: first, whether the pleas and issues contain a sufficient confession, whereon to found a judgment for the plaintiffs, disregarding the immaterial issue; secondly, whether they afford sufficient proof to found such judgment.

I have already stated my opinion, in answer to the fifth question, that the rejoinder to the fifth plea does not contain a sufficient confession of want of notice of unsold property to authorize such a judgment; but, although want of notice be not confessed, still it appears to me that by the same rejoinder the plaintiffs' cause of action is confessed, and, consequently, that if it be not sufficiently answered, (which, for the reasons already given, I think it is not,) the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment. The ground of the plaintiffs' right to recover is the breach, by Richard Bigg, of the condition of the bond, in neglecting to pay to the receiver general the sums collected for taxes.

The declaration, as usual, states a money bond payable to the plaintiffs on request, in the terms of the [401] instrument. Oyer of the condition having been had, but no breach then assigned, the defendant in his second plea pleads performance generally, and then in his fifth plea sets up, as a defence to any right to recover on the bond, that Richard Bigg faithfully collected all sums of money from every person charged, and in every case long before the commencement of the action, and from thence continually hitherto was possessed of lands and goods within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, of which the plaintiffs had notice, and which might have been sold, but which were unsold. This appears to me to have been a good plea. The plaintiffs having before, in their replication to the plea of performance, assigned nonpayment to the receiver general as a breach of the condition, proceed, in their replication to the fifth plea, to allege in answer thereto, that after Richard Bigg had collected, and after he had neglected to pay the receiver general, as in their replication to the second plea mentioned, Richard Bigg had no lands which they could sell, of which they had notice, and that all the goods of which they had notice were sold. The effect of this allegation is, that the condition of the bond had been broken, and that there were no lands or goods of Richard Bigg which the commissioners were bound to sell after the breach of the bond had been committed. The defendant, in his rejoinder to this replication, does not merely omit to traverse the neglect to pay to the receiver general, but expressly says, that, after the supposed collection and receipt of the money, and after the supposed omission and neglect to pay the receiver general, Richard Bigg had lands and goods within the jurisdiction which might have been sold, thereby admit-[402]-ting, as it appears to me, that the condition of the bond had been broken by such nonpayment to the receiver general, and relying on matter insufficient to excuse the defendant from responsibility upon the bond. He that excuses a nonperformance supposes it, Meredith v. Allen, 1 Salk. 138.

If this view of the pleadings be correct, then the plaintiffs will be entitled to judgment non obstante veredicto, upon the confession in the rejoinder of the plaintiffs' cause of action, notwithstanding the verdict on the immaterial issue.

Had the matter of this rejoinder been originally pleaded as a defence instead of the fifth plea, (supposing such defence to be insufficient in substance,) the plaintiffs, I apprehend, would be entitled to judgment, notwithstanding the verdict formed upon the issue tendered by it, on the ground of the confession of the cause of action which it contains; and if that it be so, I can see no reason why the existence upon the record of the plea which has been departed from, and abandoned as the ground of defence, should deprive the plaintiffs of the benefit of this confession.

If the rejoinder to the replication to the fifth plea does not contain such a confession of the plaintiffs' cause of action as to entitle them to judgment thereon, I am not aware of any pleading on this record by which it is more distinctly confessed.

Supposing, therefore, that no such confession appears, the remaining question will be, whether, notwithstanding the verdict found for the defendant upon the immaterial issue tendered by this rejoinder, the plaintiffs are not entitled to judgment upon the rest of the record?

[403] Before the statute of Anne, which allowed defendants to plead several pleas, a motion for judgment non obstante veredicto could only be founded on the confession contained in the same plea on which the issue arose. "If," as Lord Chief Justice Tindal says, in the case of Goodburne v. Bowman, "such plea did not contain a confession, there was no part of the record by which the deficiency could be supplied." If, however, several defences are pleaded, one of which is wholly insufficient, and incapable, by amendment, of being made a good defence, and upon which, therefore, no repleader ought to be awarded, and other defences are well pleaded, upon which material issues are joined, and found for the plaintiffs, I do not see any good reason why the plaintiffs should not be allowed to take advantage of the finding upon those issues, in the same manner as they might do if the ineffectual defence had not appeared upon the record. In Goodburne v. Bowman the Lord Chief Justice further says, "In the present case there is a verdict on the general issue, which finds that the defendant did publish the libels. And although, in considering the merit or demerit of any individual plea, recourse cannot be had to another, unless expressly referred to by such plea, yet, as the application to enter a verdict is founded on the whole record, by which it appears that the defendants have committed the grievance complained of, and have not shown any sufficient justification, it may be considered, in that point of view, that there is enough to warrant the application." In that case, indeed, the Court thought that the special pleas did sufficiently confess the action, but did not sufficiently avoid it. But if the principle above men-[404]-tioned be correct, the plaintiff may avail himself of a finding by the jury as well as of a confession of the defendant, notwithstanding a verdict for the defendant upon an immaterial issue, provided a repleader ought not to be awarded; and it must be observed, that the Lord Chief Justice took care to show that the defendant was not in that case entitled to a repleader.

Then, how does this case stand upon the record? The plaintiffs declare upon a bond; oyer is demanded of the condition; the execution of the bond is denied by the defendant, and found for the plaintiffs. Then performance of the condition is pleaded, to which the plaintiffs reply, a breach by nonpayment of money to the receiver general. The defendant in his rejoinder alleges payment, on which an issue (the ninth) is joined, and found for the plaintiff to a certain amount, viz., £693. Fraud and covin in obtaining the bond are pleaded, which are negatived by the jury. Two other pleas are demurred to, upon which judgment is given for the plaintiffs. No material issue, either in law or fact, has been found for the defendant; but an immaterial issue is found for the defendant, arising upon a rejoinder which is defective, not merely in form, but in showing any answer in substance to the plaintiffs' right of action, capable of being made good by amendment in form.

If this pleading had not been brought upon the record, the plaintiffs would have been entitled to judgment. Upon what principle, then, are they to be deprived of the benefit of all that has been established in their favour, in consequence of a proceeding which is wholly ineffectual, entitling neither the plaintiffs nor the defend-[405]-dant to judgment; and why may not such a proceeding be disregarded, as altogether nugatory? Authority upon the subject is not to be looked for in the older books, since no such case can have arisen before the statute of Anne, already referred to. The only modern case upon the point, of which I am aware, is that of Goodburne v. Bowman; the principle to be collected from which is, that where a verdict is found upon an immaterial issue, in a case which does not authorize the award of a repleader, and the whole cause of action is confessed, or proved upon some other plea or pleas on the same record, the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment.

This case was adverted to in Plummer v. Lee, and though the principle is said to have been suggested in Goodburne v. Bowman for the first time, the justice of it is not controverted; but the case is distinguished from that before the Court, on the ground that in the latter no plea contained a confession of any part of the cause of action, and there was no issue found upon any plea establishing the truth of the whole of it, and a repleader was awarded. The principle promulgated in Goodburne v.

Bowman appears to me to be consistent with reason and justice. The award of a venire de novo, to try the immaterial issue, would be wholly useless; and as this is not a case for a repleader, I humbly offer my opinion to your Lordships, (though, certainly, not without hesitation, in consideration of the novelty of the case, and in deference to the opinions entertained, I believe, by my learned brothers,) that judgment may be entered for the plaintiffs upon the whole record, on the ground that the issues found thereon contain sufficient proof whereon to found a judgment for the plaintiffs, disregarding the immaterial issue.

[406] Parke, B.—My answer to the first question proposed by your Lordships is, that, in the case suggested, the conduct of A. B. was a breach of the condition of the bond, by which he was well and truly to pay to the receiver general all the sums of money collected by him, according to the true intent and meaning of the statutes 43 Geo. 3, c. 99, and 3 Geo. 4, c. 88.

It seems to me that this condition is to be construed precisely in the same way as if another person had been collector for a former year, the appointment being annual; and it could not admit of the least doubt but that it would have been a breach of such a condition, if the money received, instead of having been paid to the receiver general, to the account of the year for which it was received, had been lent to a former collector, to enable him to pay his arrears, although that collector had really so applied it. The question is precisely the same, so far as relates to the breach of the condition of the bond; and the payment to the account of a wrong year is, in effect, an appropriation by A. B. to the payment of his own debt, though, certainly, the damage is not the same, (from the circumstance of this debt being due to the public,) as if he had applied it to the payment of a private debt of his own. It makes, however, a most material difference to the parishioners, who are a fluctuating body, whether the collections of each year are paid to the account of that year or to that of a former year, for which the same person has acted as collector. In the latter case suspicion is lulled, and no inquiry made until the sureties of the former year, or the collector himself, are dead, or insolvent; and the inhabitants of the parish are rendered liable for the arrears due from their predecessors, and have the amount levied [407] upon them; an evil which might have been avoided if each year's collection had been duly paid, as it ought, to the account of that year.

2d. In answer to the second question proposed, I have humbly to state the same opinion which I did in the Court below, that it is no defence to the action on the bond, that the defaulter had lands and goods within the district, and that the commissioners had knowledge of their existence before the action brought, and did not, before suit, seize and sell them.

This question depends entirely on the proper construction to be put on the 43 Geo. 3, cap. 99, sec. 13, coupled with other provisions of that statute.

The thirteenth section enacts, that security shall be given by collectors by bond, with sureties, if required by the commissioners, and that "every such bond given by way of security as aforesaid shall be prosecuted by such commissioners on any failure or default by the collector;" "provided always, that no such bond shall be put in suit against any surety for any deficiency other than what shall remain unsatisfied after sale of the lands and goods of such collector, in pursuance and by virtue of the directions and powers given to the respective commissioners by this act."

These directions and powers are in section fifty-two, which enacts, "that in case of default by a collector in paying the money received by him, the respective commissioners, or any two of them, in their respective jurisdictions, are empowered and authorized (not required) to imprison his person, and seize and secure the estates, both real and personal, belonging to him, or which shall descend and come to the hands or possession of his heirs, executors, or administrators, [408] wheresoever the same can be discovered or found; and the commissioners who shall seize and secure the estates shall appoint a time for a meeting of all the commissioners, who are empowered and required to sell and dispose of the collector's estate, to satisfy the arrears and costs, if the collector does not pay." These being the material provisions of the statute, it seems to me that, according to their true construction, it is discretionary in the commissioners whether they will seize or not; and that if they do not choose to seize, they may put the bond in suit, and that the proviso does not operate unless they do seize; and, secondly, that if the proviso be obligatory on the commissioners in all cases, it does not constitute a condition precedent, but is directory only.

The fifty-second section, of which I have stated the substance, appears to me to leave it clearly in the discretion of the commissioners whether they will seize the estate or not. They have the power of determining whether it is worth while, considering the nature of the property, its probable value, and the difficulty and expense of obtaining and converting it, to put in force the power of seizure.

The proviso, therefore, in the thirteenth section, which expressly refers to the directions and powers in the fifty-second section, and which are discretionary, ought to be read just as if the former section had provided, that the bond should not be put in suit for any deficiency other than such as remained after sale of the estate, real and personal, pursuant to the discretionary power in the commissioners; that is, "if the commissioners should think fit, in their discretion, to seize the estate, real and personal." If this is not done, this consequence will [409] follow: that the commissioners, who have a discretion by the fifty-second section, and that, no doubt, for the benefit of the parish at large, and the public, and all persons interested, to seize or not, are yet compellable to do so, under the penalty of not being able to sue on the bond for the deficiency if they do not so;—that if they, in their discretion, think the public interest and the interests of all best consulted by not incurring the expense of a seizure of property of no value, the public must suffer, by losing the remedy on the bond against the sureties, for it is in truth their loss. If the commissioners took this bond, and were acting for their own benefit, there might be some reason for saying, that if they did not choose first to take the estates of the principal, they should not sue the surety; but if they act, as they do not, for themselves, but for the public, it appears to be impossible to preserve the discretion given by the fifty-second section, without qualifying the thirteenth section, and making the proviso therein a contingent direction or order not to sue, if the discretion should be exercised, until the sale should have been completed. I am, therefore, of opinion, that this proviso in the thirteenth section has no operation, unless the commissioners choose to seize under the powers of the fifty-second section. But if this construction be not correct, and the proviso is obligatory on the commissioners in all cases, then arises the other question: Is the compliance with the enactment a condition precedent, and the non-compliance a bar to the action? I must say, I am of opinion that it is not. In the first place the language of the proviso is not, that no action shall lie or be maintained on the bond, but it comes by way of qualification on the former part of the clause, which commands the [410] commissioners to prosecute the bond on any failure or default. It is, therefore, a command to them not to put the bond in suit in the particular case contemplated by the proviso, but it is no more. Had the legislature intended to make the non-compliance with this regulation an absolute bar, I cannot help thinking they would have used different language; but it is not on the use of the precise expression that I place so much reliance, as on the consideration of the consequences to which the construction contended for would lead. If we construe the words literally, and say, therefore, that no action is maintainable unless they seize and sell the lands or goods of the defaulter, (whether they have knowledge, or by reasonable inquiry could obtain the knowledge, of them, or not,) no action could be safely brought; and the public, whose suit it is, would be defeated of their remedy, by the proof of the collector having any interest whatsoever, in possession or reversion, however remote, in lands, or any goods, however small in value, (and there is no one, however poor, who has not some,) in any place within their jurisdiction, or even without, for it may be made a question whether under the fifty-second section their power does not extend to lands and goods anywhere; this construction would operate, practically, to defeat the remedy on the bond altogether.

The consequences, therefore, to which such a construction would lead, at all events would require some implied exception in the provision of the statute, and it is, I understand, conceded by many of my brethren, that it cannot be a condition precedent in all cases. If the commissioners have notice or knowledge of the existence of such lands or goods, it is said that the sale [411] must be a condition precedent, otherwise not; but if so, can we say that if they could, with reasonable diligence, ascertain their existence, the sale should not in that case also be a condition precedent? There is a difficulty in drawing a distinction between the two cases, and much difficulty also in determining the fact of knowledge, or of the power to ascertain the existence of lands or goods. Is such knowledge or power of one of the commissioners,—a somewhat numerous body, to be sufficient?

These inconveniences and difficulties, coupled with the want of a direct and positive enactment that the sale shall be a condition precedent, induce me to think that the proviso, if not discretionary (of which I have said enough), was directory only, to the commissioners who act, to take all proper steps in the first instance. It does not follow, because it is directory, that it is not obligatory; and I conceive that for the non-compliance with that proviso there would be a remedy, either at law or in equity, though the want of such remedy would not, as it seems to me, necessarily prevent the clause from being construed to be directory.

For these reasons I cannot help thinking, that the legislature did not intend the proviso in question to be a condition precedent, and that the existence of lands or goods unsold should, under any circumstances, be a bar to an action.

3d. My answer to the second question which your Lordships have proposed, includes an answer to the third. For the reasons I have given before, I think that it is no defence to an action on the bond, that the commissioners did not seize and sell lands or goods of the [412] defaulter, of the existence of which they had no knowledge, before the commencement of the suit.

4th. To the fourth of your Lordships' questions my answer is, that, in the case supposed, the verdict ought to be entered on the issue raised by the rejoinder for the defendant. The plea is, in substance, (in so far as it is material to state it,) that the collector performed so much of the condition of the bond as relates to the receiving all the monies assessed from the person liable; and as to his deficiency in accounting for what he received, that he was possessed of and entitled to divers lands and goods, as of his own property, within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, of which the plaintiffs had notice, and which lands and goods still remain unsold.

The replication to this plea is, that the collector, after this breach of the condition, had no lands within their jurisdiction, which they could seize and sell, of which they had notice.

The rejoinder drops all mention of the notice, and simply avers that there were lands which they could and might have seized and sold, and concludes to the country, and the plaintiffs add the similitur. I think this issue was, for reasons I shall afterwards give, wholly immaterial, or rather, in reality, no issue at all; and if a court of error had a power to award a repleader, it ought to award it. I think the jury ought, upon the fact found, which is, that there were lands which the commissioners could have seized and sold, to have found for the defendant; for that is the averment which he makes, and which is put in issue.

5th. But, supposing the verdict to be so entered, [413] then, upon the supposition contained in your Lordships' fifth question, I am of opinion that this was an immaterial issue, upon which a repleader ought to have been awarded, (confining my opinion at present to the question on the 5th plea, and the pleadings arising out of it,) if the court of error had power to do so, but that judgment non obstante veredicto cannot be entered for the plaintiff.

The principle upon which such a judgment proceeds, as against a defendant, is, that he has confessed the plaintiff's action, and avoided it by matter which is, in substance, no answer to the plaintiff's action; and in such a case, although the issue raised upon that matter has been found for the defendant, yet the court gives judgment for the plaintiffs as upon a confession. There are four descriptions of judgments for a plaintiff,—on verdict, demurrer, nul dicit, and confession; Rea v. Philips, Strange, 395; and this belongs to the last, and is classed under that head, and all the cases in the books, which I have been able to find, are founded on that principle. Thus, in the form referred to by my brother Coltman, 14 Viner, title Judgment, D. pl. 1, the judgment proceeds upon the confession in the plea of the matters in the declaration, and want of sufficient matter in bar: the same in Carthew, 372, 2 Roll's Abridgment, 99, Willes, 365, 366. The cases, Lacy v. Reynolds, Croke, Elizabeth, 214; the King v. Philips, Strange, 394; Drayton v. Dale, 2 B. and C. 293; Earl of Lonsdale v. Nelson, 2 B. and C. 312; Lambert v. Taylor, 4 B. and C. 138; Clears v. Stevens, 8 Taunt. 413; Lewis v. Clement, 3 B. and A. 704; and Rickards v. Bennett, 1 B. and C. 223, are all cases of judgment [414] on pleas in confession and avoidance, bad in substance (for if bad in form merely, such a judgment will not be given; Staple v. Heydon); and after a very diligent search, I have not been able to discover a single case of this species of judgment, or any other plea than those which are, technically, in confession and avoidance.

But it is said, that if a plea traverses one out of several matters alleged in the declaration, it confesses the remainder to be true, and, in like manner, the rejoinder confesses such part of the replication as it does not deny; but I do not think it confesses the remainder, in the sense which is required to found such a judgment; Hudson v. Jones, 1 Salk. 91. That which is traversable and not traversed may be said, no doubt, to be admitted for some purpose; that is, it cannot be made a matter in dispute on the trial; and if it were taken by protestation, under the form of pleading before the new rules, the matter would have been equally put out of the issue, but there would have been great difficulty in maintaining that this was a confession, for the purpose of giving the plaintiffs judgment. The effect of a traverse of one fact out of many is merely this: that the party pleading rests his defence on a denial of that fact only; but if the decision of it in favour of the defendant turns out to be immaterial, I conceive the Court cannot give judgment as on a confession of the other facts. I am fortified in this opinion, not merely by the absence of any authority to warrant such a judgment, but by some cases of a similar nature, in which the Courts have decided that a repleader ought to be awarded; for, if the position be true that a defendant confesses that fact, [415] in a declaration or replication, which he does not deny, it must be equally true of a plaintiff denying one matter which is immaterial, out of several matters in a good plea; and yet in this case Lord Holt says, in Pitts v. Polehampton, and in the same case in Lord Raymond, 391, there must be a repleader. In Sergeant v. Fairfax, 1 Levin, 32, and 1 Keble, 23, which was an action of debt for rent against the assignee of the lessee, (as it seems from the latter report,) the plea was, that the defendant assigned over to a stranger, with the consent of the plaintiff; and the issue was on the consent, and after verdict, (whether for the plaintiff or defendant is uncertain,) a repleader was awarded. The case is reported several times in Keble, and this appears to be the result. But I must own that no great weight ought to be attached to this authority, from the inaccurate mode in which it appears to have been reported. In a recent case in the Exchequer, Plummer v. Lee, the Court decided that where the defendant traversed an immaterial averment, there could not be judgment non obstante veredicto, but that there must be a repleader.

For these reasons I cannot help thinking, that if the replication in this case had averred two distinct facts, and the rejoinder had traversed one, which was immaterial and was found for the defendant, it would not have admitted the other, so as to warrant judgment non obstante veredicto. But even if it were so, the doctrine would not apply to such a case as this; for here, in truth, the issue is immaterial,—one on which no judgment can be given, not because an immaterial fact is traversed, but because there is in reality no issue at [416] all,—no affirmance on one side of the same proposition which is denied by the other; and the case belongs to a numero us class of immaterial issues, which are to be found in the books, where issue is taken by one party on that which is not alleged by the other. I would instance the cases of Enys v. Mohun, Strange, 847, 1 Barnadiston, 182, 220, which was an action against the assignee of a lease, to whom the estate of the lessee had come by assignment: plea, that the lessee did not assign to defendant; and after issue joined a repleader was awarded, it being an issue joined on what is not alleged in the declaration; and the cases in Gilbert, C. P. 48, Croke, James, 585, Walker v. Brook, 1 Lord Raym. 133, all afford instances of the same kind. In the present case the replication is, that the collector had not any lands of which the commissioners had notice, which pleading is bad on special demurrer, as being a negative pregnant; that is, an issue that rather supposes an affirmative than the contrary, but good after verdict; Gilbert, C. P. 153. If the replication had been proper, it should either have denied that there were lands, or admitted that there were, and averred that the commissioners had no notice of them; but this informal replication does not deny that there were lands, nor does it admit that there were: but it means, in effect, this: either that there were no lands, or, if there were, that the commissioners had no notice of them. The rejoinder contains no answer to this proposition, but avers, simply, that there were lands; a fact which was never denied by the plaintiffs; and on this ground I am satisfied that this is a purely immaterial issue,—more properly no issue at all,—which is not cured [417] by verdict, upon which no judgment can be given, and for which, in the Court below, a repleader ought to have been awarded.

6th. In answer to the sixth question proposed by your Lordships I have to state, that, in my opinion, it is not competent for a court of error to award a repleader.

Upon this point we have the express authority of Lord Hale, Bennett v. Holbeck, who said that course had been disused then 100 years, and could not be practised. To the same effect is Crosse v. Bilson, 6 Mod. 103; and I believe no instance can be found in recent times of such a proceeding. The reason for this, probably, is, that the authority given by the writ of error is confined to giving judgment, whether of reversal, affirmance, or venire de novo, on the existing record, and that the parties are not before them to replead; they have no day in court, and are not necessarily present when the judgment is pronounced. The defendant in error has the means of compelling the plaintiff in error to assign errors by scire facias quare executionem non; and the plaintiff in error may oblige the defendant to appear, and join in error, by scire facias ad audiendum errores, or the defendant may come freely; but, this done, the record in error does not usually state the presence of both parties when judgment is given; and judgment may certainly be affirmed in the absence of the defendant, as is stated by Mr. Justice Powell in Staple v. Heydon. Be this as it may, there is no doubt but a court of error does not now possess this power. If a court of error could award a repleader, I think it ought to do so in this case.

7th. I think the answer to the seventh question pro-[418]-posed by your Lordships ought to be, that the judgment should be for the plaintiff non obstante veredicto, on the ground that the fifth plea confessed the right of action on the bond, and did not avoid the same by sufficient matter; that is, that the judgment should be affirmed. But if I am wrong in supposing that the sale of the lands was not a condition precedent, then I am of opinion that the judgment for the plaintiffs below ought to be reversed, simply; and they must begin de novo. I do not think that any aid can be lawfully derived from the other pleadings in this case, though I am not prepared to say that it may not in some cases.

It was said in Goodburne v. Bowman, and very truly, “that most of the cases in which the question of a repleader was considered were before the statute of Anne, when only one plea could be put on the record; and that if such plea did not contain a confession, there was no part of the record by which the deficiency could be supplied.” The Lord Chief Justice proceeds to state, “that in that case there was a verdict upon the general issue,” and “that, although in considering the merit or demerit of any individual plea recourse cannot be had to another, unless expressly referred to by such plea, yet, as the application to enter the verdict is founded upon the whole record, upon which it appears that the defendants have committed the grievance complained of, and have not shown any sufficient justification, it may be considered that, in this point of view, there was enough to warrant an application for judgment non obstante veredicto, and that no rule was better established than that the court will not grant a repleader unless complete justice could not be answered without [419] it;” and he cites Symmers v. Regem, Cowp. 510. This doctrine, so laid down by the Chief Justice, is, I believe, new; at first I felt considerable doubt as to its being well founded, but it is extremely convenient and reasonable, and I am not prepared to say that any valid objection can be made to it, provided it be explained and qualified in the manner I will mention; but, unfortunately, that qualification will exclude the present case. Where it applies, a new mode of entering up the judgment upon the record would be required, treating the issue found for the defendant as immaterial, and proceeding, notwithstanding the verdict on that issue, to give judgment upon the other issue found for the plaintiff. Nor am I satisfied that the doctrine laid down by the Chief Justice would not apply to a case in which the other issues, one or more, being each material and decisive of the whole cause of action, are each found for the plaintiff, although they, severally or together, did not confess or traverse all the material facts alleged in the declaration; for it may be well said, that a repleader is to be granted, to enable the parties to plead properly such a plea as would be decisive of the action; and if they have already done so, under the power given by the statute of Anne, and raised one or more correct issues, each of which would decide the action, and the court may give judgment on the finding on the material issue or issues, such a course is unnecessary; and I am disposed to think, on that ground, after full consideration, that the Court of Exchequer was wrong in awarding a repleader in the case of Plummer v. Lee, already referred to, although it would have been rightly awarded if the only plea had been the traverse of the immaterial fact alleged [420] in the declaration. But I am of opinion, that this doctrine will not help the plaintiff in this case, because the matter of the fifth plea has never been tried at all by a proper issue. The defendant had liberty to plead that plea, and has a right to all the benefits of it; and if it be good in point of law. (which, for this purpose, I must assume,) he had a right to have the facts properly disposed of by a proper issue. This has not been done. As the issue was found in his favour, he would have a right to ask for a repleader if the plea stood alone, and cannot be deprived of that right if it is joined with others. I am, therefore, of opinion, that, assuming the plea to be good, the other pleadings would not help the plaintiff, and the judgment ought to be reversed.

Vaughan, J.—My Lords, I have considered with attention the various questions which, in this complicated case, your Lordships have propounded to the judges, some of which, being "inter apices doctrinae placitando," may be expected to provoke much difference of opinion. I have found great difficulty in bringing my mind to a satisfactory conclusion upon some of them, which may cease to be matter of surprise when it is remembered, that, after the most anxious consideration, not only have different judges taken different views of the same questions, but the same judges, after much ruminating, have felt themselves constrained to give different judgments upon the same question, as the case proceeded through its several stages in the Courts below.

1st. To the first question, which appears to be the most easy of solution, I answer, that the conduct of [421] A. B., under the circumstances stated, in paying over to the receiver general any part of the monies collected by him for the year 1828, to be applied to the service and account of former years, was a direct breach of the condition of the bond; but as the case of a surety has ever been regarded with favour both in courts of law and equity, his liability must be clearly demonstrated. He has executed a bond with a condition, by which he stipulates that on A. B. being appointed collector of the taxes for the district in question, for the year 1828, he will be responsible for his collecting, and well and truly paying over to the receiver general, all such monies as shall come to his hands by virtue of the assessments of that year. True it is that A. B. did faithfully collect all the sums due upon those assessments, and did pay them over to the receiver general, but with a specific appropriation of part, viz. £693, to the account and service of a former year, for which year the defendant below was not his surety.

Adverting to the provisions of the act 43 Geo. 3, cap. 99 (so often referred to), which creates and defines the obligations and duties of the collector and of his surety, I am of opinion that A. B. thereby incurred a forfeiture of the penalty of the bond. But in looking at the general frame and context of the act of parliament, one cannot fail to observe, that the duties and responsibility of the collector and his surety are several and distinct, expressed in different terms, and depending upon very different provisions. The office of each is an annual office, and in considering the question submitted to us, we must carefully avoid confounding the duties of these respective officers for any one particular year with [422] the duties of any prior or subsequent year. It may happen accidentally, but not necessarily, that the collector of the preceding year may also be appointed collector for the subsequent year, and that the surety of the former year may chance to become the surety for the collector of the following year, and so vice versa. The principal, or collector, engages that he will duly collect, and well and truly pay over to the receiver general, all sums received by him, by virtue of the assessments made in the year 1828, to the service and account of that particular year, and the surety becomes responsible for the faithful discharge of this duty; but if, instead of paying over the sums collected in 1828 to the service and account of that year, he directs the same, or any part of them, to be applied to the extinction or liquidation of an arrear which he had suffered to accumulate in any former year, I have no hesitation in declaring that he becomes as much a defaulter, to the extent of such misappropriation, as if he had applied the money to the payment of his own private debt; and pro tanto the parish becomes liable to be re-assessed to make good such deficiency, and may resort to the surety for indemnification to the extent of the default. Whether this conduct of A. B. amounted to a breach of the condition of the bond cannot, in my humble judgment, be tried by a more infallible test than that suggested by Baron Parke, in delivering his judgment in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, wherein he observes, that the condition of the bond is to be construed as if another person, and not A. B., had been collector for a former year; and could it then admit of any doubt that it would be a breach of the condition "to pay well and truly to the receiver general," if the money had been lent by [423] A. B. to such former collector to enable him to pay his arrears? Although the money had been so applied, it is in effect, for this purpose, an appropriation by A. B. to the payment of his own debt.

To my mind this proposition, involved in the first question, appears so plain, and so directly in unison with the opinions (I believe) of all the judges, (whatever difference may be found to exist in the answers to be returned to some of the subsequent questions,) that I cannot prevail upon myself to waste more of your Lordships' valuable time upon the consideration of it.

2d. The second question opens a more extended field of discussion, and is calculated to excite much greater difference of opinion. We are told that A. B., at the time of the supposed breach of the condition of the bond, had certain lands and goods within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, of which they had knowledge before any action brought upon the bond; and we are asked, whether, an action being brought, it would be a defence to that action, that the commissioners did not, before suit, seize and sell the said lands and goods?

The answer to this question seems to depend upon establishing the proposition, that such seizure and sale was a condition precedent, which must be complied with before the surety can be sued; and whether it be such a condition precedent must be determined by the true construction of the proviso in the thirteenth section of 43 Geo. 3, regard being had at the same time to the power and authority given to the commissioners, by the fifty-second section, to deal with the person and property of the collector making default. It has been [424] argued, and I think correctly, that the clause enabling the commissioners to seize the lands and goods of the collector is not imperative, but directory only, and is not a step necessarily preliminary to putting the bond in suit against the principal; but I conceive that the legislature has drawn a distinction, and expressed it in words too plain to be mistaken, between the liability of the principal and of the surety, and has, with the most guarded caution, placed the responsibility of the latter upon the more favoured footing. After directing the form of the bond to be taken from the surety, that section proceeds to enact, that "every such bond given by way of security shall be prosecuted by the commissioners on any failure or default of the collector," but accompanied, and followed, by this remarkable proviso, which I regard as the inducement or consideration influencing the mind of the surety to enter into the obligation; viz., "provided always, that no such bond shall be put in suit against any surety for any deficiency other than what shall remain unsatisfied after the sale of the lands, tenements, and chattels of such collectors, in pursuance of and by virtue of the directions and powers given by this act." If this proviso, admitted on all hands to have been introduced for the sole purpose of giving protection to the surety, and of easing the burthen of his obligation, does not disarm the commissioners of any power to call him to account until the deficiency of the collector has been ascertained, after giving credit for the proceeds resulting from the sale of his lands and goods, pursuant to the powers in the fifth section, in reduction of the balance, I ask, what language could be devised more clear to convey the notion of a strict condition precedent than the words of this [425] proviso? To my mind this is a solemn declaration made by the legislature, (contemplating the reluctance with which persons might become sureties in bonds of this description,) that whoever executed them should not be prosecuted for the default of the collector until after the commissioners had first seized and sold all the real and personal estate of the collector, of which they had any knowledge, and, having given credit for the proceeds in reduction of the debt, might then, and then only, enforce the bond against the surety. How far the neglect or failure of the commissioners to exercise the powers delegated to them, of proceeding against the lands and goods of the principal, for the purpose of making them available in diminution of the debt or balance to be afterwards claimed against the surety, may render them obnoxious to any proceedings, by mandamus or by suit in equity or otherwise, we are not called upon to discuss; but, surely, their neglect to discharge the trust reposed in them affords no just ground for prematurely accelerating the liability of the surety. So harsh a construction of the proviso in the thirteenth section would be fraught with injustice, and virtually operate as a fraud upon the surety. I am, therefore, of opinion, upon the plain letter of the act of parliament, upon the clear intention of the legislature, to be collected from the whole frame and spirit of its various enactments, and upon the reason of the thing, that the neglect of the commissioners to seize and sell the lands and goods of the collector, of which they had knowledge, before the action was commenced, would, if properly pleaded, afford a good ground of defence to such action.

[426] 3d. To the third question, which assumes the want of knowledge in the commissioners, and their ignorance of the fact of the existence of any lands or goods belonging to the collector within their jurisdiction, before the commencement of the suit, I answer de non existentibus et non apparentibus eadem est et ratio et lex. Upon this short ground, and on this plain and sound principle, I am of opinion that his defence must fail, where the commissioners have had no notice.

4th. The fourth question, whether the issue raised by the rejoinder to the replication to the fifth plea ought to have been found for the plaintiffs or for the defendant, depends upon the matters involved in that issue. If the rejoinder, not having traversed the fact of notice to the commissioners, (a most important part of the issue tendered by the replication,) can be considered as having the legal effect of impliedly admitting the want of notice to the commissioners of there being any lands, etc. of A. B. within their jurisdiction, before the commencement of the action, I think that the verdict on that issue should have been found for the plaintiffs. But I cannot satisfy my mind, that the defendant below, by his rejoinder, can be taken to have made any such admission. The allegation in the replication, that the commissioners sold all the lands of A. B. of which they had notice, is one entire and substantive allegation, the whole of which the defendant might and ought to have traversed, but, by omitting one very essential part of it, he has thereby raised an immaterial issue, (if any issue be raised,) in which I think the fact of notice not involved. Taking this [427] view of the subject, the finding of the jury, that A. B. had lands, etc., properly affirms all that was put in issue, and, therefore, entitles the defendant to have it entered in his favour; but, as it is an immaterial issue, what are the legal consequences resulting from such finding of the jury will be seen in the answer to the subsequent questions.

5th. To the fifth question, if I am correct in supposing that the verdict should be entered for the defendant, upon the issue raised by the rejoinder to the fifth plea, and that it would be no defence to the action, that the lands of A. B. were not sold by the commissioners, unless they had notice of their existence, I think that judgment might be entered for the plaintiffs non obstante veredicto, provided the fifth plea can be considered as amounting to a confession of the cause of action, and an insufficient avoidance of it. The rule, as applicable to cases of this description, is laid down with great precision and perspicuity by Lord Chief Justice Abbott, in Lambert v. Taylor. He says, the plea being bad, the defendant certainly cannot have judgment, although the issue is found for him, the issue being taken on an immaterial matter; and the question, whether the plaintiff can have judgment, or whether there ought to be a repleader, (supposing the court competent to award a repleader,) depends upon the question, whether the plea does or does not contain a confession of a cause of action. If a cause of action be confessed by the plea, and the matter pleaded in avoidance be insufficient, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment, notwithstanding the verdict. The same rule was recognized, and confirmed, by the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Goodburne v. [428] Bowman, and by the Court of Exchequer in Plummer v. Lee.

Let us apply this test: the fifth plea states, that A. B. did well and faithfully demand and collect all the sums of money charged in the said assessments, and then avers that he was possessed of and entitled to certain lands within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, of which the plaintiffs had notice, and which they might have seized and sold, to satisfy the sums so collected and detained, and not duly paid over by him in pursuance of his bond. This plea confesses a cause of action, and contains matter in avoidance of it, capable of being moulded into an issue, which, properly framed, would have determined the merits of the case. But mark the mode in which the plaintiffs deal with this plea in their replication: they state, that, after A. B. had collected the sums assessed, and omitted to pay them over to the receiver general, he had no lands within the jurisdiction of the commissioners which they could seize and sell, of which the plaintiffs had notice.

Without discussing the question, whether the plaintiff's replication was not inartificially drawn, and open to a special demurrer, inasmuch as it traverses, not the single fact, whether A. B. had lands within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, nor the fact, simpliciter, whether the plaintiffs had notice, but the compound proposition, that he had no lands whereof the plaintiffs had notice, perhaps the more correct mode of replying to a plea so framed would have been, either to have traversed the fact of A. B. having lands, or the fact of the plaintiffs having had notice; the one or the other, but [429] not both; the failure to maintain either being fatal to the defendant's bar. Such being the plea and the replication, the defendant rejoins, that A. B. had lands within the jurisdiction, omitting to traverse so essential a part of the issue tendered by the replication as the fact of notice.

It appears to me, that the plaintiffs might have demurred to this rejoinder, as tendering an immaterial issue, (if not amounting to a departure,) passing by and losing sight altogether of the fact of notice, upon which the strength and sufficiency of the bar rested. Instead of doing so they have countenanced this error, and concurred, by adding the similiter, in sending an issue to be tried by a jury, which cannot dispose of the merits of the case. How, then, is the verdict to be entered on this issue?

With unfeigned deference to the opinion of others, I conceive, as I have before stated, that the verdict should be entered for the defendant, the jury having found the only fact involved in it in his favour, viz., that A. B. had lands within the jurisdiction of the commissioners.

There being, therefore, a plea upon the record which confesses a cause of action, and which contains matter in avoidance of it, which might have determined the rights of the parties, but which has failed to do so, from their mutual neglect to observe the rules of good pleading, I think the plaintiffs are not entitled to enter up judgment non obstante veredicto, upon a supposed implied confession in the rejoinder that, if there were lands within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, the plaintiffs had no notice of them. For the reasons suggested by my brother Coleridge and the learned Baron Parke, I agree that the neglect of the defendant to traverse the fact of notice does not amount to any such implied admission of it.

6th. Supposing the judgment could not be so entered, and the issue raised by the rejoinder be (as I apprehend it must be) adjudged immaterial, we are called upon to declare our opinions upon the jurisdiction of a court of error to grant a repleader, and upon the expediency of doing so in the case before us. I believe it has been a prevalent notion in Westminster Hall, of late years, that a court of error cannot award a repleader; and the neglect or forbearance to exercise this right, through a long succession of years, is strong evidence against the existence of it, since the statute of Anne, which allowed defendants any number of pleas the court might be pleased to sanction, and since the practice of granting new trials has grown into daily use, the awarding of a repleader, even by the Courts below, has become of rare occurrence, inasmuch as the Court from whence the record issues is likely to render such proceeding unnecessary. In the case of Bennett v. Holbeck Lord Hale is reported to have said, that in ancient times it was usual to award a repleader on a writ of error from the Common Pleas to the King's Bench; and that he had searched, and found several rolls, not less than seven in number, (the earliest in the 21 Edward 1, and the latest in the 33 Edward 3,) in which a repleader had been so awarded; but he adds, it was grown obsolete, and not in use at that day. I am not aware that the jurisdiction of a court of error to award a repleader, (assuming it once to have existed,) has ever been [431] abolished by any legislative enactment, or declared illegal by any judicial decisions. But since the time of Lord Hale more than a century and a half has elapsed, and sunk the practice (if ever it existed) into absolute desuetude, and involved the right in deeper obscurity. I cannot, therefore, venture to affirm the jurisdiction of a court of error to award a repleader, and consequently cannot recommend the expediency of doing so in this case.

7th. This leads me to the last and the only remaining question, viz., what judgment ought to be pronounced, supposing a court of error cannot or do not award a repleader? To which I answer, in a word, that judgment cannot be pronounced for the defendant, because the issues found for him are immaterial issues; neither, as it appears to me, can judgment be pronounced for the plaintiff on the whole record, or on the 5th plea, non obstante veredicto, for the reasons I have before stated. Deeply regretting the time and cost which have been expended in a fruitless litigation, I come to the conclusion, which I have arrived at after much fluctuation of opinion, with great reluctance, viz., that the judgment of the Court below should be reversed, and the plaintiffs be at liberty to retrace their steps and begin de novo, if they shall be so advised.

Littledale, J.:—My Lords, in answer to the first question, I am of opinion, that the conduct of A. B. was a breach of the condition of the bond, for the reasons already given by my brothers.

2d. and 3d. As to the second question and the third question, they are so much connected together, that, with the [432] leave of the House, I should propose to give an answer which applies to both.

Two questions arise on the construction of the statute of 43 Geo. 3, cap. 99. The first is, whether the sale of the lands and goods of the collector be a condition precedent to putting the bond in suit against the surety? The second question is, whether, if it be a condition precedent, it applies to all the lands and goods of the collector, or only to those which were known to the commissioners; and I use the term "known," because the word "notice," which occurs in the pleading, sometimes means that knowledge which is acquired by specific information given with a particular object, as in the instance of notice of dishonour of bills of exchange and other cases, but, as applicable to the present case, I mean, by the term known, knowledge, in whatever way it is acquired.

Upon the first of these points, I think the sale of the lands and goods of the collector is a condition precedent to putting the bond in suit. The 13th section, after prescribing the form of the bond of the surety, says, "Every such bond given by way of such security, as aforesaid, shall be prosecuted by the commissioners on any failure or default of the collector;" and then there immediately follows, "Provided always, that no such bond shall be put in suit against any surety for any deficiency, other than what shall remain unsatisfied after sale of the lands, tenements, goods, and chattels of such collector, in pursuance of and by virtue of the directions and powers given by this act." Here, therefore, is a provision that the bonds shall not be put in suit for any deficiency, other than what shall [433] remain unsatisfied after a particular thing done. It is quite clear, that if the lands and goods have been sold, the bond can only be put in suit for the difference; but if there are lands and goods, and they can be sold by the commissioners under the powers and directions of the act, the meaning of the clause is, that the deficiency must be ascertained first; for, otherwise, it is putting the bond in suit for the whole, when the act says it shall only be so for a deficiency. It is a very reasonable provision for a surety, that he shall not be called upon till all has been got from the collector that can be raised.

But it is necessary to see what are the powers and directions given by the act, by which the deficiency is to be ascertained; they are contained in the 52d section, which enacts, that, if the collector makes default in the particulars enumerated, the commissioners are authorized and empowered to imprison the person, and seize and secure the estate, both real and personal, of the collector, wheresoever the same can be discovered and found; and the commissioners, who shall so seize and secure the estate, shall and they are empowered to appoint a time for a meeting of the commissioners; and the commissioners present at such meeting, in case the accounts of the collector be not delivered, or the money detained by him be not paid, are empowered and required to sell and dispose of all such estates which shall be, for the cause aforesaid, seized and secured. It is said that this clause, as to seizing the estates, is only directory to the commissioners, as they are only authorized and empowered, and not required, to seize, and that this is more strongly shown, because in a subsequent part of the clause they are required to sell, and, [434] therefore, a different phraseology is used. There is not the least doubt but that the clause as to seizing is only directory, and only gives a discretion to the commissioners, that if the collector makes default they may seize and secure the estates; and then, if, at the subsequent meeting, the collector does not pay up his deficiency, they are required to sell; which is all very reasonable,—that they shall not be required to sell if he can redeem his estate; and then it is said, that, because the clause to seize is only discretionary with the commissioners, they need not seize unless they think proper; and as the powers and directions as to the seizure and sale of the estates are not, in point of fact, exercised, and need not be so, unless the commissioners think proper, the deficiency, after the exercise of these powers, is out of the question, and does not and need not arise, and the bond may be put in suit without regard to that. But I think not; the 52d clause is as to conduct to be pursued towards the collector, and the commissioners will, no doubt, exercise their discretion as will best accord with the discharge of their duties to the crown, to the parishioners, and the collector; but if they do not think it right to enforce their powers, the sureties are not to suffer by that. The proviso in the 13th section is introduced for the benefit of the surety, and the meaning of it, in my opinion, is, that they are not to be called upon till the commissioners have done all in their power to make the collector pay; and if, for any reason, they omit to do that, they are not to call on the surety.

If it be not a condition precedent, I do not see how the surety can have the benefit of the clause, for, if the surety be compelled to pay the whole, I do not think he [435] could have a mandamus to the commissioners to seize and sell. Their power is only to seize and sell if the collector has not paid the money; but if the money has been paid by other means, the collector is no longer indebted to the commissioners. Besides, if a mandamus was to go, it must be for the whole direction of the clause; and that is, that the money arising from the sale shall be paid to the receiver general, and then the surety would have to petition the crown to be repaid; and I should doubt whether a court of equity would compel a sale, unless to carry the whole clause into effect, and so as that the surety might petition the crown, when the money had got into the hands of the receiver general. Perhaps the commissioners might, of themselves, sell, in order to relieve the surety. But, besides my doubting the power of the commissioners to sell after they have been paid by the surety, I do not think the surety ought to be put in the situation of having to rely upon what they may be disposed to do.

It is very possible that some inconvenience, and in some cases loss, might arise, if the bond could not be enforced against the surety till the estates are sold, for, certainly, the proceedings under the 52d section must be attended with delay. But I do not think we have any thing to do with that consideration; the question is upon the construction of the act, as it is presented to us. Some distinction was raised in the argument as to the meaning of the words "prosecute" and "put in suit," and that, because the word prosecute in the bond was used without any restriction, the bond might be enforced by action immediately; but I think prosecute and put in suit are synonymous in pleading. [436] In a writ the common phraseology is, sued and prosecuted out of the Court, etc.; if the word sued, alone, or prosecuted, alone, was used, it would mean the same thing as in joining the two words; and in the 13th clause the restriction, I think, must be applied as well to the prosecuting the bond as putting it in suit.

3d. The other question is, as to notice or knowledge of the estates and goods; as to which there is more doubt, because there is no such language as notice or knowledge used in the act of parliament; but the construction of the act of parliament must have a reasonable intendment engrafted upon it, arising out of the existing state of things; and I think it can only be intended that the commissioners shall be compellable to seize and sell, for the benefit of the surety, such lands and goods as they know of. It is impossible for them to seize things of which they are ignorant, and it would not be any breach of duty in them not to seize lands of which they had no knowledge. If they were negligent in not taking reasonable means, according to circumstances, to find out the effects, it might furnish some means of proceeding against the commissioners; but as a mere question of construction, whether they were bound, on a condition precedent, to seize that of which they had no knowledge, any acts of negligence or want of attention in that respect could not arise.

I do not think the words "wheresoever the same can be found" apply to this part of the construction; and I think that means, wherever, locally, they can be found.

The collector might have some small interest in [437] public works and undertakings, where there are a great number of proprietors, as to which the commissioners would have no means of information; so, also, an estate may have come to him, as heir at law or devisee of a person who died the day before the bond was put in suit, of which the commissioners know nothing; or he might have a small quantity of goods in some obscure room; and many other cases might be put where knowledge of the fact of having lands or goods would be utterly impossible; and then, if knowledge was not made an accompaniment of the property, a very small amount of effects, under circumstances before stated, would prevent the bond being sued upon.

I do not consider that the question of hardship ought to influence my opinion either on one side or the other; but it may be observed that this construction does not seem to impose any great degree of hardship on the surety, because, if he looked after his own interest, a very little exertion would enable him to make himself at least acquainted with the material parts of the property of the collector; and if he is afraid that the commissioners may not be very anxious to get the information themselves, it would be very easy for the surety to give distinct notice of the property to the commissioners. Not that I mean, as I have before stated, that express notice need be given; for, if they have knowledge by any means whatever, that constitutes notice within the meaning of the word notice, as used in these proceedings.

The result of these remarks on the second and third questions is, that, under the circumstances stated in the [438] second question, there would be a good defence to the action; and that, under the circumstances stated in the third question, there would not be a good defence to the action.

4th. As to the fourth question, the replication to the fifth plea states, that Bigg had no lands within the jurisdiction of the commissioners which they could seize and sell, of which they had notice; and all the goods and chattels of Bigg within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, and of which the plaintiffs had notice, were seized and sold.

The rejoinder to this replication says, that Bigg had divers lands within the jurisdiction of the commissioners which they could and might have seized and sold, and that all the goods and chattels of Bigg which could and might and ought to have been discovered and found by the commissioners, were not seized and sold in pursuance of the directions and powers given to the commissioners by the said act of parliament, in manner and form as the plaintiffs have above, in that behalf, alleged; and of this the defendant puts himself upon the country.

And the finding of the jury on the issue so tendered is, "And as to the issue twelfthly within joined, the jurors say that Bigg had lands or houses to him belonging, of the value of £121, which could and might have been seized and sold by the commissioners in pursuance of and by virtue of the directions and powers given to the commissioners by the said act of parliament; and that Bigg also had goods and chattels to him belonging, of the value of £200, which also they could and might have seized and sold in like manner [439] under and by virtue of the provisions of the said act."

Now, in this part of the finding the issue raised in the rejoinder is found for the defendant. It is very true that the jury also find that the commissioners had not notice of Bigg being possessed of the houses or lands, but they had reasonable grounds for believing that Bigg possessed the said household goods, which might have been seized and sold by them under and by virtue of the provisions of the said act of parliament, and that Bigg absconded; but the other facts found on the special verdict as to this are not put in issue by the rejoinder to the replication to the fifth plea; and the findings as to that do not vary the finding of the issue on the facts alleged, and, therefore, in answer to the fourth question I think the verdict must be entered for the defendant.

5th. To the fifth question, I think the plaintiffs are not entitled to judgment non obstante veredicto. The fifth plea states that Bigg had lands and goods of which the commissioners had notice, and which were subject and liable to be seized and sold, and which might have been seized and sold, but which remained unsold by the commissioners. This plea, in my opinion, is a good answer to the action, unless it be impeached and the effect of it taken away by the subsequent pleadings; it confesses the bond, and avoids the effect of it.

The replication to this plea says, that Bigg had no lands which the commissioners could seize and sell, of which they had notice, and that all the goods of Bigg, of which the commissioners had notice, were seized and sold.

[440] The rejoinder says, that Bigg had lands which the commissioners might have seized and sold, and that all the goods of Bigg, which could and might and ought to have been discovered and found by the commissioners, were not seized and sold in pursuance of the directions and powers given to the commissioners by the said act of parliament, in manner and form as the plaintiffs have alleged.

Now, the plea being good, and the replication being also a good answer, a material point in dispute is tending towards an issue; but when the defendant comes to rejoin, he drops all about the notice. Now, as notice is a material point, the rejoinder is bad, because it omits to put in issue a material point, and the rejoinder might be demurred to, but they have not demurred; but they have joined issue upon a part which, taken simply of itself, is not sufficient to decide the merits of the case, and may be treated as not altogether immaterial, (because it is material whether Bigg had lands,) but though material in part it is not material to decide the case, but is rather to be treated as insufficient. The cause is tried upon the issue so tendered and joined, and the verdict, if you are to confine it to the very words of the issue, is found for the defendant; but as the plea itself is a good plea, I do not think the subsequent defects in the pleadings are to invalidate the plea to such an extent as to say, that the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict non obstante veredicto. The cases where the plaintiff is entitled to such a benefit are where the plea to the action is insufficient; here the plea is sufficient, but the plaintiffs have not taken care to put that plea, if one may so express it, out of doors.

[441] If the rejoinder could be taken to be a confession of the want of notice, it might be contended that the judgment ought to be entered for the plaintiffs, because, if the defendant has admitted want of notice, then the finding of the jury that Bigg had lands, when coupled with the confession of the defendant that there was no notice, would show that he had no defence. But I do not think it can be taken that the defendant can be taken to have confessed that the commissioners had no notice, for the allegation that Bigg had lands of which the commissioners had notice is one entire allegation, and the notice is not alleged as a substantive thing; and I do not think that the dropping part of an allegation, when the other part by that means becomes immaterial, is to be an admission of what is so dropped.

6th. To the sixth question, I think a court of error cannot award a repleader, for the reasons given by my brothers; if they could award a repleader, I think it would be proper to do so in this case.

7th. To the seventh question, I see nothing to entitle the plaintiff to judgment on the whole record, whatever may be the case as to the other pleadings on the record. I think that as to the seventh question we are confined to the fifth plea, and as I think the fifth plea constitutes a good defence, and, I think, as the plaintiffs had not taken care to get rid of it, but have gone to trial upon an immaterial issue, though the verdict must be entered for the defendant, yet no judgment can be entered upon it for the defendant; and as, for the reasons I have before given, I think the plaintiff is not entitled to a judgment non obstante veredicto, I think [442] that the judgment given in the Court below must be reversed.

The case was adjourned till Mr. Baron Gurney could give his opinion. He attended on the same day.

Gurney, B.—My Lords, it appears, by the special verdict to which the first question refers, that A. B. was duly appointed collector of the assessed taxes for the year 1828, and that the plaintiff in error duly entered into a bond, with a condition for payment by A. B., to the receiver general of the taxes, of all the sums collected and received by him, and which came to his hands as collector for the year 1828; but that he did not pay all those sums to the account or service of that year, but a part only, and the residue he paid to the account or service of former years for which he had been collector, for which former years the party in this cause was not surety.

The plain and necessary result from this statement is, that A. B. violated his duty, and that the bond is forfeited. The appointment is for the year 1828. The duty under that appointment is confined to that year. The bond is for the due performance of his duty for that year.

It was his duty to apply the collection of that year to the account and service of that year.

The application of any part of the money collected under the assessments of that year, to cover any deficiency in any former year, is just as much a breach of his duty, and a forfeiture of this bond, as if he had paid the money to any other creditor, or lost it at the gaming table.

[443] The suretiship was for the conduct of the collector in the year 1828, and no other. Neither the collector nor the surety were contemplated in any other character than as collector and surety for that year. The collector for the former year might have been different; the sureties for the former year were different; but these circumstances cannot make any difference in the consideration of this question.

2d and 3d. The second and third questions are, whether this action can be maintained against the surety until the commissioners shall have sold the lands, goods, and chattels of the collector within their jurisdiction; and your Lordships have propounded questions to the judges, founded upon the different suppositions of the commissioners having and not having notice of that fact.

I am of opinion, that if the collector had goods, lands, and chattels within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, they could not put the bond in suit; and I do not think that their right of action is affected by their knowledge or their ignorance.

The statute 43 George 3, c. 99, s. 13, directs the security to be given by the collectors with the two sureties by a joint and several bond; and every such bond given by way of such security shall be prosecuted by the commissioners on any failure or default of the collector, provided, etc.

If, therefore, the collector has lands, tenements, goods, or chattels, I think that the sale of them by the commissioners is a condition precedent.

This proviso holds out to the persons who become sureties for collectors, that they shall not be resorted to till all the means of payment from the property which [444] the collector shall have should have been exhausted; and if that be not fulfilled to the very letter, I think that the surety does not receive the security which is held out to him by this proviso.

I admit that this question of knowledge is not free from difficulty. It may be said, that a fact of which the commissioners are ignorant is the same as a fact that does not exist. The special verdict upon which these questions are founded, however, shows that the ignorance of the commissioners in this instance arose from a want of due diligence, as the jury found that the collector had lands and goods, and that the commissioners had reasonable grounds for believing that he had.

Another observation serves to show that knowledge or ignorance does not enter into this question. If knowledge be necessary, it must be, I apprehend, the knowledge of the two or three commissioners who are the obligees in the bond. The commissioners consist of a large number of persons; it may happen that these two or three persons may be utterly ignorant, whereas 150 others may have entire and perfect knowledge. The act of parliament does not require that the knowledge shall be brought home to the obligees of the bond, nor even to the commissioners, or any of them; and I do not think that that can be superadded. It is the safer and the sounder construction of the act to consider this as an absolute condition precedent.

In discussing this point it has been remarked that the fifty-second section, to which the proviso refers, does not make the proceeding by the commissioners against the collector compulsory; that it merely empowers the com-[445]-missioners to proceed. I have given the fullest consideration to the argument, but it does not appear to me to be satisfactory.

The fifty-second section empowers the commissioners to sell the collector's property.

The thirteenth section, I think, peremptorily requires, that the commissioners shall exercise that power before they resort to the surety.

It may be said that this construction of the statute may materially embarrass the commissioners in prosecuting the sureties of collectors who are defaulters. Undoubtedly it may; but I do not think that violence is to be done to the express words of an act of parliament for the purpose of relieving the commissioners from embarrassment; another act of parliament may be passed, which may be free from ambiguity. These cases of embarrassment, I fear, always arise from neglect of duty; if commissioners did their duty, collectors would not have the opportunity of committing such enormous embezzlements, and their sureties would escape the ruin with which they are sometimes overwhelmed. In the case of Peppin v. Cooper it was not necessary to decide this precise point, as the question there made was, whether the goods of another surety must or must not be first sold; but that argument necessarily brought this proviso under the consideration of the Court, and Lord Tenterden, speaking of the collector, says, "whose lands and goods must be sold before proceedings are had upon the bond against the surety."

4th. The answer to the second and third questions includes the answer to this question, that the issue ought to be found for the defendant.

[446] The view which I have taken of the case renders it almost unnecessary for me to answer the remaining questions.

5th. The answer to the fifth question is included in the answer to the fourth.

6th. In answer to the sixth question, I am of opinion that a repleader cannot be awarded by a court of error. That is laid down by Lord Hale in 2 Saunders 319 a; 170 years have elapsed since, and no instance has occurred from that time to this.

7th. In answer to the seventh question, it is only necessary to say, that I think that the judgment for the plaintiff ought to be reversed.

Lord Chancellor.—Your Lordships, having now heard the opinions of all the learned judges who were present when this case was argued, will perceive that there is a considerable difference of opinion existing among the learned judges, and that the case, therefore, is one of extreme difficulty, and requiring the serious consideration of your Lordships; and after the assistance we have received, I propose to your Lordships to adjourn the further consideration of this case.

Lord Brougham (28th July).—This was an action brought on a bond, in which the present plaintiff in error, the defendant below, was surety for a person of the name of Bigg, who was appointed collector under the 43d George 3, cap. 99, and other acts, which that act consolidated and amended, namely, collector of assessed taxes for the parish of Saint Matthew, Bethnal [447] Green. The action was brought for recovering the sum of £693, which was alleged to be due to the receiver general of the county of Middlesex, in consequence of Bigg not having paid in that sum to the account of the year 1828-29, for which it was received and collected by him, but to the account of the year immediately preceding, for which year Gwynne, the plaintiff in error and defendant below, was not surety.

Many questions arose, both in the Court below and afterwards in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, into which the writ of error passed, which were at last brought by appeal before your Lordships, upon the liability of that surety, and upon the pleadings in the cause. Upon the pleadings in the cause the question did not arise in the Court of Common Pleas, but in the first court of error into which the cause was brought, namely, the Court of Exchequer Chamber. To the action upon the bond various pleas were pleaded, and various issues raised upon the pleadings, to which it is unnecessary that I should in this case call your Lordships' attention; but much that I have now to offer will turn upon the question of pleading, and, therefore, to the state of the pleadings it will be my duty afterwards to direct the attention of your Lordships. Suffice it at present to say, that the issues being joined were tried before Mr. Baron Alderson, when questions were put to the jury, to the number of seven, to which questions they returned answers, and upon that, by consent, a general verdict was entered for the plaintiff in error, with leave to move the Court of Common Pleas, in which the action was brought, to set aside that verdict and enter a [448] verdict for the penalty of the bond; and that Court being moved, it was agreed that a special case should be taken, to be turned, if necessary, into a special verdict, with a view to carry the question elsewhere, supposing that one or other of the parties should not be satisfied with the judgment of that Court, and was first argued before that Court on a special case, which was afterwards turned into a special verdict.

The Court of Common Pleas, on the argument of that case, were pleased to pronounce judgment for the plaintiffs, the commissioners for the collection of assessed taxes in that parish, the present defendants in error, for the sum of £693, which, as I have already stated, is that respecting which the question had arisen. Upon that being turned into a special verdict, a writ of error was brought into the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and that Court, after very great difference of opinion, however, finally affirmed the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas. The writ of error, which brings it before your Lordships, was then brought by the defendant in the original proceeding, the plaintiff in error, from the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber affirming the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas; and your Lordships, on hearing this case argued, which it was at great length, and with great learning and ability, had the assistance of nine of the learned judges, including several of those judges who had attended the discussion in the Exchequer Chamber, but, I think, none of those learned judges who had pronounced the judgment originally of the Court of Common Pleas. Those very learned judges who attended the argument here differed very materially on some points, in others they concurred; [449] upon almost all, but not in all, they were of the same opinion, with the exception of some points to which I shall presently call the attention of your Lordships. The result is, that it remains for your Lordships to pronounce judgment, and I certainly feel, in the circumstances I have stated, very considerable anxiety in recommending the judgment about to be submitted to your Lordships; though I think your Lordships will perceive, when I shall have gone through the circumstances of this somewhat singular case, which it will be my duty to do, that there will be no doubt whatever what course your Lordships ought to take.

There were several points made in the Court below which have not been so far relied upon here as to require the consideration of your Lordships, and accordingly on them you put no questions to the learned judges. These related chiefly to the issues on the eighth and eleventh pleas, and the question raised on them was, whether the provisions of the act, regarding the previous examination of the collector by the commissioners, and the hastening his payment of the monies collected to the receiver general, were imperative, so as to constitute the proceedings by the commissioners conditions precedent to their proceeding against the surety, or were only directory. That they were only directory all the judges below, both in the Common Pleas and Exchequer Chamber, appear to have agreed, nor can there be any further doubt upon the point.

We therefore come to the questions which properly now remain for consideration, and the first which presents itself need not detain us long, but it must be [450] disposed of before the others, which are mainly in dispute, arise. Was the payment by the collector of £693 (the sum for which the plaintiff has recovered) to the receiver general, not to the account of the year 1828-29, for the service of which year it had come to his hands, but to the account of a former year, during which the defendant was not security, a breach of the condition in the bond? It appears to me very clear, that such payment was not well and truly paying according to the true intent and meaning of the acts. The acts intend and mean, that the money of each year should be carried to the account of that year; but he paid them in discharge of a debt due by him for a former year. The appointment of collector is annual, and I really can see no difference in the construction here and in the case of another person having been collector the former year. Had it been so, and the money been paid to the account of that person's debt, no doubt whatever could have been raised. Here it is paying another debt of the collector himself, and though the public is the creditor in both cases, yet it is the payment of another debt, as much as if it had been owing to another creditor. Accordingly we find all the learned judges are agreed in their opinions upon this point. On this point, too, the judges of the Common Pleas were unanimous.

The next question is one upon which the Court of Common Pleas gave no opinion, and on which all the other judges, with two exceptions, agreed, both those whose assistance we have had and those who dealt with it in the Exchequer Chamber:—"Was the seizure and sale of the collector's lands and goods by the com-[451]-missioners, a condition precedent to their putting the bond in suit against his surety?" The words of the act (the thirteenth section) appear to leave no reasonable doubt on this subject. After pointing out the manner of giving security, it proceeds to enact "that no such bond shall be put in suit against any surety or sureties for any deficiency, other than what shall remain unsatisfied after the sale of the lands and goods of such collector, in pursuance of the directions and powers given to the respective commissioners by this act."

Now, as this, taken by itself, could really leave no doubt that the bond was only to be sued upon for the balance left unpaid after the collector's lands and goods had been seized and sold, and as the only ground upon which a question can be raised is the reference made to the powers given by the act, which are specified in the fifty-second section, it becomes material to consider that section. It empowers and authorizes, but does not require, the imprisonment of the collector's person, and seizure of his estate, real and personal, "wheresoever the same can be discovered and found;" and then it empowers and requires the sale of the property which may have been seized, if the collector shall not have paid before the next meeting. From whence it is contended, that, as the commissioners have a discretion given them to seize, and are duly required to sell what they have seized, they are only forbidden, by the proviso in the thirteenth section, to sue the surety for more than the balance left unsatisfied by the seizure and sale, in case they shall have elected to seize and to sell under the 52d section. But the reason why the seizure is discretionary, and the sale only imperative, is, to give [452] the collector the opportunity of redeeming after the seizure. The 52d section relates to the proceedings against the collector, the 13th to those against the surety; and the proviso in the latter appears expressly framed for his benefit. Whoever gives bond for the collector must, on reading the 13th section, perceive that he only becomes bound for what remains unsatisfied after the seizure and sale of the collector's property. To hold that the discretion given by the 52d section of proceeding against the collector imports into the 13th a condition, "in case the commissioners shall choose to seize," would be altering the nature of the proviso, rendering it unavailing to the surety, and placing him in the same situation in which the collector himself is under the statute of William the 3d, and in which the surety would have been, had no proviso been introduced into this act in his favour, although it is plainly the intent of the proviso to place him in a better situation than the collector.

The argument used, that the powers given by the 52d section may be exercised in the surety's favour, after he shall have been compelled to pay the debt, and that a mandamus will lie to compel them to seize and sell, does not appear to have any good foundation. The power given by that section is to seize and sell for the collector's debt; the power given is to seize on his default, and sell for what he has left unpaid. If the payment by the surety is his payment, there is no power to seize and sell, for there is no debt; if the payment by the surety is not his payment, then there may be a debt, and there may be a power to seize; but there is more,—there is an obligation to pay over, just as if the debt subsisted; for the words require a payment, into [453] the hands of the receiver general, of such sums as have not been accounted for by the collector. So that if the commissioners are compellable to seize and sell because the surety has paid, they are compellable to pay the whole debt into the receiver general's hands, although the surety shall have paid; and then the surety must look to the receiver, without any words whatever giving him such recourse;—a construction which seems wholly untenable. It, therefore, appears sufficiently plain, that the bond cannot be put in suit against the surety, unless and until the commissioners have exercised the power given them against the principal.

Although, where a statutory enactment is clear, there is no occasion to argue from the consequences of a construction, and where it is ambiguous, such an argument is only admissible if it is connected with the general intention of the act, yet we cannot avoid perceiving here, that, unless the commissioners are obliged to seize the collector's goods before suing the surety, they may, and very likely will, proceed against a solvent surety, rather than incur the trouble of seizing and selling; so that the whole benefit plainly intended for the surety will be lost to him.

The next question has given rise to a much greater diversity of opinion; it is, whether the commissioners are bound, before proceeding against the surety, to seize all the collector's lands and goods, or only those of which they have notice; meaning by notice, as is now on all hands agreed, knowledge, however acquired.

The proviso in the 13th section is clear and express, [454] that the bond shall not be put in suit for any deficiency other than what shall remain unsatisfied after sale of the lands and goods of the collector, in pursuance of the directions and powers of the act, that is, those given by the 52d section. This sale being, by what has been already shown, a condition precedent, the 13th section must be read as if it provided that the surety shall not be sued until after the lands and goods of the principal shall have been sold, under the powers of the 52d section, which authorizes the seizure and sale of the whole estate, wherever it can be discovered and found. The two sections taken together thus make no exception, and make the sale of all the principal's estate a condition precedent to proceeding against the surety. Have we any right to engraft upon this plain and positive enactment a qualification restricting the condition to such estate only as shall have come to the knowledge of the commissioners? The only words that can be supposed to import any restriction whatever are these: "Wheresoever the same can be discovered and found." But these words only refer to the local situation of the property, and are meant to give a power over the whole, wheresoever situated. They are enabling words,—of enlargement rather than restriction; they import that whatever property can be any where found may be seized. If they are read as they must be to support the argument raised upon them, they must be thus read:—"Wheresoever the property shall be discovered or become known to them," or, rather, "if any such property shall be discovered or become known to them." But how could they seize any which had not become known to them? This is, plainly, an in-[455]-sensible construction, and the words can only refer to the situation; they mean all property, wheresoever found.

It is not to be denied that the condition of notice may sometimes be implied, where the words of an enactment do not specify it; but this cannot be in cases where the party has no exclusive means of knowledge, or no duty to inquire. The surety may know more about the affairs of the collector than the commissioners, but not necessarily so; nor is there any duty cast upon him more than upon them to become acquainted with the collector's property.

The consequences of a construction which does not hold notice to be necessary form, confessedly, the only ground for maintaining the affirmative of the proposition. It is said, and truly said, that if the commissioners cannot proceed against the surety until all the property of the collector is seized, they may not be safe in proceeding while any unknown parcel of goods exists, or in case any estate, real or personal, has, on the eve of the seizure, come to the collector by descent, devise, or bequest. But nothing can be more dangerous than to make such considerations the ground of construing an enactment, quite complete and unambiguous in itself. If we depart from the plain and obvious meaning on account of such views, we, in truth, do not construe the act, but alter it; we add words to it, or vary the words in which its provisions are couched; we supply a defect which the legislature could easily have supplied, and are really making the law, not interpreting it. This becomes peculiarly improper in dealing with a modern statute, because the extreme conciseness of the ancient statutes was the only ground [456] for the sort of legislative interpretation frequently put upon their words, and the prolixity of modern statutes is still more remarkable than the shortness of the old. The only safe rule to go by is to hold, that if the legislature had intended to obviate the consequences apprehended, it would have done so; nothing, confessedly, being more easy than to have added words for confining the condition precedent to the property of which the commissioners had notice.

In considering this point no authorities are to be found, except so far as the dicta of Lord Tenterden and Mr. Justice Holroyd, in Peppin v. Cook, certainly favour the literal construction rather than the other. But then no case has been cited, and none can be shown, where, in construing a recent statute, requiring all the things of a certain description to be dealt with by or in a particular way, the courts have held themselves called upon to add the words, "and whereof A. had notice or knowledge." Nothing could justify this but the impossibility of making sense of the provision otherwise. Now here it is not contended that the general meaning of the enactment makes the addition necessary; the statute is very sensible without it. Neither is it necessary for enabling the commissioners to act; they may ascertain the property of the collector at the time of appointing him and accepting his security. They may even inform themselves from time to time of any change in that property; but if they should be unable to do so, and inconvenience should hence arise, still this is no ground for adding to the statutory enactment, because the legislature might easily have provided against it.

But supposing we are agreed that the seizure and [457] sale is a condition precedent, and that the want of notice is immaterial; in other words, that the surety has a good defence to the action, on the ground that the plaintiffs, the commissioners, had not seized and sold the collector's property;—although it follows from hence that the judgment must be reversed, because it cannot be given for the plaintiffs, it still does not follow that it must be entered for the defendant, or that, in the state of this record, it can be so entered. We must now, therefore, examine the pleadings, with a view to finding whether there be any issue joined between the parties, upon which judgment can be given. For this purpose the fifth plea, and the issue on the replication to that and the rejoinder, need alone be considered, because, the sixth being similar to the fifth, and the seventh and twelfth referring themselves to the fifth and sixth, the whole questions on the pleadings resolve themselves into the question arising on the fifth plea, and the whole four issues, nine, twelve, thirteen, and sixteen, raise only the same question, namely, that arising out of the pleading upon the fifth plea.

The fifth plea is, that the collector, before action brought, and continually hitherto, had lands and goods within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, of which they had notice, and which might have been seized and sold under the act to satisfy the debt of the collector, but that the same have not been so sold by them;—in substance, that the collector had property of which the commissioners had notice, and that they did not seize and sell it. The replication is, that after the default the collector had, within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, no lands of which they had notice, and no goods of which they had notice, other than a certain [458] parcel known to them, and which they had seized and sold;—in substance, that the collector had no property subject to seizure and sale, of which the commissioners had notice.

The rejoinder is, that after the default the collector had lands which the commissioners might have seized and sold, and that after the default all the goods of the collector at the time of the default, and which might and ought to have been discovered and found by the commissioners within their jurisdiction, were not seized and sold by them, in pursuance of their powers under the act, in manner and form as alleged by the plaintiff, and it concludes to the country;—in substance, that the collector had lands which might have been sold, and that his goods, which might have been sold, were not sold. And this rejoinder says nothing whatever of notice; the modo et formâ clearly referring, not to the substantive matter of the plaintiff's allegation, namely, "goods of which the commissioners had notice," but only to the manner in which the plaintiffs had made the allegation.

Then the verdict is, that the collector had lands and goods after the default, and until the commencement of the suit; which lands and goods might have been seized and sold by the commissioners under the act before the commencement of the suit; but that the commissioners had no notice of the collector's lands, but had reasonable grounds for believing that he had goods; and as this does not amount to a finding that they knew of the goods, nor, indeed, even to a finding that they believed he had any, it has been treated as a finding that they had no notice of either lands or goods. I am rather disposed to regard it as negating notice of [459] the lands, and as no finding at all on notice of the goods; but this becomes immaterial, if the notice is immaterial; therefore let it be taken, as it has been taken, to be a finding that they had notice neither of lands nor goods.

We are now to consider what the issue is upon which this verdict is found, and whether there really is any issue at all. The plea affirmed the existence, not of lands and goods absolutely, but of lands and goods of which the commissioners had notice, and which they might have seized and sold. The replication asserts that there were no seizable and saleable lands and goods of which the commissioners had notice. The rejoinder, without mentioning notice at all, asserts that there were seizable and saleable lands, and that goods, seizable and saleable, were not seized and sold; which, though very inartificially expressed, may be taken, after verdict, to assert what it does not, except inferentially, that the collector had goods, as well as land, seizable and saleable. Now, it is plain that here the parties make their averment of and concerning different things, and not of the same thing; the one pleads respecting property in one predicament, the other respecting, not the same, but property in another predicament. The allegations of the two parties, far from being diametrically opposed to one another, as they must be to raise an issue, are not at all inconsistent with each other. If I say, that all the freehold lands of J. S. in the manor of A.

have been sold, and my adversary only says that all the lands of J. S. in the manor of A. have not been sold, he does not negative my assertion. My proposition contained a negative pregnant; indeed the replication would, on the ground, have been demurrable [460] specially. I might have explained or particularized the proposition thus, "all the freeholds have been sold, but all the copyholds remain unsold;" and my adversary might have explained or particularized his proposition in the very same words, so that, instead of one having asserted an affirmative and the other a negative respecting the same matter, which is the character of every issue, both of us would only have been asserting propositions which, far from being opposite, are quite consistent, and might have been identical.

The more this pleading is examined the more plainly it will appear that it raises no issue at all; neither an informal one, which would be cured by the statute after verdict, nor an immaterial one, which could not be so cured;—but no issue whatever; consequently the verdict is a nullity, according to the authorities, Sandbach v. Turvey, Croke, James, and other cases lay this clearly down; and although cases are cited which seem to throw some doubt on the position, it is to be observed that those are rather cases where there was an issue raised, though an informal issue. One of them, too, Parker v. Taylor, in Croke, Charles, is said in another case, Walsingham v. Coombe, in Siderfin, 289, to have been denied, and another of them, Waltham v. Aldrick, in Croke, James, was decided the very term after Sandbach v. Turvey, viz., Michaelmas, 17 James 1, and without any reference to the former case, which plainly shows that the two decisions were not regarded as inconsistent. Nothing, indeed, could be more contrary to all principle, nay, to common sense, than to regard a finding upon an issue which had no existence as other than a nullity; the jury must be taken [461] to have found a verdict upon a matter not before them, as much as if they had given a verdict in another cause.

The learned judges have all agreed that the verdict on the fifth plea must be entered for the defendant, but none of them hold that the judgment can be entered for the defendant. Upon different reasons they all arrive at this conclusion, as well those who hold the seizure and sale of all property a condition precedent, as those who hold only a seizure and sale of the property known to the commissioners a condition precedent; and much more the learned judge who alone considers the seizure and sale no condition precedent at all, whether with or without notice. I ought to state, that one of the learned judges only whose assistance your Lordships had, Mr. Baron Parke, took that view of the case, that a seizure and sale was not a condition precedent, with or without notice. He was the only learned judge here who held that proposition; but one learned judge in the Court of Exchequer concurred with him in that opinion, namely, my Lord Abinger. All the other judges, in the Court of Exchequer Chamber as well as here, took a different view. The whole of the learned judges, therefore, whose opinions have been given in answer to the questions put, are agreed, that there can, in no view, be judgment for the defendant upon the issues which these pleadings raise, but that, if judgment be not entered for the plaintiffs, there must be a simple reversal, and they must begin again, should they be so advised. A repleader would have been awarded in the Common Pleas, had the points on the pleadings been made there; but it is agreed, on all hands, that a court of error cannot award a repleader.

[462] The only grounds upon which judgment could be given for the plaintiff are two: either that it may be given non obstante verdicto, on an implied confession in the rejoinder, or that, upon matter disclosed in the other parts of the record, it may be given, disregarding the immaterial issue. But all the learned judges hold that judgment non obstante verdicto cannot be given on an implied confession in the rejoinder that, if there were lands and goods, the commissioners had no notice of them; and surely the mere dropping all mention of notice,—the merely not re-asserting in the rejoinder the notice which he had asserted in his plea, cannot be taken as a confession of want of notice, entitling the plaintiff to judgment. The case on this point stands thus: the plea is good, even if notice be supposed necessary; the replication meets the plea on this ground, and, therefore, answers it sufficiently; the rejoinder, dropping all mention of notice, is bad, on the supposition that notice is necessary, and is demurrable, but they have not demurred. But then it contains no confession; the mere leaving out notice—the not averring notice does not confess it. The averment in the replication was not substantive, that the commissioners had notice; but the notice was part of one entire allegation, and the omitting a part, which was essential to its materiality, and so leaving what was least immaterial, cannot be taken as a confession of the thing omitted; therefore, even supposing notice material and necessary, the plaintiffs could not have judgment on this ground.

Even supposing notice necessary, the plaintiffs cannot have judgment on the whole record, if, as all but one of the learned judges held, the seizure and sale be a [463] condition precedent. All are agreed, with the exception of another learned judge, who, agreeing that the seizure and sale form a condition precedent, yet holds that enough appears on the whole record to entitle the plaintiff to judgment. For this opinion there is, confessedly, no direct authority; but what the Court of Common Pleas said in Goodburne v. Bowman is relied on to show that, though it is admitted you cannot have recourse to one plea not expressly referred to, in considering the sufficiency or insufficiency of any other plea, yet that all the pleas may be taken into consideration in entering judgment on the whole record. But it does not appear to have been necessary to that case that this should be held; it was, therefore, extra-judicial in that case; and even if it had not been so, there is this difference between the two cases, that there the pleas were held bad out of which the immaterial issues arose, while here a good plea remains in bar of the action, after passing over the immaterial issue, or treating it as a nullity. The judgment of reversal, which may now be given, will, therefore, substantially agree with all the opinions but one of the learned judges, upon the assumption, in which all but another of the learned judges are agreed, that seizure and sale are a condition precedent.

The consequence will be, that the plaintiffs may begin again de novo; but if I am right in agreeing with those of the learned judges who hold want of notice to be immaterial, the most carefully conducted pleadings in another suit never can avail the plaintiffs, or entitle them ultimately to a judgment.

Of the questions to which I have directed the attention of your Lordships, it is to be observed, that, though the [464] three first, those upon the merits of the defence, were decided in the Court of Common Pleas, those arising upon the pleadings do not appear to have been there made, and accordingly we have no judgment upon them except that in the Exchequer Chamber, where one only of the three learned judges who have not attended your Lordships has given any opinion on those points. Even of the questions upon the merits, the first appears to have been argued more fully than the other two; a great part of the judgment is upon the points which have never been made, or at least at all relied on here, and a very small portion of it relates to that which has been the subject of discussion before your Lordships.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, notwithstanding the complexity of this case, and the difference of opinion amongst the judges upon some points, it does not appear to me that there is much difficulty in deciding upon the course this House ought to adopt, because there are points upon which there is a uniformity of opinion amongst the judges, in which it is, I think, impossible not to concur, as to such part of the case as must regulate that course, if your Lordships agree in opinion with the learned judges upon those points. That the condition of the bond was broken, there is, I conceive, no doubt; in this all the judges concur, and all but one concur in thinking that the appropriation of the property of the collector towards payment of the debt due from him was a condition precedent to calling upon the surety. Whether it was to exhaust the whole of his property, or such part only as came to the knowledge of the commissioners, was the subject of much difference of opinion amongst the judges; but, as the defendant [465] by his fifth plea set up the defence that the property of the collector, of which the commissioners had notice, had not been applied, and as the decision must turn upon the course adopted by the parties upon that plea, it does not appear to me to be very material to consider how far the defendant might have defended himself by pleading and proving that the collector had property unapplied, of which the commissioners had notice.

According to the opinion of all the judges but one, the fifth plea, if established by a verdict, would have amounted to a good defence to the action. Objections were made to the manner in which the plaintiffs' replication to this fifth plea was framed, but in substance the replication tendered an issue upon the defence set up in the plea, alleging that the collector had property of which the commissioners had notice. The defendant, however, instead of joining issue upon the point so raised by his rejoinder, departed from it altogether. The plaintiffs, instead of taking the proper course to correct this irregular pleading, took issue upon it, and the question is, what, under such circumstances, ought to be the fate of the action? The issue so raised, being, if to be considered as an issue at all, immaterial, cannot, though found for the defendant, be the ground of a judgment for him in the action, and the state of the pleading precludes the plaintiff having a judgment non obstante veredicto, for, so far from there being any admission upon the record of his title, there is the fifth plea, which, if true, would constitute a good defence to it. This unfortunate state of the pleadings could not have arisen without blunders on both sides. That there can be no replender in this House appears clear, from the opinion of all the judges, and the authorities to [466] which they refer; and as there can be neither judgment for the plaintiff nor for the defendant, the only course is to reverse, simpliciter, the judgment of the Court below.

Lord Brougham.—The defendant cannot get his costs, though he succeeds; but upon the whole, every thing connected with the rejoinder being considered, I cannot say that that, in my opinion, is to be regretted.

Judgment reversed.

[467] ON A WRIT OF ERROR FROM THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER CHAMBER
IN IRELAND.

JOHN GALWEY, Plaintiff in Error; GODFREY THOMAS BAKER, Defendant in Error [15th March 1838 and 28th July 1840].

[Mews' Dig. viii. 1240. S.C. 7 Cl. and F. 379. Discussed in Pentland v. Somerville, 1851, 2 Ir. Ch. R. 295; and see Mount-Cashel v. O'Neill, 1856, 5 H.L.C. 937; Furlong L. and T., 2nd ed. pp. 682, 688; Land Act, 1860, s. 31.]

Under a demise "reserving all wood and underwood, timber and timber-trees, standing, growing, or being on the demised premises, or at any time thereafter to stand or grow thereon, with full and free liberty of ingress and egress to take and carry away the same."—Held, that this clause secured to the owner of the inheritance the benefit of such trees as were upon the premises at the time of the demise, but did not transfer to him the property in trees planted under the provisions of the statutes in force in Ireland * respecting the planting of trees, the property therein being vested in the lessee.

* By 5th and 6th Geo. 3 chap. 17. sect. 2. it is enacted, that if any tenant for life or lives by settlement, dower, courtesy, jointure, lease, or any office, civil, military, or ecclesiastical, impeachable of waste, or any tenant for years exceeding twelve years unexpired, shall plant sally, ozier, or willows, the sole property of such shall, during the continuance of the term, vest in the tenant, and he may cut and fell the same under the restrictions herein-after mentioned; and if such tenant shall plant any timber-trees of oak, ash, elm, fir, pine, walnut, chestnut, horse chestnut, quicken or wild ash, alder, poplar, or other timber-trees, such tenant, during the term, shall be entitled to a housebote, ploughbote, cartbote, and carbote of such trees by him planted, and at the expiration of the term, or where such trees shall have attained maturity, which shall first happen, shall be entitled to the said trees. or the value of them, according to the directions herein-after mentioned; any covenant heretofore made, law, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

By 23d and 24th Geo. 3. chap. 39, sect. 6 it is enacted, that any tenant may sell his or her right, title, and property in said trees or coppices, or any part of the same, to any person under whom he or she may derive mediately or immediately, and that the person so purchasing shall have all the rights, titles, and properties and privileges therein which are or by this act shall be secured to the said tenant: provided always, that no sale or transfer of the same shall be deemed good in law, unless and until the [468] John and Edward Galwey, being seised in fee of lands at Lota, and the dwelling house thereon, by indentures of lease and release, dated the 28th and 29th days of October 1789, demised the same unto Sir Richard Kellest and his heirs for the term of three lives, with covenants for perpetual renewal.

The said indenture of release contained a clause in the words following; viz. "Saving and always reserving out of the said demise unto the said John Galwey and Edward Galwey, and to the person or persons who should from time to time be entitled to the reversion in said lands, all mines, minerals, and royalties happening or being thereon, and also all wood and underwood, timber and timber trees, standing, growing, or being thereon, or at any time thereafter to stand or grow thereon, with full and free liberty [469] of ingress and egress to take and carry away the same."

John and Edward Galwey having both died, the reversion in fee of the premises, subject to the demise for lives, became vested in the plaintiff, John Galwey.

The interest of Sir Richard Kellest in part of the demised premises subsequently became vested in William Massey Baker, who planted timber trees thereon, and duly registered the same pursuant to the provisions of the Irish statute of 23d and 24th Geo. 3. chap. 39, and shortly after died; whereupon Godfrey Thomas Baker, the defendant, became seised of part of the premises vested in William Massey Baker, deceased, and of all the estate and interest of Sir Richard Kellest therein.

The defendant Thomas Godfrey Baker having cut down and sold some of the timber trees planted and registered by William Massey Baker, the plaintiff John Galwey, in Hilary term 1835, brought an action of trover against the defendant, in the Court of King's Bench in Ireland, to recover the trees; and the defendant having pleaded the general issue, the action came on to be tried in March 1835, at the assizes for the county of the city of Cork, before Richard Wilson Greene, king's serjeant; when the several facts before mentioned having been proved, the jury, under the direction of the judge, found a verdict for the plaintiff. A bill of exceptions was tendered to the opinion of the judge by the defendant, and upon argument the Court of King's Bench gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff brought a writ of error to the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ireland upon such judgment, but upon argument the judgment of the Court of King's Bench was affirmed.

[470] From the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber this appeal is brought.

The Attorney General and Sir William Follett for the plaintiff in error.

Sir Frederick Pollock and Mr. Thesiger for the defendant in error.

Lord Chancellor.—In this case many cases were referred to in the argument at the bar as to what would have been the effect of the terms of reservation in the lease if the timber acts had never been passed. In the view I take of this case it is not necessary to consider that point. These acts altered the common law as to the title of the lessor and lessee in timber planted by the lessee.

By the 5th and 6th of George the 3d, chap. 17. tenants for lives renewable for ever are made dispunishable for waste in timber trees and wood which they shall hereafter plant. By section 2. any tenant for life who shall plant timber trees shall, at the expiration of the term, or when such trees shall have attained maturity, be entitled to the trees.

same shall be done in writing, and signed by the said tenant, and an attested copy of said writing or instrument lodged with the clerk of the peace, in open court, at some quarter sessions of the peace for the county or county of a city, having been first proved to be a true copy by some credible witness, upon oath, before the justices at said sessions; and an attested copy of the copy of such writing or instrument, signed by the acting clerk of the peace, shall be deemed in all courts to be evidence of the due registry of such writing or instrument; and if the head or principal landlord shall so purchase the said trees or coppices from an under-tenant having a right to sell the same, then from and after the registry of the sale as aforesaid the said trees shall belong to said landlord, notwithstanding any intermediate term that may exist between the term of the said under-tenant and the estate of the said landlord.

By the 23d and 24th George the 3d, chap. 39. passed in 1783, any tenant for life who shall plant timber trees shall be entitled to cut, fell, and dispose of the same at any time during the term, provided the tenant causes such trees to be registered in the form prescribed. By the 6th section the act permits the tenant to sell his right, title, and property in such trees to the person under whom he holds, but no sale or mortgage of the same shall be deemed good in law unless and until the [471] same shall be done in writing and signed by the tenant, and a copy registered with the registry of the trees; and if the head landlord shall so purchase such trees from the tenant, then from and after the registry of the sale the trees shall belong to the said landlord, notwithstanding any intermediate term. By the 16th section it is provided, that nothing therein shall be construed to extend or to relate to any trees planted or to be planted in pursuance of any covenant contained in any lease, nor to invalidate any such covenant.

Such being the state of the law, the lease in question was granted, in 1789, for three lives, with a covenant for perpetual renewal, with this clause: "saving and always reserving out of the said demise, unto the lessor and the owner for the time being of the reversion, all mines, minerals, and royalties happening or being thereon, and also all wood and underwood, timber and timber trees standing, growing, or being thereon, or at any time thereafter to stand or grow thereon, with full and free liberty of ingress and egress to take and carry away the same."

It was argued, that, under these statutes, any contract between the lessor and lessee by which the lessee's title to the trees he might afterwards plant should become the property of the landlord would be illegal, as contrary to the policy of the statutes, and therefore void. It is, I think, unnecessary to express any opinion upon this point, but it may be observed that the 6th section of the 23d and 24th of George the 3d carefully guards the tenant in any sale of the trees planted by him to his landlord, and that the 16th section guards against the act operating in cases of trees planted in pursuance of any covenant. Any construction, therefore, which may [472] have the effect of depriving the tenant, and through him the public, of the benefit of the act, would be contrary to the intention and policy of the acts, and ought not to be adopted, without necessity. These two sections, and, indeed, all the provisions of the act, establish this, that trees planted by the tenant under the provisions of the act are the absolute property of the lessee. In this case the trees in question were planted by the lessee, and duly registered in pursuance of the direction of the act, and were cut by the defendant, who holds his interest in the lease. These trees, therefore, are the property of the defendant (the lessee) under the provisions of the act, and the lessor never had any estate or interest in them; unless he can maintain his claim under the clause in the lease, and to do so he must show that the clause is effectual to give to him (the lessor) a title to property which was not and never would, by operation of law, be his. It must, therefore, amount to a transfer to him of property which the tenant might hereafter create and become entitled to; and in considering the terms of the clause, it may be inferred that there must have been some timber trees upon the estate, and that trees, not then existing as such, might grow up on the property, other than such as might be planted by the lessee; all which, as part of the inheritance, would belong to the lessor, subject to the tenant's right to the use and enjoyment of them, and which, without the consent of the lessee, or some express provision for that purpose, the lessor could not cut, or enter upon the estate for the purpose of taking away.

It may also be assumed, that the terms used ought not to be construed so as to transfer the property of the lessee to the lessor, if any reasonable construction can [473] be given to the terms, with reference to any other subject matter upon which they can operate. The clause is a reservation out of the demise,—not a reservation of some new right or interest, but an exception from the demise, and the matters so reserved or excepted are mines, minerals, royalties, woods, and trees then growing thereon; all, therefore, at the time part of the lessee's property. The object of the clause so far was to accept out of the demise, and reserve to the lessor, certain parts of the property of the lessee, and to do so effectually it was necessary also to except trees which might thereafter grow upon the estate, under circumstances which would give him the property in them. To effect this the words "or at any time thereafter to stand or grow thereon" were necessary. Being necessary for that purpose, which is the general purpose of the rest of the clause, are they to be construed to have the effect, not of excepting or reserving to the lessor that to which he would otherwise have a qualified title, but of assigning and transferring to him that which would be the property of the lessee?

It is also to be observed, that the right is reserved to the lessor of entering upon the land demised, and to take and carry away such trees. If, therefore, the parties intended that this clause should apply to trees to be planted by the tenant under the provisions of the statute, it would have the effect of depriving the tenant of the benefit intended to be secured to him by the statutes, without providing any transfer to the lessor; for it could not have been supposed that the lessee would plant, if the lessor were to be at liberty to enter upon the land demised and cut and carry away the trees so planted; and as the act 5th and 6th George the 3d [474] recites, it is equal to inheritance, whether tenants do not plant, or have a property in what they plant.

It appears to me, therefore, that the true construction of this clause is, that it was intended to exclude the tenant's right and interest in such trees as formed part of the inheritance, and thereby to secure to the owner of the inheritance the full benefit of such trees, and not to transfer to him the property in trees which, being planted under the provisions of the statutes, formed no part of the inheritance which belonged to the lessee. I make no observation upon the point raised at the bar as to the regularity of the proceedings in Ireland, the parties having agreed to waive that question, and to ask the judgment of this House upon the merits. It appears to me, therefore, that the judgment must be given for the defendant in error, and with costs.

Lord Brougham.—I certainly agree with my noble and learned friend in the observations he has addressed to your Lordships in this case. It does not appear to me to be necessary to determine either of the two questions which have been made in this case; first, whether or not after-planted trees can be made the subject of reservation in a demise, this really seems no question at all; secondly, whether or not, the sixteenth section of the 23d and 24th George the 3d having specially excepted from the operation of the act trees planted in pursuance of covenants in a lease, and having also declared these covenants themselves to be valid, notwithstanding the provisions of the act, all clauses expressly reserving the after-planted timber to the reversioner are insufficient for that purpose, as being rendered void by the act? These questions can only [475] arise upon the supposition that the clause in question does contain such a reservation of after-planted trees. The provisions of the act to encourage the planting of timber by tenants, and the sixteenth section of the latter act, show that the reservation must be plain and distinct.

Admitting for the present that after-planted trees may well be reserved, or rather admitting that parties may contract so as to give the reversioner the property in trees planted by the tenant, even in cases where, as here, the lease has a clause of perpetual renewal, still both the policy of the statutes and the relation between the parties in respect of the property show that they must have used clear and unequivocal words to express their intention; and that where these words are easily capable of another sense—a sense consistent with the statutory provisions, and consistent with the probability of the case as arising out of their several interests and the property demised, we should, as the Court below appears to have done, prefer reading the covenant in that sense.

The words on which the plaintiff in error relies are these, “at any time thereafter to stand or grow thereon,” that is, on the premises demised. The question is, whether or not these words must needs mean trees after planted. But, plainly, they do not necessarily extend to such trees, for they may only be intended to reserve trees afterwards growing upon stools of trees already planted, nor is it at all probable that parties would bind themselves in the way supposed by the plaintiff's construction. Why should a person stipulate for property in trees which the stipulation renders it in the highest degree unlikely should ever come in esse, by [476] making it in the highest degree unlikely that the other party should ever plant them? And, taking the words of the demise no more strongly against the lessor than the lessee, why should a person bind himself not to plant for profit, or, which comes to the same thing, only to plant for the profit of another?

The clause reserving liberty of ingress and egress to take and carry away the same, plainly proves nothing; for, first, this may apply to the mines and minerals which are reserved, and, next, it was necessary, on account of the timber growing at the time of the demise. As, therefore, I can see nothing in the clause which makes the construction put upon it by the plaintiff unavoidable, but, on the contrary, incline to think the opposite construction the more reasonable, I can have no doubt that the covenant is insufficient to take the case out of the statutory provisions, and, therefore, that the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed.

Judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ireland, affirming a judgment in the Court of King's Bench in Ireland for the defendant in error, affirmed, with costs.

[477] FROM THE COURT OF CHANCERY, IRELAND.

PETER DIGGES LA TOUCHE,—Appellant; The Right Honourable GEORGE CHARLES Earl of LUCAN,—Respondent [4th and 6th August 1840].

[Mews' Dig. ii. 1381, 1382; xiv. 344. S.C. 7 Cl. and F., 772; 2 Dr. and Wal., 271, 432.]

Sir Neal O'Donell being tenant for life of a freehold estate, and of an estate renewable for lives, subject to a head rent (which was in arrear), and having filed a bill to prevent the execution of a judgment in ejectment, brought by the head landlord, for nonpayment of rent, by deeds of 9th and 10th October 1798 conveys his life estate therein to a trustee, upon trust to raise £10,000 by mortgage, for payment of the arrears of rent and other incumbrances, and out of the rents, after payment of other charges, to make provision for himself and the other members of his family. On the 9th March in the same year Lord Lucan transfers certain stock to the credit of the suit, for the purpose of redeeming the estate from the arrears of rent. In the month of June 1826 the trustee under the trust deed, knowing of the advance made by Lord Lucan, writes a letter to Lord Lucan's solicitor, (antedated in February,) stating, that if any party would advance money for the arrears of rent and costs, he would consider such advance as raised by him under the power contained in the trust deeds, and would exercise the power in the best manner he could for securing the advance. [478] During the pendency of negotiations between the trustee and Lord Lucan, for mortgaging the estate for securing the advance under the power contained in the trust deeds, Sir Neal O'Donell dies. Held, that a bill filed by Lord Lucan against the trustee for carrying into execution the trusts of the deeds, and for charging the estates, under the provisions of the deeds, with the payment of his advances, could not be sustained, inasmuch as Lord Lucan, not being a party to the deeds, could not enforce their execution. Held, likewise, that the letter could not make Lord Lucan a cestuique trust under the deeds, as it purported only to give him a mortgage of the estates for the life of the tenant for life, whose death prevented the mortgage being effected.

Decree below reversed.

Sir Neal O'Donell, under deeds of the 9th and 10th October 1798, was tenant for life of a certain estate, known by the name of the Newport estate, in the county of Mayo, for a term of three lives renewable for ever, at the yearly rent of £980, and of certain freehold estates situate in the counties of Mayo and Galway, called the Cong and Newport estates.

In Easter term 1825 the head rent being very much in arrear, and the Marquis of Sligo being then entitled to the rent and reversion of the Newport estate, he brought an ejectment for nonpayment of the rent, and judgment was, with the consent of Sir Neal O'Donell, entered up in the ejectment suit.

On the 10th day of November in the same year Sir Neal O'Donell exhibited his bill of complaint in the Court of Chancery of Ireland against the Marquis of Sligo and others, praying that he might be at liberty to redeem the premises upon payment of the rent then due to Lord Sligo.

[479] Sir Neal O'Donell being indebted to Lord Sligo in the arrear of rent, and also to several other persons in large sums of money for interest then due on the incumbrances created by the deed of the 10th of October 1798, and being largely indebted on his own account, in the month of October 1825 gave his solicitor, William Furlong, instructions to prepare a deed, vesting his life interest in the estates in trust for the purpose of raising a sum of money sufficient to discharge the arrear of rent and the other demands to which he was liable, and also to charge the estates with certain annuities for the necessary maintenance and support of himself and family.

In the month of December 1825, or in the beginning of January 1826, while the trust deed was being prepared, several overtures were made to Sir Neal O'Donell on the part of the respondent, then Lord Bingham, who had declared himself a candidate for the representation in parliament of the county of Mayo, at the election which was then about to take place, for his support and influence. At that time Lord Bingham had proposed, on the part of his father, to advance money for the payment of the arrears of rent, and it was proposed by the solicitor of Lord Lucan that Lord Bingham should be appointed joint trustee with the appellant in the trust deed, but in consequence of the opinion of counsel that Lord Bingham should not be a trustee, it was settled that the appellant should be appointed sole trustee under the trust deed; and, accordingly, by indentures of lease and release, dated the 12th and 13th of February 1826, the release being made between the said Sir Neal O'Donell, of the one part, and appellant, of the other part, Sir Neal O'Donell conveyed the Newport estate, then held under [480] the Marquis of Sligo subject to the rent of £980, and the Cong and Newport estates, to the appellant, his heirs and assigns, for the life of Sir Neal O'Donell, upon trust, after payment of the expenses incurred in the performance of the trusts, to raise £10,000 by mortgage of the estates, in order to pay what was due for the arrears of rent, and to pay other incumbrances therein mentioned; and upon trust, out of the rents and profits of the estates, after paying the interest of certain incumbrances, to make some annual payments to Sir Neal O'Donell and the other members of his family.

Prior to the execution of the trust deed, Sir Neal O'Donell furnished Lord Bingham's solicitor with a copy of the draft of the trust deed.

In the latter end of the month of February or beginning of March 1826, Sir Neal O'Donell was offered the loan of £6000 by a Mr. Malachy Ryan, for the purpose of discharging the arrear of rent due to Lord Sligo; but his offer was declined by Sir Neal O'Donell, on an assurance, on the part of Lord Bingham, that he would procure the necessary funds for the payment of the arrear of rent.

On the 9th of March 1826, pursuant to an order for that purpose made in the redemption suit, a sum of £4002 1s. 3d. old government 3½ per cent. stock, being the property of Richard Earl of Lucan, the father of respondent, was transferred to the credit of the cause for the redemption of Sir Neal O'Donell's interest in the Newport estate.

On the 13th June 1826, (shortly previous to the election of Mayo, which took place in that month,) the following letter was signed by the appellant, and sent to the solicitor of Lord Lucan:—

“23d February 1826.

“Dear Sir,—Sir Neal O'Donell has now executed the deed vesting all his life estate in me, in trust to raise money, in the first place, to pay the rent and costs of the ejectment pending, and, next, to pay the interest of the incumbrances. If you will prevail on any client of yours to advance three or four thousand pounds in time to pay the rent and costs, or even on account of it, I will consider such advance as raised by me under the power given me, and will, whenever you please, exercise that power, by securing such advance in the best manner I am empowered by the deed; it being distinctly understood that in doing so I am not to be in any way personally answerable for either the principal or interest, further than as trustee for the due application of the rents pursuant to the trust deed.—I am, dear sir, yours, very truly,

“PETER DIGGES LA TOUCHE.”

“To Richard Livesay, esq. Mountjoy Square.”

This letter had been prepared and drawn out by Sir Neal O'Donell's and Lord Lucan's solicitors, and had been agreed between them should be antedated.

In the interval which elapsed between the 13th June 1826 and the 1st March 1827, when Sir Neal O'Donell died, several negotiations were carried on between William Furlong, the appellant's solicitor, and Richard Livesay, the solicitor of Lord Lucan, for the purpose of devising some mode of giving Lord Lucan the benefit of the trusts of the deed of the 13th of February 1826, for securing the advances he had made for the payment [482] of the arrears of rent. On such occasion William Furlong explained the nature of the deed, and particularly with reference to the provision thereby made for Sir Neal O'Donell and his family, whereupon Richard Livesay, and respondent, who was present, declared, on the part of Lord Lucan, that they had no idea of interfering with that provision; but that they conceived the income of the estates would, after payment of the interest of prior incumbrances, and the several annuities to Sir Neal O'Donell and his family, be sufficient to allow of instalments of £1000 per annum to be applied in liquidation of the advance made by Lord Lucan; but William Furlong objected to so large an instalment, and it was agreed that said Richard Livesay should get such deed prepared as he conceived the persons entitled to; and, accordingly, in July or August 1826, a draft deed of mortgage of the trust estates for the life of Sir Neal O'Donell was furnished by Richard Livesay to William Furlong, which purported to grant the lands in mortgage to Richard Earl of Lucan for the life of Sir Neal O'Donell, and to declare that appellant should, on or before a certain day to be therein named, cause to be effected a policy of insurance on the life of Sir Neal O'Donell in the amount of said loan, and assign the same to Richard Earl of Lucan, the premium on said insurance to be paid by appellant; and further, that appellant should pay to Lord Lucan the said loan by half-yearly instalments, the first instalment to be paid on the first of November following. The draft deed was afterwards returned by William Furlong to Richard Livesay, and, in consequence of objections made by William Furlong, no deed was executed pursuant to the draft.

[483] In the month of January 1827 a further draft of mortgage was furnished by Livesay to William Furlong, and discussions took place relating to this draft till the time of Sir Neal O'Donell's death. In consequence of his death, and the disagreement of the parties as to the form of the deed, no mortgage deed was ever executed. During the progress of the negotiations, the persons acting on behalf of Lord Lucan were fully aware of the manner in which appellant applied the rents of the trust estates, and no demand was at any time made on the part of Lord Lucan, that appellant should apply any part of the rents in payment of the principal or interest of the said advance.

Several attempts were made to effect an insurance on the life of Sir Neal O'Donell, but without effect, in consequence of his advanced age and state of health.

On the 21st of March 1827 Richard Lord Lucan, since deceased, filed his bill in the Court of Chancery of Ireland against the appellant and other persons interested in the estates, and thereby stated the proceedings by ejectment taken by Lord Sligo for the recovery of the rent due out of the Newport estate, and the proceedings in the Court of Chancery on the part of Sir Neal O'Donell to redeem said estate; and that negotiations were set on foot between Sir Neal O'Donell and appellant, and their agents, to induce Lord Lucan to advance a sum of money for the redemption of the lands under ejectment; and for that purpose it was proposed that the life estate of Sir Neal O'Donell in all his estates, including the estate under ejectment, should be vested in respondent as sole trustee, or jointly with appellant, for the purpose of securing such advance: that appellant objected to respondent being a party to [484] the deed, and prevailed on Sir Neal O'Donell to execute a deed to appellant as sole trustee, not only for the purpose of securing said advances, but for other purposes in no wise connected therewith, and that accordingly the deed of the 13th of February 1826 was executed by and between Sir Neal O'Donell and appellant. The bill further stated the letter of the 23d of February 1826 from the appellant to the agent and solicitor of Lord Lucan. The bill further alleged, that plaintiff being informed by his agent and solicitor, that any sum to be advanced by him on the faith of the letter would be the first charge on the life estates of Sir Neal O'Donell under the trust deed, and would be paid in preference and priority to any other charges created by said deed, plaintiff, on the faith of said letter, and of the representations so made by appellant as to the security of such advance, and for the purpose of redeeming said estates from eviction, on the 13th of March 1826 caused a sum of £4002 1s. 3d. government three and a half per cent. stock, belonging to plaintiff, to be transferred to the credit of the redemption suit in the name of Sir Neal O'Donnell, and that by reason of such transfer said estates were saved from eviction. The bill further alleged, that at the time said transfer was made, and for a long time subsequent thereto, neither plaintiff nor any person on his behalf had seen the deed of trust or any copy thereof, or was acquainted with the provisions thereof, save from the representations so made by appellant, by his said letter of the 23d February 1826, and other the representations of the appellant to the like effect, and of the persons acting for the appellant; and it having been represented to plaintiff's solicitor by the appellant and his solicitor, that the time [485] for the redemption of said lands was too short to enable him to prepare any formal deed or instrument to be executed by appellant to secure the repayment of said advance before same should be actually made, and appellant having engaged to execute all necessary instruments, plaintiff remained perfectly satisfied. The bill further alleged, that after the stock was transferred, the solicitor of plaintiff applied to appellant for a copy of the trust deed, which after some delay was furnished; whereupon negotiations were set on foot to prepare a deed or instrument to give plaintiff the first charge on the rents and profits of the trust estates; and that plaintiff, in compliance with the request of appellant, and as a personal accommodation to him, was willing to forego his strict rights under said deed of trust and said letter, and to give time for the payment of said money; but after sundry drafts of deeds had been prepared, and many fruitless attempts to procure the appellant to execute a deed, appellant refused to execute any deed whatever. The bill further alleged, that the appellant had received a large sum of money, as well for arrears as for the accruing rents of the estates, which ought to have been applied in discharge of the advance made by plaintiff, in priority to all other demands, but which had not been so applied.

And the bill prayed that the trusts of said indenture of the 13th of February 1826 might be decreed to be carried into execution, and that an account might be taken of the sums received, or which, without wilful default, might have been received by the appellant, of the rents, issues, and profits of said trust estates since the execution of the said deed of trust of the 13th day of February 1826, and how the same had been applied [486] and disposed of; and that an account might be taken of the sum advanced by said Richard Earl of Lucan for the redemption of the said lands under ejectment; and that the same, together with legal interest thereon from the time when the same was so advanced, might be decreed to be well charged on the said trust estates so conveyed to the appellant for the life of Sir Neal O'Donnell the younger, in priority to all other charges created by the said trust deed, save the costs and expenses incident to the preparation of the said deed, and the execution of the trusts thereof; and that an account might also be taken of the sums due and owing to all other persons interested under the trusts of said deed; and that Richard Earl of Lucan and such other persons might be paid the amount of their respective demands, according to the order of priority provided by the said deed.

The appellant, by his answer, denied that he was privy to any negotiations for the purpose of inducing the late Lord Lucan to advance said redemption money, and that he was utterly ignorant of any dealings and transactions between plaintiff and Sir Neal O'Donnell, and those acting for them respectively, nor was he apprized of any negotiations or propositions for the loan of said money by the plaintiff until after the transfer of said stock had been made; and said that neither the appellant nor, as he believed, any person on his behalf, ever entered into a contract with the plaintiff, or any person on his behalf, for the loan of the money, or for the transfer of the stock; nor was said stock transferred to the credit of the redemption suit with the knowledge or concurrence of the appellant, nor was there any previous communication or treaty with the appellant on [487] the subject; and the appellant further stated, that he never heard and was not aware that the stock so transferred belonged to Richard Earl of Lucan, or to respondent, until long after the transfer had been effected. The appellant further stated, that the election for the county of Mayo took place in the month of June 1826; and that the appellant was informed, and believed, that Richard Livesay, the father and partner of Edward Livesay, a short time previous to said election informed appellant's solicitor that the stock which had been transferred was the property of the plaintiff, and that it was apprehended an attempt would be made at the approaching election to charge the respondent with bribery; and that Richard Livesay proposed to the appellant's solicitor that some letter should be written by the appellant to Richard Livesay, acknowledging that the advance of said stock was made to appellant, as a trustee, to protect the trust property from eviction for nonpayment of rent; and the appellant admitted he signed the letter bearing date the 23d day of February 1826, and that said letter was handed to him by Richard Livesay on the 13th of June 1826, and that the appellant, being at the time occupied with other business, subscribed his name thereto, and handed it back to Richard Livesay; and that the appellant did not at the time take notice, nor was he aware, nor did Livesay intimate to him, that said letter was antedated; and appellant stated expressly in his answer, that had he been aware of such fact he would not have signed said letter without correcting the date; and appellant stated that the advance was not and could not in any manner have been influenced by the letter, inasmuch as the letter was not written or agreed to be written until the 13th day of June 1826, [488] long after the advance had been made. The appellant admitted that negotiations were carried on after the transfer of said stock between plaintiff's and appellant's respective solicitors, for the purpose of arranging the form of a deed, but denied it was for the purpose of giving to the plaintiff the first charge on the rents of the trust estates, but for the purpose of securing the repayment of said advance in such manner as should be reasonable with regard to the execution of the trust reposed in him; and the appellant denied that he ever refused to execute a deed to secure the repayment of the advance, provided it was consistent with the trusts of the deed of the 13th of February 1826.

On the 26th May 1836 the cause, being at issue, came on to be heard before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, when it was decreed that the trusts of the said indenture of the 13th day of February 1826 should be carried into execution; and the plaintiff was thereby decreed entitled to the benefit of said trust deed; and it was referred to the master to take an account of rents and arrears of rent received, or which, without wilful default, might have been received by appellant from the trust estates since the execution of the deed of 13th day of February 1826, and how the same had been applied and disposed of. And it was referred to the master to take an account of the sum advanced by the plaintiff for the redemption of the said lands so under ejectment; and it was thereby decreed that the same, together with legal interest thereon from the time when the same was so advanced, was well charged on the said trust estates so conveyed to appellant, for the life of the said Sir Neal O'Donell the younger, in priority to all other charges created by the said trust deed, save the costs [489] and expences incident to the preparation of the said deed, and the execution of the trusts thereof. And it was further ordered, that said master should take an account of the sums, if any, due and owing to all other persons interested under the trusts of the said deed. And it was further ordered, that all creditors claiming under the said trust deed of 13th February 1826 should be at liberty to come before the said master to prove their respective demands.

On the 16th day of November 1838 the master made his report, pursuant to the decree; and under several decrees dated the 26th May 1836, 15th February 1839, and ultimately by a decree of 10th June 1839, it was declared that the appellant was chargeable with the sum of £5276 8s. 6d., trust funds which had been misapplied by him, and also with the sum of £6589 16s. 1d., arrears of the rent of the trust estates which might have been received by him but for his wilful default, making together the sum of £6866 4s. 7d.; and it was thereby ordered that the appellant should pay within twelve months unto plaintiff, Richard Earl of Lucan, the sum of £6204 8s. 7d., (being the sum advanced by him for the redemption of the lands under ejectment, together with interest for the same,) and should pay interest on the principal sum until paid.

From the decrees of the 26th of May 1836, and 15th of February 1839, and the 10th of June 1839, this appeal is brought.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Jacob for the Appellant.—The deed of trust mentions all the charges upon the estates; no express sum is mentioned in respect of the [490] chief rent, as the sum due was not ascertained. The transfer made by Lord

Lucan was not made upon a contract with the trustee; the letter was sent subsequent to the advance of the money; no mortgage was ever agreed upon or executed. The terms of the bill go very far to dispose of this case; it states that the trust deed was prepared and executed without the knowledge of the plaintiff; he was not, therefore, a party to the deed, and there was no contract made with him. In this country the bill would have been met by a demurrer. Lord Lucan advanced the money to obtain Sir Neal O'Donnell's interest at the approaching election for the county of Mayo. The Lord Chancellor decided this case upon the ground that Lord Lucan was the salvager of the estate; how does Lord Lucan become a cestuique trust under the deed? How is he entitled to call for the execution of the trust? He says, I have a right to stand in the place of Lord Sligo. But Lord Sligo could not call for an execution of the trust; there is no contract between the trustee and Lord Sligo. It is admitted that the money was to be raised by mortgage under the power; could he, by these means, have been a cestuique trust under the deed? Palk v. Clinton (12 Vesey, 48) decides that he could not. Lord Lucan cannot say that he was in a better situation than if he had got the mortgage deed. The bill is founded upon a false fact; the money was advanced long before the letter was written, and upon an assurance that he should have Sir Neal O'Donnell's support at the election. He never demanded the rents, and the rents are applied in payment of prior charges. The cases of Worrall v. Harford (8 Vesey, 4) and [491] Garrod v. Lord Lauderdale (2 Russ. and Mylne, 451) seem to have been forgotten.

Mr. K. Bruce and Mr. Jas. Russell for the Respondent.—It is not put in issue that Lord Lucan had no right to proceed under the trust deed. If it had been put in issue, Lord Lucan might have stated facts which would have enabled him to take advantage of that deed. All persons treated this deed as one which might include Lord Lucan's demand, and it is clear that it was intended to be paid under the trusts of the deed. If this case came within the principle of Walwyn v. Coutts (3 Simons, 14), the deed would be revocable. The money applied by Lord Lucan was the means of saving the estate. We are creditors, not volunteers.

Mr. Pemberton in reply.—Has any principle been stated upon which this decree can be sustained? Lord Lucan is not a party to the deed. A volunteer would stand in a better situation than a creditor, though there is a trust deed for the benefit of creditors. The advances could not be made upon the security of the deed, for he says he did not know of it. Supposing he could have claimed under the deed, how could he have insisted upon it, in the manner in which it has been decreed?

Lord Chancellor (6th August).—This case of La Touche v. Earl of Lucan is an appeal against an order of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, by which a decree was made against the appellant in these terms:—"It is ordered [492] and decreed, that the trusts of the said indenture of the 13th of February 1826 shall be carried into execution," and the plaintiff is justly decreed entitled to the benefit of the said trust deed; and accordingly it was referred to the master "to take an account of the sums received, or which, without wilful default, might have been received, by the appellant out of the rents, issues, and profits of the said trust estates since the execution of the said deed of trust of the 13th of February 1826, and how the same have been applied and disposed of; and also to take an account of the arrears of rent due out of the said trust premises at the time of the execution of the said trust deed, and what part thereof has been received by the appellant, or, but for his neglect and default, might have been received, out of the said arrears since the execution of the said trust deed, and how the same have been applied and disposed of; and it was referred to the master to take an account of the sum advanced by the plaintiff for the redemption of the said lands so under ejectment; and it was thereby decreed, that the same, together with legal interest thereon from the time when the same was so advanced, was well charged on the said trust estates so conveyed to the appellant for the life of the said Sir Neal O'Donnell the younger, in priority to all other charges created by the said trust deed, save the cost and expenses incident to the preparation of the said deed and the execution of the trusts thereof."

The question in this case arose under a trust deed, by which the tenant for life of certain estates, partly leasehold and partly freehold, conveyed what interest he had in those trust estates to certain trustees or certain trusts. [493] It appears, that as to the leaseholds Lord Sligo, who was the owner of the fee, and entitled therefore to the head rent, the head rent being in arrear, had proceeded by ejectment to recover the lands liable to this rent; that under the provisions of the act on that subject in Ireland a certain time was allowed to the tenant to pay the arrear of that rent, in order to save the estate from being forfeited to the head landlord; that being pressed, not only by this demand of the head landlord, but being subject to a variety of other deeds, the tenant for life executed a trust deed, by which he conveyed the property to trustees, with a declaration of trust, by which he was to apply the rents in a certain way prescribed, with a power of raising £10,000 by mortgage of the estate, in order to pay what was due of the rent, and to pay the other charges set out in the schedule of the deed. Amongst others there was a provision by which the trustees were authorized to make certain payments to the tenant for life, and the members of his family.

It appears, (though the history of that is not very accurately ascertained by the evidence,) that a sum of money was paid into court in order to meet this demand of Lord Sligo; that appears, no doubt, to have been the money of Lord Lucan, and there is some evidence of some previous communication as to that money being paid into court. The bill, however, alleges that it was paid into court under these circumstances:—"That the principal object which Sir Neal O'Donell had in view in executing the said deed of trust having been to raise, by means thereof, a sum of money sufficient to secure the said estates from eviction, and La Touche having succeeded in procuring himself to be made sole trustee thereunder, he, La Touche, wrote a [494] letter to the plaintiff's law agent and solicitor in this cause, bearing date the 23d day of February 1826, thereby stating that Sir Neal O'Donell the younger had executed a deed vesting all his life interest in him the said La Touche, meaning thereby the said recited indenture, in trust." It then says that the said letter was "duly subscribed with the proper name and handwriting of the said La Touche; that having been informed by the plaintiff's agent and solicitor of the contents of the said letter, and being assured by him that any sum to be advanced by the plaintiff, in pursuance of the said letter, would be the first charge upon the life estate of the said Sir Neal O'Donell the younger under the trust deed, and would be paid to the plaintiff in preference and priority to any of the charges created by the said deed as therein contained, and having been willing and desirous to serve Sir Neal O'Donell the younger by advancing a sufficient sum of money to prevent the eviction of his estates, the plaintiff accordingly authorized such advance to be made, and that a sum of money which the plaintiff then had vested in old government 3½ per cent. stock should be applied to that purpose."

The allegation, therefore, is, that upon the faith and credit of that letter the advance was made. The advance, I think, was made in March, the letter certainly bears date in February; but it is beyond all question established by the case of both parties that the letter was actually received in the month of June following. Those, therefore, who gave instructions for the filing of this bill have, in that respect, put a case upon record which they must have been aware could not be sup-[495]-ported by the facts when they came to be proved by evidence.

There is some evidence, as I have said, of some negotiation or promise held out as to the mode in which this money was to be secured, but Lord Lucan was no party to the trust deed. Lord Sligo was no party to the trust deed. The deed was a deed executed by the owner of the property, for the purpose of disposing of this property in the way which was considered most beneficial to him, to relieve the estate from the pressing demand for the head rent, and the other incumbrances which affected it, reserving to himself certain provisions out of the estate. Now, the bill, stating the trust deed, and stating this letter, prays that the trusts of the deed may be carried into effect,—“that the trusts of the said indenture may be carried into execution, and an account be taken of the sums received, or which, without wilful default, might have been received;” precisely, in fact, in the terms of the decree which was afterwards pronounced.

Two questions, therefore, arise upon these pleadings: first, whether there was any right on the part of the plaintiff to call for an execution of the trusts of that deed independently of the letter; and secondly, whether that letter gave him any title to the decree which has been pronounced? Now, it does not seem, so far as I can ascertain, that there was brought very distinctly, if at all, before the consideration of the Lord Chancellor for Ireland, (for I see no reference to it in his Lordship's judgment,) that train of decisions which has now established the law of this country beyond all question; namely, that where a party creates a trust for the purpose of paying his debts, the creditors do not thereby [496] become cestuique trusts, nor become invested with any power of calling upon the Court to execute those trusts. That doctrine, laid down by Lord Brougham in the case of Garrod v. Lord Lauderdale, in which he reviewed all the authorities, appears to have been acted upon ever since, and has been considered as established by Wallwyn v. Coutts; not that it was new law, but that case brought it directly into operation, and it is now an established principle of the court of equity.

Then, how does this case differ from those cases? A party having merely a demand of the owner of the estate cannot be considered, upon the authority of those decisions, as having any right to call for the assistance of a court of equity to enforce the execution of trusts voluntarily created for payment of the owner's debts; neither did the plaintiff in this case gain any such right by paying the money which was applied to the discharge of Lord Sligo's demand for rent as head landlord. In the first place Lord Sligo had no equitable right; he had the legal right which the law gives him of recovering by ejectment; but Lord Sligo had no more right to come in as a creditor, and ask for the execution of that trust deed, than any other creditor; he was, as between himself and the author of that deed, only a creditor, independently of any other right which his station as landlord gave him against the estate. But, even if Lord Sligo had had those rights, the present Lord Lucan does not connect himself with Lord Sligo. There is no assignment of the interest of Lord Sligo, and if, for the accommodation of the tenant for life of the estate, who was pressed by the ejectment at the suit of Lord Sligo, Lord Lucan advanced the money by which the claim of Lord Sligo was satisfied, that would not have given him [497] any claim, even if Lord Sligo had any; but Lord Sligo not having any, it is not very material to consider that question. Then, how does this letter give him any title? The history of the letter is, that it was written in the month of June, after the money was paid into court, which was paid in the month of March; and it was a promise or undertaking by the trustee that he would give the best security he could under that trust deed. That cannot make him a cestuique trust under the trust deed. If the letter gave him any title at all, it would be to have that carried into effect which that letter undertook; that is, to give him the best security he could under the trust. Now, if we look to that trust deed, we shall find that the only security it could give him would be the raising £10,000 by the mortgage of the estate, and it appears that negotiations went on for that purpose. It was never the intention of the parties, as manifested by the evidence, to deprive the family of the benefit of those payments which they were in the habit of receiving. On the contrary, those intentions were expressly disclaimed, and what the parties intended is manifested by the drafts that were prepared for the purpose of carrying the contract into effect. They, in fact, contracted for the only security they could contract for, namely, such security as the trustee could give them by virtue of the trust which was charged upon the estate.

The negotiations went on, and objections were made to the several deeds that were proposed for that purpose, till an event happened which prevented the possibility of that which was intended, namely, the death of the tenant for life out of whose estate the charge was to be paid. The result, therefore, is neither more [498] nor less than this: the negotiation by the parties having control over an uncertain fund, depending on the life of another, for creating a charge upon that property, was extended until the period when the dropping of the life prevented its being carried into effect. But to carry a contract for that purpose into effect was not either the object of the suit or the purport of the decree. If that had been the right claimed, it is not necessary to consider what might have been the result of such a suit. The Court has granted relief upon the supposition that the effect of the letter was to make the plaintiff a cestuique trust, not for the purpose of doing that which was contracted, namely, obtaining the benefit of that charge, but a cestuique trust from the commencement, so as to call upon the trustee for the repayment, not only of those sums of money which he had paid before the right accrued, but those which he had paid with the knowledge of all the parties, including the party who now makes the payments a ground of complaint.

I presume this decree was pronounced, owing to the authorities in this country not having been called to the attention of the Court of Chancery in Ireland. When we see what the decree is, and refer to the authorities to which I have before adverted, it is, in my opinion, clearly not consistent with those authorities, and consequently it cannot stand. It is unnecessary to consider the subsequent part of the case, which would be only material in the event of this House being of a different opinion upon that point. The result appears to be, that the decree, as made, is inconsistent with the principles established by the decisions to which I have referred.

[499] Mr. Knight Bruce.—Will your Lordships permit me to call your attention to the costs subsequently to the decree? Your Lordships are aware that the parties proceeded in the office under the decree, without appealing. I suppose your Lordships do not mean to include any costs after the first hearing.

Lord Chancellor.—No, I think not. The decree to be dismissed with costs, up to the hearing.

Decree reversed, and bill dismissed with costs, up to the hearing.

[500] ON A WRIT OF ERROR FROM THE COURT OF KING'S BENCH.*

JOHN DOE, on the Demise of JOHN BIRTWHISTLE,—Plaintiff in Error; AGNES VARDILL,—Defendant in Error [2d July 1839, 20th July and 10th August 1840].

[Mews' Dig. vii. 604; viii. 231, 259, 260. See note to S.C. 2 Cl. and F. 571.]

Statute of Merton—Heir by descent—Legitimation per subsequens matrimonium.

—A child born in Scotland of unmarried parents domiciled in that country, and who afterwards intermarry in Scotland, though by the laws of Scotland capable of inheriting lands in that country, is not capable of inheriting lands in England.

In 1823 a bill was filed in the Court of Chancery by Birtwhistle, the plaintiff in error, against Vardill, defendant in error, for an account of rents of certain lands situate in the county of York, alleged to belong to the plaintiff in error, upon which the defendant in error had entered as guardian in socage to the defendant in error. Upon a motion for a receiver, Lord Eldon directed an ejectment to be brought; in 1825 the eject-[501]-ment was tried before Bayley, J., at York, and the jury, by a special verdict, found (amongst other things,) that Alexander Birtwhistle in 1790 went from England to Scotland, where he was domiciled, and continued there till his death in 1810; that he cohabited with Mary Purdie, who was domiciled in Scotland for the same period; that John Birtwhistle, plaintiff in error, was the only son of Alexander Birtwhistle and Mary Purdie; that he was born in Scotland in 1799; that in 1805 Alexander Birtwhistle and Mary Purdie were married in Scotland; that plaintiff, John Birtwhistle, was, by the law of Scotland, legitimate, and held lands in Scotland as heir to Alexander Birtwhistle. The Court of King's Bench held that John Birtwhistle was not capable of inheriting lands in England as heir of his father; and in 1830 the judges, upon a writ of error to the House of Lords, approved of that judgment. See 9 Bligh, N. S. 32.

On 2d July 1839 it was re-argued by one counsel on a side, in the presence of the judges, on a question proposed to the judges, and stated in the opinion given by Tindal, C. J.

The Attorney General for the Plaintiff.—The verdict of the jury has ascertained that the status and character of legitimate son of the party last seised in certain lands in England belong to the plaintiff in error; he is therefore, as the heir of that party, entitled to take by descent the land in dispute, but he is met by the plea, that inasmuch as he was not born at a time when his parents actually were in a state of lawful wedlock, his legitimacy as a general right, however undoubted, will not confer on him the requisite title to [502] the lands. The plaintiff in error, on the other hand, maintains, that he is fairly within the rule of law, and that as the marriage of his parents is held præsumptione juris to have taken place at the time when the copula or consent was interposed, so he is as much to be held as born in lawful wedlock as one born after actual celebration in facie ecclesiae.

The judgment of the King's Bench is erroneous, inasmuch as it was pronounced without argument; the judges conceiving that the question before them was, whether the law of domicile or the lex rei sitæ should prevail, and, holding that the latter must necessarily rule, decided in favour of the defendant in error; but no dispute exists as to the prevalence and application of the latter rule, the only question being whether that rule does not clearly embrace the case of the plaintiff in error. The opinions of the judges delivered by Chief Baron Alexander equally misrepresent the nature of the question.

It is admitted that the rule of the law of England must be supported in so far as regards succession to the land; but then it becomes a question publici juris, whether the heir claiming possesses those attributes which are requisite to entitle him to take by descent. Now, the effect of the marriage of his parents in Scotland, although it occurred in point of time subsequent to his birth, was, that it conferred legitimacy on him, not only from the period of the marriage downwards, but from the birth; or rather it placed the parents in the situation of married parents from the time of the antecedent copula, to which the marriage is held in law to draw back. This not only makes him a legitimate child from [503] his birth downwards in Scotland, but all the world over (Stair's Instit. Law of Scotland, b. iii. tit. 3, sec. 42; Erskine's Instit. b. i. tit. 6, sec. 52; King v. Inhabitants of Brampton, 10 East, 282). It is accordingly a well settled rule in England that a marriage good in Scotland shall be recognized in the former country; that the rights which flow from such a contract shall be equally recognized in England as if the marriage had been within the realm of England. Thus the right to dower has been fully sanctioned by the case of Ilderton v. Ilderton (2 Hy. Black, 145), and Crompton and Bearcroft therein mentioned. Since these decisions have been acted on the rights of parties taking benefit from a foreign marriage have uniformly been recognized to the fullest extent in England ex comitate gentium. The departure from the rule as settled by those cases would, in the present instance, cause a conflictus legum which does not arise if the consistent principles hitherto acted on be followed up.

The opinions of the judges fully adopt the legitimacy of the plaintiff in error, but deny the effect sought to be given to it; they therefore cause this inconsistency, that he must be held legitimate to the effect of succeeding in mobilibus, but cannot as heir take land by descent; that he might inherit a Scotch title or estate, but be denied the same privilege in England, although it is settled law that his widow would be entitled to dower of land in England. To find for the defendant in error would be to make a retrograde movement in the law, which, acting on the received comity of nations, has all but sanctioned the right and title of the plaintiff in error [504] to take by descent land of which his father died last seised (Co. Litt. 7 b. Sheddun v. Patrick, 1st July 1803, Fac. Coll.; affirmed, 3d March 1808. Strathmore Peerage, 4 Wilson and Shaw, App. p. 89; 2 Jac. and Walk. 547. Ross v. Rose, 4 Wilson and Shaw, 289. Warrender v. Warrender, 9 Bligh, 89; 2 Shaw and M'Lean, 154).

Mr. Dampier for Defendant in Error.—The question decided by the Court of King's Bench is one purely of English municipal law; it affects not the jus gentium; and the determination of it requires no aid from those foreign principles of law which are sought to be imported into its discussion. There are ample materials and decisions in the law of England for enabling this House to decide who is the heir entitled to take land by descent in England, and that too without raising any conflict with the laws of other countries.

This question is not new to the law; but may be held to have been authoritatively settled centuries since. The discussions anterior to the statute of Merton show, on the one hand, that the ecclesiastical courts, acting on the principles of the civil law, were cognizant of the rule as to the legitimation per subsequens matrimonium, but that the attempts to introduce that as part of the municipal law of England failed; accordingly the King's courts never gave effect to it, and the statute of Merton put a period to the controversy.

Accordingly there is no instance of any foreign subject of the King of England seeking at any time to establish his right by descent to land in England by virtue of a subsequent marriage of his parents; and the absence of such cases is important in deciding a question now revived at this distance of time.

[505] The rule itself is clear and express; viz., that the party must be the heir born ex justis nuptiis of his parents.

It is in vain to hold that that rule has been complied with in the case of a child born not ex justis nuptiis, but out of lawful wedlock; the admitted fact being that no marriage took place till after the child was in existence. It meets not this difficulty to say, that in England a child is born ex justis nuptiis though the marriage only takes place the day before his birth. Still the answer is obvious, that the requisites of a rigid and inflexible rule have been complied with, by the undoubted fact of the birth in such a case being subsequent to the actual marriage.

The defendant in error is not bound to go into the inquiry as to the rights of antenati in Scotland, and to what extent these have been sanctioned in England. One thing is evident, that the authorities are by no means agreed as to the origin and precise operation of the rule as to legitimation by subsequent marriage; and the very term "subsequent marriage" implies that it is not a correct view of the effect of it, to represent it as a marriage virtually occurring anterior to the birth.

But, without questioning the foreign law, it is sufficient to say that the law of England does not recognize ex comitate the rules of other countries, so far as these do not interfere with positive existing rules in the law of real property in England. Accordingly the cases of Ilderton v. Ilderton [2 H. Bl. 145], and Crompton v. Bearcroft, holding them to recognize Scotch marriages as good in this country, and as authorizing the widow's right to dower, may stand well with the law as settled by the King's [506] Bench in this case; for these cases interfere with no fixed positive rule of English law; the argument ab inconvenienti can have no weight. There are, no doubt, many rights which the plaintiff in error may enjoy in England as the legitimate son of his father; but from these must be excepted the right to take by descent land of which the parent died seised and intestate (Costumier de Normand. 27 b. note; Regiam Majestatem, b. ii. p. 51; Kames's Equity, b. iii. c. 8, p. 497; Glanv. b. vii. c. 15; Fleta, l. vi. c. 38; Bract. c. 5, p. 416; Britton, 12 mo. ed. p. 417; 1 Reeves, 464; 3 Coleridge's Blackstone, 336; 2 Roper, Husband and Wife, 445 note; *Co. Lord Chancellor.—Your Lordships have had the advantage of having had this case (raising certainly a very important question) argued with the utmost learning and ability; and it will be for your Lordships now to consider in what way the question is to be submitted to the learned Judges, in order to call their attention to the point to be decided. Upon looking at the question put to the learned Judges in 1830, it seems to me very accurately to state the facts of the case necessary to be submitted to the learned Judges, and it does not appear to me that it can be done better by putting it in other words. That question was in these words: "A. went from England to Scotland, and resided and was domiciled there, and so continued for many years till the time of his death. A. cohabited with M., an unmarried woman, during the whole period of his residence in Scotland, and had by her a son, B., who was born in Scotland. Several years after the birth of B., who was the only son, A. and [507] M. were married in Scotland according to the laws of that country. By the laws of Scotland, if the marriage of the mother of a child with the father of such child takes place in Scotland, such child born in Scotland before the marriage is equally legitimate with children born after the marriage, for the purpose of taking land, and for every other purpose. A. died seised of real estate in England, and intestate. Is B. entitled to such property as the heir of A.?" That, therefore, is the question I shall propose to your Lordships to submit to the learned Judges upon this occasion.

Lord Brougham.—I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend that the question of 1830 is much better than any other which can be put; it varies the point upon the facts stated in the special verdict; that verdict did unfortunately not find particularly in every respect what the law of Scotland is upon this subject, consequently the argument of the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error pro tanto is damnified. It would have been better if it had been put as the learned counsel, Mr. Murray, stated it, whose evidence was believed by the judge and the jury, namely, that the marriage is supposed to have been antecedent to the birth by fiction; but the legitimacy, as contradistinguished from legitimation, is sufficiently put for the purpose of the argument, and with the assistance of the authorities it can leave very little doubt upon the minds of the learned Judges. Yet I cannot help expressing my regret at the length of time during which this suit has been pending. It was tried at York as long ago as 1825, and I very well recollect the trial. The delay of [508] fourteen years certainly is a very great misfortune; it has been owing in part to the changes in the custody of the Great Seal. In 1830 the appeal was certainly prosecuted, but it was not decided; and it was not till 1835 that we were aware of it being still depending. If I had ever known, whilst I held the Great Seal, that it was undetermined, I should have called the attention of the House to it, and then there would have only been the delay from 1825 to 1830. It was not noticed until another case brought it to your Lordships' knowledge that it was not disposed of. Some laches too, probably, may be imputed to the parties. If they had reminded the House of it, no doubt the cause would have been heard; but I suppose there is something in the state of the property that did not make it very necessary, else they would have taken some means of obtaining an earlier judgment. I am desirous that the attention of the learned Judges should be directed to that, which, moved by the anxiety I felt upon the subject, I stated as the opinion I entertained in 1835, and to the arguments I then delivered. They have been printed, and will be furnished to the learned Judges. I do not know that they throw any great light upon the question, but they state the points, and refer to the authorities as well as to the principles. I entirely agree that this is a question of very great importance, and of very considerable difficulty. I quite agree with the Attorney General that it is of peculiar importance as affecting the law of Scotland, the question being, whether the lex loci domicilii, the lex loci contractus et nativitatis, or the lex loci rei sitae should prevail in this case. From the time of Stair downwards,—from the time indeed when the distinction between real property and [509] personal arose,—the law governing the one being the lex loci rei sitae, and the law governing the other being the lex loci domicilii et contractus. I feel great anxiety that this case should be well considered, for another reason; I mean out of regard for the credit of our English courts. I concur very much in the statement of the Attorney General, that if what has been laid down in this case be law, the bounds of that law are very narrow. If it is law any where it prevails assuredly only as the law within the bounds of Westminster Hall. I know wherever I go in Europe it is boldly denied to be the law. I know the opinion of Dr. Storey and other American jurists also is against us; and I do not think I could overstate the degree in which all those jurists dissent from the judgment in Doe v. Vardill. Moreover, if there is any reason to be given for the judgment, that reason is not in any one place. A considerable argument against it is to be gathered from the total diversity of the grounds upon which the judgment has at different times been maintained. It is first vested on one ground in the Court of King's Bench; then upon another and very different ground at the bar; here, in 1830, again, upon a third ground, which I think must be admitted on all hands to be untenable, the ground stated by Lord Chief Baron Alexander in giving the opinion of the judges to this House; and, lastly, upon a different ground from all the three former, by the counsel to day at your bar. And if the judges are to give their opinions upon some fifth ground, the discrepancy may support the judgment better in their minds than it will support the judgment or give weight to it in the eyes of any other person; for assuredly a decision supported upon so many different grounds will be likely to [510] sink low in the estimation of those who come to a calm consideration of its merits. I cannot help feeling the greatest regret that these questions should be raised here so frequently as they have lately been. Dispose of this as you may, we shall have no end to such cases, unless we adopt the only satisfactory mode that can be devised for settling such controversies and doubts, namely, by some legislative measure to relieve the law of this country from the opprobrium which now rests upon it in the eyes of all mankind. That there should be a set of questions incalculably important, perhaps the most important, to the interest and feelings of individuals which can ever arise in courts of justice, and that these questions should be left surrounded with doubt, and incapable of decision for want of some statutory enactment regarding these subject matters, is truly lamentable, and not a little opprobrious to our jurisprudence. Can any thing be more opprobrious to the law of a civilized country than that it should be extremely difficult to tell in this country whether a man is married or not? nay, what is worse, whether a woman is married or a concubine? that it should be still more difficult to tell whether a person, the issue of an unquestioned marriage, is a bastard or legitimate, and that, owing to the conflict of law or the discrepancy of the law, it should be declared in one part of the country that a man is a bastard and in another that he is legitimate,—in one part that a woman is married, and in another that she is a concubine,—in one part that divorce has taken place, dissolving a prior marriage, and if that person afterwards crosses the Tweed, and intermarries with another woman, he is deemed not to be in the honourable and comfortable state of wedlock, but in a state of felony, and having [511] committed bigamy he may be transported to Botany Bay, which actually has happened; and still more, that if the same party had intermarried again in Scotland he would be held to be in the honourable state of matrimony, and not of felony; but if he had English estates the question would arise, though the children were legitimate in Scotland, their birth-place, yet the law of the country where the property is situated declared them bastards, nay, that in only one court of England they were treated as bastards, and in all other courts acknowledged to be legitimate. There are peers sitting in this House affected by this question, the issue of noble families, their parents having been married in Scotland after previous divorces, they themselves being of the most spotless character and of the highest honour, possessing the most magnificent estates and the highest titles. It is just that question which is raised here, and which was assumed to be so clear at the bar,—though I interrupted the counsel to show it was any thing but clear,—that the current of decisions set in the opposite direction, and that the law would, if taken to be as so mis-stated, make these parties bastards who are now going about as legitimate children. It is a very horrid state of things, affecting the feelings and the character as well as the property of individuals, that there should be this uncertain state of the law. It is still worse to think, that all the learning and skill in Westminster Hall, if you were to consult it, and all the Scotch law in the Parliament House of Edinburgh, would not make you sure of getting two opinions to agree upon such questions as these. I hope this state of things will be put an end to. It never can be done satisfactorily without an act of parliament. You might say that a mar-[512]-riage should be good or bad in Scotland. If bad, of course the issue should be bastards all the world over. You might say that a divorce in Scotland was good and valid, provided it was not fictitiously obtained, and in fraud of the law of England. Some wise, wholesome, and really salutary provision of that kind is absolutely necessary. I have agreed all along with what has been said upon the law of England and Scotland, thinking the law of Scotland respecting the marriage contract exceedingly objectionable compared to ours. If a divorce is obtained there by parties bona fide, it might be made good universally. If it is done in fraudem legis Anglicanae, whereby it is also in fraud of the rights of others, you might enact that it should be void universally, and then a man would know whether he was married or not, and a woman whether she was a concubine or a matron, and the child whether he was a bastard or legitimate. If the judges decide the present question or any of those questions of status, one way, ever so satisfactorily, it does not follow that they will be settled. The difficulty just now suggested will arise, and you will have another series of doubts and difficulties which will not be removed, because they cannot be anticipated. I would remind your Lordships more particularly of one point. We all say that marriage is governed by the law of the country; that is, the canon upon the subject; it depends upon the lex loci contractus; that is to say, a marriage good by that law in the country where celebrated is also good all the world over. A divorce takes place. We do not go so far as to say,—though, generally speaking, the rule of law is, unumquodque dissolvitur eodem modo quo colligatum est,—yet we do not go so far as to say that an English marriage [513] may be validly dissolved by a Scotch divorce, though English parties may contract a Scotch marriage in Scotland which shall be good all the world over; we do not say, that the same law which is applicable to the constitution of the contract applies also to its dissolution. But there is a conflict, and a real conflict of laws. The Scotch lawyers say that the Scotch divorce is good to dissolve an English marriage, and that a man so divorced may enter into marriage again, but this divorce by our English decisions is null if he comes to England. The Scotch Courts maintain the efficiency of divorce, and consequently the validity of the second marriage, and they will maintain this to the end of time. All the Scotch lawyers and judges, without any exception, say that the second marriage is good in Scotland. I do say, that this conflict of law seems to involve an absurdity, which no judicial decisions can reconcile. It is self-repugnant, and nothing but an act of the legislature can reconcile it upon sound principles. A man comes here with his Scotch wife, and with issue born in Scotland; that Scotch wife is held to be a concubine for aught I know in England. The decisions go at all events to this extent, that the English law does not, as regards an English marriage, acknowledge the validity of the Scotch divorce. Here then a party may come, and after a Scotch divorce he may intermarry in England, and then there are two wives each claiming this husband. This is the conclusion either way; it is the conclusion from the well-established and well-known principle of allowing the lex loci contractus,—the law of the country where the marriage was contracted,—to prevail universally, and yet not allowing the law of the [514] country where the divorce is had to regulate the dissolution of the contract.

One word more before closing these observations. Being moved by the considerations to which I have adverted, I introduced a bill into Parliament in 1835 to cure the evil, and terminate so anomalous a state of things. I have been strongly urged to introduce it again. I own I had rather not do so pending this discussion, because I should hardly be able to accomplish my purpose without prejudicing this question, and I would therefore rather wait till it shall be decided. Now what is the real origin of all this embarrassment? a great deal arises from a country possessing one system of law being connected with a country possessing a different system, like Scotland and England, and these countries being contiguous. But much the greater part of the inconvenience has arisen from another source, and it shows the danger of departing from sound, solid, and uniform principles. If you had held originally that a marriage celebrated in Scotland, not bona fide by parties really resident there, but by parties who could not be duly married here, and who went to Scotland in fraudem legis Anglicanae, to escape the provisions of the English marriage act, was a bad marriage in England,—if you had held, as you ought to have done by that opinion generally, and declared it was a bad marriage, and that you would not allow parties who could afford to go to Scotland for the purpose of evading the marriage act, and who were really the only people contemplated by that act, to escape its provisions by this Scotch journey,—if, instead of holding that to be a good proceeding, and giving it effect, you had said, as you have done in most other cases, “This is done in [515] fraudem legis, and shall not prevail,” then, nine parts in ten of the difficulties we now labour under would not have arisen. Lord Mansfield always held those marriages to be void in England. Instead of following his opinion, when Crompton v. Bearcroft came into Doctors Commons, it was decided in favour of the Scotch marriage. I have often lamented that we have no account of that important case, except in a passage of Mr. Justice Buller’s Nisi Prius. I applied to my late excellent and most learned friend Dr. Swabey, and he gave me a few notes, which showed how the case had arisen, namely, by letters of request from Lincoln, but threw little or no light upon the subject. The case does not seem to have undergone a thorough investigation; nevertheless it may have done so when it came to the delegates, a Court certainly of the highest authority. There, a judgment was pronounced in favour of the marriage, but on what argument or by what judges I know not. Then came Ilderton v. Ilderton, which first brought the question before a court of common law. If you look into that case, as reported in 2 H. Blackstone [145], you will find that the case of Crompton v. Bearcroft is cited. It was a writ of dower, to which ne unques accouple was pleaded, and there was a replication by the demandant of a marriage in Scotland, to which the tenant demurred. This demurrer was upon two grounds; the first denied the validity of a Scotch marriage in an English suit, and this ground was given up as an untenable point. The party never dreamt of arguing it, but confined the argument to another point, Whether there ought not to have been a place for the venue, and whether the replication ought not to have concluded with an appeal to the bishop's certificate, instead of con-[516]-cluding to the country. The question upon the marriage was then abandoned, and the judgment makes no mention of it. Ever since that time the point has been held to be clear, that a Scotch marriage, however plainly and grossly in fraudem legis Anglicanæ, was a valid marriage. Now the evil arose originally from your having decided that; you went wrong in so deciding, as many of us think; but having once gone wrong, when other kindred questions arose, as upon the validity of Scotch divorces, you ought either to have re-traced your steps, so as to get right again, or you should have continued acting upon the same principles; there was no middle course; either come back from your error in Ilderton v. Ilderton [1 H. Bl. 145] and Crompton v. Bearcroft, or go on upon the same principle; either hold that the going to Scotland in fraud of the English law ought not to avail in any way, or hold that the Scotch proceeding, however fraudulent, does avail; and if it makes the contract valid, that it also validates the dissolution of the contract. But instead of following up your error you chose to hold the marriage good, but the dissolution of the marriage bad; and see what interminable confusion you have thus got into. Now in Lolly's case the judges had an opportunity of retracting Ilderton v. Ilderton and Crompton v. Bearcroft, or they might have said, the cases have ruled that the marriage is good, then so must the divorce be. But instead of that they maintained the validity of a Scotch marriage, though in fraud of the English law, and yet they held that a Scotch divorce in the same circumstances is utterly invalid; and hence arise all the difficulties and disagreements by which we are now surrounded. I am sure this is a good reason why judges in deciding important questions should adopt the course, [517] when they have gone wrong, of at once, in an open and manly way, retracing their steps, rather than persist in their error; but if they do persist in their error they ought to do it out and out, though to the inconvenience of parties, and not, by way of saving their own consistency, impose on the people what is probably the most miserable of all inconveniences, that of vague and uncertain jurisprudence. Instead of having it uncertain, and subjecting people to this annoyance, it may be made at least intelligible by being made consistent, and though the principle were originally wrong, it may be made to tally with itself. At present it is inconsistent with itself; the principles are in one direction upon one ground, and in another direction upon another. I do hope that the result of this inquiry which has taken place will be the settlement of the law, and I cannot speak too highly of the ability with which the argument has been conducted. I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend, that it is impossible to say too much upon that subject; and the question having been thoroughly argued is ripe now for decision. I hope that when it is fully considered, we shall have the assistance of the learned Judges in giving our opinions. We shall give our opinions with all due deference to their authority, and all the disposition possible to avail ourselves of their useful aid, but without losing the regard that we conscientiously owe to our own opinions; not forgetting certainly the impression which may be made upon us by the opinion of the learned Judges, but coming to a full, calm, and deliberate consideration of a question of such paramount importance. When the law as it now stands has been thus settled, then ultimate steps may be taken, which [518] I apprehend will alone be satisfactory to the people of both countries; I mean the final settlement of the law by an act of parliament, declaratory in some respects, and enacting in other respects; thus laying down what principles of law shall be fitting to be established for the two countries. I have felt it my duty to trouble your Lordships with these observations in the presence of the learned Judges and the parties, and I hope they may tend to the furtherance of justice in this case.

Lord Wynford.—My Lords, I believe I am the only peer now present who was in the House at the time the question was put to the learned Judges upon the former occasion. That question was drawn up by Lord Lyndhurst, and submitted to the Judges. I approved of it then, and I approve of it now; I do not think any question can be put that will more effectually elicit the opinions of the learned Judges. I have a strong opinion upon this subject, which I have not hesitated to express upon other occasions; but if it should so happen that all the learned Judges agree in their opinion, it would be highly improper in me not to give way to them, as the Judges know I have upon several occasions; but if there is a difference of opinion among them, I shall take the liberty of stating my view of the question; at present all I shall say is, that I do not object to the question proposed to be submitted to the learned Judges. I wish my noble and learned friend to accomplish his object of reconciling the laws of Scotland and England in similar cases to this, but I am afraid that he will find very great difficulties in his way. I cannot help thinking that it might be better settled by different decisions as the matters arise; rather than by an act of par-[519]-liament. I do not think that the legislature is well adapted to take up and settle a very difficult question like this. However, we shall, I hope, have an opportunity of fully considering the various points, as we always have in this place, particularly when assisted by the learned Judges, when cases come judicially before us. With respect to the question,—considering the circumstances which my noble friend has alluded to,—the way in which it affects different families in both countries, having large estates and high houses,—it is of the utmost importance it should be settled, and that it should be decided as soon as possible when the Judges have matured their opinion. It is of deep importance, when that matured opinion is come to, that an early period should be fixed for the consideration of the question. It must not be supposed that this is the only case which has stood over for a great length of time. The next case which stands for hearing, I am sorry to say, is a case that was before me in the Court of King's Bench when a judge of that court, now nearly twenty years ago. It was afterwards argued in this House, and judgment given, five or six years ago. I hope some mode will be adopted, when points of very great importance arise, of bringing them forward, so that the parties may obtain justice as soon as possible.

Tindal, C. J. (20th July).—My Lords, the facts of the case upon which your Lordships propose a question to Her Majesty's Judges are these: A. went from England to Scotland, and resided and was domiciled there, and so continued for many years till the time of his death. A. cohabited with M., an unmarried woman, during the whole period of his residence in Scotland, and had by [520] her a son, B., who was born in Scotland. Several years after the birth of B., who was the only son, A. and M. were married in Scotland according to the laws of that country. By the laws of Scotland, if the marriage of the mother of a child with the father of such child take place in Scotland, such child, born in Scotland before the marriage, is equally legitimate with children born after the marriage for the purpose of taking land and for every other purpose. A. died seised of real estate in England, and intestate. And your Lordships found this question upon the foregoing state of facts; viz., "Is B. entitled to such property as the heir of A.?" And in answer to the question so proposed to us, I have the honour to state to your Lordships that it is the opinion of all the Judges who heard the argument (Tindal, C. J.; Vaughan, J.; Parke, B.; Bosanquet, J.; Patteson, J.; Gurney, B.; Williams, J.; Coleridge, J.; Coltman, J.; Maule, B.) that B. is not entitled to such property as the heir of A. We have, indeed, reason to lament that we have been deprived of the assistance of one of our learned brethren who heard this case argued at your Lordships' bar, the late Mr. Justice Vaughan; but as he had expressed a concurrent opinion upon the case at a meeting held immediately after the argument, I feel myself justified in adding the authority of his name to that of the other judges.

My Lords, the grounds and foundation upon which our opinion rests are briefly these: That we hold it to be a rule or maxim of the law of England with respect to the descent of land in England from father to son, that the son must be born after actual marriage between his father and mother; that this is a rule juris positivi, [521] as are all the laws which regulate succession to real property, this particular rule having been framed for the direct purpose of excluding in the descent of land in England the application of the rule of the civil and canon law, by which the subsequent marriage between the father and mother was held to make the son born before marriage legitimate; and that this rule of descent, being a rule of positive law annexed to the land itself, cannot be allowed to be broken in upon or disturbed by the law of the country where the claimant was born, and which may be allowed to govern his personal status as to legitimacy upon the supposed ground of the comity of nations. My Lords, to understand the nature and force of this rule of our law, "that the heir must be a person born in actual matrimony in order to enable him to take land in England by descent," and to perceive at the same time the positive and inflexible quality of this rule, and how closely it is annexed to the land itself, it will be necessary to consider the earlier authorities in which that rule is laid down and discussed, both before and subsequently to the statute of Merton, and more particularly the legal construction and operation of that statute.

If we take the definition of heir which Lord Coke adopts from the ancient text writers, and which is borrowed originally from the Roman law (Co. Litt. 7 b.), viz., that he is "ex justis nuptiis procreatus," the very description points at a marriage celebrated according to the rules, requisites, and ritual of the civil or Roman law. "Operae pretium est scire quid sint justae nuptiae," says Huber (lib. 23. tit. 2. de ritu nuptuum). He adds, "in promptu est Justiniani responsio: sunt eae quae secundum precepta legum contrahuntur." But to [522] refer to the "Mirror of Justices," perhaps the very earliest of our text books, it is there laid down, in p. 70, as an admitted principle, "that the common law only taketh him to be as son whom the marriage proveth to be so." Glanville, who wrote in the reign of Henry the Second, (probably about half a century before the passing of the statute of Merton,) in book 7. chap. 13. states, that "neither a bastard, nor any person not born in lawful wedlock, can be, in the legal sense of the term, an heir; but if any one claims an inheritance in the character of heir, and the other party object to him that he cannot be heir because he was not born in lawful wedlock, then indeed the plea shall cease in the king's court, and the archbishop or bishop of the place shall be commanded to inquire concerning such marriage, and to make known his decision either to the king or his justices." He then, in chapter 14. gives the form of the writ, which will be found not unimportant to the present inquiry; (viz.)

"The king to the archbishop, health:

"W. appearing before me in my court has demanded against R., his brother, certain land, and in which the said R. has no right, as W. says, because he is a bastard born before the marriage of their mother; and since it does not belong to my court to inquire concerning bastardy, I send these unto you, commanding you that you do in the court christian that which belongs to you; and when the suit is brought to its proper end before you, inform me by your letter what has been done before you concerning it.

"Witness, etc."

Your Lordships will observe the form of this writ, how precisely it puts the objection against the heir's [523] title upon the very rule of the English law, "that he was born before the marriage of his mother;" by which it is necessarily implied that the marriage of the parents had subsequently taken place. Now, if the question had been put generally on the fact whether any marriage had taken place, or upon the legality of such marriage as had taken place, to such a question of general bastardy. as it is called, the bishop would have found no difficulty in answering, for the answer to that question would have been purely and exclusively determinable by the spiritual law. But as the canon law, on the one hand, held the subsequent marriage of the parents made the ante-natus legitimate, and as the common law of England, on the other hand, held that such ante-natus was not legitimate for the purpose of inheriting land in England, if the question had gone in the general form the answer of the bishop would have certified such ante-natus to have been legitimate. The law, therefore, framed the question in the precise form contained in the writ, namely, a question of special bastardy, proving thereby how closely, and with how much jealousy, the law adhered to the rule of descent before pointed out. Now the question so framed did obviously place the bishop in extreme difficulty in making answer thereto; a difficulty which was very much increased by the constitution of Pope Alexander the Third, which had been issued very recently before the time when Glanville wrote, viz., in the sixth of King Henry the Second; by which constitution (in part set out by Lord Coke, 2d Institute, 96) it was ordained "that children born before solemnization of matrimony, where matrimony followed, should be as legitimate to inherit unto their ancestors as those that are born after matrimony;" [524] and it is upon the subject of this constitution that Glanville is commenting in his 15th chapter, when he says. "Upon this subject it hath been made a question, whether, if any one was begotten or born before the father married the mother, such son is the lawful heir if the father afterwards married his mother. Although, indeed, the canons and the Roman laws consider such son as the lawful heir, yet according to the law and custom of this realm, he shall in no measure be supported as heir in his claim upon the inheritance, nor can he demand the inheritance by the law of the realm. But yet if a question should arise whether such son was begotten or born before marriage, or after, it should, as we have observed, be discussed before the ecclesiastical judge, and of his decision he shall inform the king or his justices; and thus, according to the judgment of the court christian concerning the marriage, namely, whether the demandant was born or begotten before marriage contracted or after, the king's court shall supply that which is necessary in adjudging or refusing the inheritance, respecting which the dispute is, so that by its decision the demandant shall either obtain such inheritance or lose his claim."

The bishops being placed in the difficulty of this conflictus legum, by reason of the precise form of the king's writ, at length, at the parliament holden at Merton in the twentieth of Henry the Third, the statute was framed which will be found to have a strong and direct application to the present question. That statute has not upon the original roll the title prefixed thereto, upon which observations were made at your Lordships' bar, that it showed the intention of the law to have [525] been no more than to declare the personal status of those who are described in such statute. In the edition of the statutes published under the commission from the crown there is no other than the general title, "Provisiones de Merton;" and no more argument can justly be built upon the title prefixed in some editions of the statutes than upon the marginal notes against its different sections. That statute or provision of Merton runs thus; viz.,

"To the king's writ of bastardy, whether any one being born before matrimony may inherit in like manner as he that is born after matrimony, all the bishops answered, that they would not nor could not make answer to that writ, because it was directly against the common order of the church; and all the bishops instanted the lords that they would consent that all such as were born afore matrimony should be legitimate as well as they that be born after matrimony, as to the succession to inheritance, forasmuch as the church accepteth such as legitimate; and all the earls and barons with one voice answered, that they would not change the laws of the realm which hitherto had been used and approved."

It is manifest from Bracton, who lived and wrote in the time of Henry the Third, that shortly after the statute of Merton this question of special bastardy ceased to be sent to the bishop, and became the subject of inquiry and determination in the king's courts. In book 5. c. 19. after stating the circumstances attending the statute of Merton, and also a subsequent council holden in the same year before the king, the archbishop, the bishops, earls, and barons, whose names [526] he gives, it is ordered, that the words in which the writ shall go to the bishop shall be, whether such a one was born before espousals or marriage, or after, and that the ordinary shall write back to our lord the king in the same words, without any evasion or subtilty; and he then states it was further ordered at that council, that for the reasons before given and of such common consent it may be in the election of our lord the king whether he will demand that inquisition to be taken before the ordinary or in his own court, because when the exception is properly taken, the answer ought not to be obscure; and accordingly it will be found by reference to the year books, that from the time of Edward the Third the distinction became settled, that general bastardy shall be tried by the ordinary, special bastardy shall be tried per pais. (See the various authorities collected in Viner's Abridgment, title Trial, Bastardy.)

My Lords, the extent of the dominions of the crown at the time of the passing of the statute of Merton demands particular attention. Normandy, Aquitaine, and Anjou were then under the allegiance of the king of England, and had been so at least from the commencement of the reign of Henry the First. Many of the nobles and other subjects of the king had large possessions both in England and in the countries beyond sea. Those born in Normandy, Aquitaine, or Anjou, (as also in subsequent periods of our history, those born in Guienne, Gascony, Calais, or Tournay, whilst under the actual dominion of the crown,) were natural-born subjects, and could inherit land in England. (Calvin's case, 7th Coke, 20 b.) Many of the very persons who attended at the coronation of Henry [527] the Third, the occasion on which the parliament met at Merton and the statute was passed, both bishops and earls and barons are known from history, and would so appear from their very names and titles, to have been of foreign lineage if not of foreign birth, and were, at all events, well acquainted with the rule of law which was then so strongly contested, yet notwithstanding the rule of the civil and the canon law prevailed both in Normandy, Aquitaine, and Anjou, by which the subsequent marriage makes the antenatus legitimate for all purposes and to all intents; and, notwithstanding the precise question then under discussion was whether this rule should govern the descent of land locally situate in England, or whether the old law and custom of England should still continue as to such land, under which the ante-natus was incapable to take land by descent, there is not the slightest allusion to any exception in the rule itself as to those born in the foreign dominions of the crown, but the language of the rule is in its terms general and universal as to the succession to land in England. The question is, whether, after the declaration made by that statute, one of the king's subjects, born in Normandy, or Aquitaine, or Anjou, under the circumstances supposed by your Lordships, could have inherited land in England. It is not so much a parallel case with the present,—it is the very case itself, and it seems impossible to contend that such would have been held to be the law. In the first place, there is no other form of any writ to the bishop than the old form given in Glanville and Bracton, which raises the express point whether the claimant was born or not before espousals and matrimony of his father and mother. And if the question was brought before a [528] jury, as afterwards became the course of proceeding, then there was no other than that precise issue which could be raised upon the record. Further, if the question was sent to the bishop, it must have been sent to the bishop of the diocese where the action was brought, that is, where the land was situate, and not to the bishop of the diocese where the party whose legitimacy is disputed was born, (see the Book of Assize 35, pl. 7,) which case seems not obscurely to indicate, that if the birth had been in France the trial would be still before the English bishop; for Skipwith, a judge of the Common Pleas, is made to say there, “you may carry your proofs before him in what place you please in England or from France.” Again, the contest above adverted to was a contest between the antient law and custom of England on the one hand, and the canon law on the other, which should prevail as to the hereditary succession to land in England. The canon and civil law being acknowledged and prevailing in England in all other respects, with the single exception of its application to the descent of land, the same canon and civil law prevailing in the foreign dominions of the crown generally, and without any exception, there seems, therefore, no reasonable or probable ground for the surmise of any intention in the law makers of that day, that, with the general refusal and repudiation of this rule of the civil and canon law as to the hereditary succession to land in England, there should be a tacit exception in favour of a claimant born beyond the seas. Again, the law and custom would rather seem to be one which applies to the land itself, and not to the person only of the claimant. According to an observation of Bracton, in the place above cited, when discussing the [529] very point of the exception on the ground of bastardy, he says, “that every kingdom hath its own customs, differing from those of others, for there may be one custom in the kingdom of England, and another in the kingdom of France, as to successions.” And it would be singular indeed, if any such exception existed, that neither Bracton, who wrote with so much diffuseness on this very question, at the time of this notable refusal of parliament to alter the law, nor the author of Fleta, nor any of the other early writers, should have left the slightest vestige of or allusion to such exception in the rule.

On the contrary, the observation of Lord Coke, 2 Inst., 98. although not made in any case in a court of law, proves in a manner which leaves no doubt what would have been the opinion of that great lawyer upon the point now under discussion, if it had arisen in his time. “Some have written,” he says, “that William the conqueror, being born out of matrimony, Robert his reputed father did afterwards marry Arlot his mother, and that thereby he had right by the civil and canon law; but that is contra legem Angliæ, as here it appeareth.” This is, in effect, saying, that although born in Normandy, and legitimated in Normandy by the subsequent marriage of his father and mother there, so that he could inherit land in Normandy, yet as to land in England he could not take it by descent, for the same would be the law of descent of a kingdom, and of the land within it. This is the very case now put to the Judges by your Lordships. It, therefore, appears to be the just conclusion from these premises, that the rule of descent to English land is, [530] that the heir must be born after actual marriage of his father and mother, in order to enable him to inherit; and that this is a rule of a positive, inflexible nature, applying to and inherent in the land itself which is the subject of descent, of the same nature and character as that rule which prohibited the descent of land to any but those who were of the whole blood of the last taker, or like the customs of gavelkind or borough English, which cause the land to descend in the one case to all the sons together, and in the other to the younger son alone.

And if such be, as it appears to us to be, the rule of law which governs the descent of land in England, without any exception either express or implied therein on the score of the place of birth of the claimant, it remains to consider whether by any doctrine of international law, or by the comity of nations, that rule is to be let in by which B. being held to be legitimate in his own country for all purposes must be considered as the heir at law in England.

The broad proposition contended for on the part of the plaintiff in error is, that legitimacy is a personal status to be determined by the law of the country which gives the party birth, and that when the law of that country has once pronounced him to be legitimate, he is by the comity of international law to be considered as legitimate in every other country also, and for every purpose; and it is then contended, that as by the Scotch law there is a presumptio juris et de jure, that under the circumstances supposed, the parents of B. were actually married to each other before the birth of B., so such presumption of the Scotch law by [531] which his legitimacy is effected must also be adopted and received to the same extent in the English Courts of Justice.

Now, there can be no doubt but that marriage, which is a personal contract, when entered into according to the rites of the country where the parties are domiciled and the marriage celebrated, would be considered and treated as a perfect and complete marriage throughout the whole of Christendom:

But it does not therefore follow, that with the adoption of the marriage contract the foreign law adopts also all the conclusions and consequences which hold good in the country where the marriage was celebrated.

That the marriage in question was not celebrated in fact until after the birth of B. is to be assumed from the form of the question. Indeed, except on that supposition, there would be no question at all. Does it follow then, that because the Scotch hold a marriage celebrated between the parents after the birth of a child to be conclusive proof of an actual marriage celebrated before, a foreign country which adopts the marriage as complete and binding as a contract of marriage must also adopt this consequence? No authority has been cited from any jurist or writer on the subject of the law of nations to that effect; nothing beyond the general proposition, that a party legitimate in one country is to be held legitimate all over the world. Indeed the ground upon which this conclusion of B.'s legitimacy is made by the Scotch law is not stated to us, and we have no right to assume any fact not contained in the question which your Lordships have proposed to us. We may however observe, that, in the [532] course of the argument at your Lordships' bar, the ground has been variously stated upon which the laws of different countries have arrived at the same conclusion. It was asserted, that, by the law of Scotland, the subsequent marriage is not to be taken to be the marriage itself, but only evidence, though conclusive in its nature, of the marriage prior to the birth of B.,—that the canon law rests the legitimacy of the son born before such marriage upon a ground totally different, viz., that, having been born illegitimate, he is made legitimate—legitimus— by the subsequent marriage, by a positive rule of law, on account of the repentance of his parents; whereas by the Scotch law a marriage previous to his birth is conclusively presumed, so that he always was legitimate, and his parents had nothing to repent of. Pothier, on the other hand, (Contrat de Marr. Part V. ch. 2. art. 2.,) when he speaks of the effect of a subsequent marriage in legitimating children born before it, disclaims the authority of the canon law, nor does he mention any fiction of an antecedent marriage, but rests the effect upon the positive law of the country. He first instances the custom of Troyes: "Les enfans nés hors mariage de soluto et solutâ, puis que le père et la mère s'espousent, l'un l'autre succèdent et viennent à partage avec les autres enfans, si aucuns y a;" and then adds, "that it is a common right received throughout that kingdom."

Now, it could never be contended by any jurist that the law of England, with respect to the succession of land in England, would be bound to adopt a positive law of succession like that which holds in France, the distinction being so well known between laws that relate to personal status and personal contracts, and those [533] which relate to real and immoveable property, for which it is unnecessary to make reference to any other authority than that of Dr. Story, in his admirable Commentaries on the Conflict of Laws (see sections 430. et seq., where all the authorities are brought together); and if such positive law is not upon any principle to be introduced to control the English law of descent, what ground is there for the introduction into the English law of descent, not only of the contract of marriage observed in another country, which is admitted to be adopted, but also of a fiction with respect to the time of the marriage, that is, in effect, of a rule of evidence which the foreign country thinks it right to hold?

But admitting for the sake of argument, and we are not called upon to give our opinion on that point, that B., legitimate in Scotland, is to be taken to be legitimate all over the world, the question still recurs, whether, for the purpose of constituting an heir to land in England, something more is not necessary to be proved on his part than such legitimacy? And if we are right in the grounds on which we have rested the first point, one other step is necessary, namely, to prove that he was born after an actual marriage between his parents; and if this be so, then, upon the distinction admitted by all the writers on international law, the lex loci rei sitae must prevail, not the law of the place of birth.

My Lords, in the course of the discussion some stress appears to have been placed on the argument, that if B. had died before A. the intestate, leaving a child, such child might have inherited to A., tracing through his legitimate parent; and then it was asked, if the child might inherit, why might not the parent himself inherit? But the answer to that supposed case appears [534] to be, that if the parent be not capable of inheriting himself, he has no heritable blood which he can transmit to his child, so that the child could not under the assumed facts have inherited, and the question, therefore, becomes in truth the same with that before us. The case supposed would be governed by the old acknowledged rule of descent,—"Qui doit inheriter al père doit inheriter al fitz."

My Lords, the two decided cases that have been relied upon in the course of argument, that of Sheddon v. Patrick, and that of the Strathmore Peerage, do not, upon consideration, create any real difficulty. Those cases decide no more than that no one can inherit without having the personal status of legitimacy, a point upon which all agree; but they are of no force to establish the main point in dispute in this case, viz., that such personal status is sufficient of itself to enable the claimant to succeed as heir to land in England.

Upon the whole, in reporting to your Lordships, as the opinion of the Judges, "that B. is not entitled to the real property as the heir of A.," I am bound at the same time to state, that, although they agree in the result, they are not to be considered as responsible for all the grounds and reasons on which I have endeavoured to support and explain such opinion.

Lord Chancellor.—The subject upon which your Lordships have had the opinion of the Judges is of so much importance, and the learning contained in that able opinion is of such a description, as, in my opinion, to require further consideration. I shall, therefore, propose to your Lordships that the further consideration of the case be postponed.

[535] Lord Brougham.—I perfectly agree in opinion with my noble and learned friend. It is quite impossible to express more strongly than I desire to do the obligations which I think your Lordships and the bar are under to the learned Judges for the very able, elaborate, and lucid opinion they have given.

It is perhaps enough to say, respecting this opinion of the learned Judges, that in a case which has undergone argument in every form for somewhere about twelve years past, both in the sister kingdom and here,—first in the different courts of Westminster Hall, and next at your Lordships' bar,—upon which the learned Judges in the courts below, upon former occasions, in deciding the question submitted to them, and the learned Judges here, in assisting your Lordships, have given their opinions, and discussed the points,—nevertheless, at the eleventh hour as it were, and at the very end of this long-continued discussion, very great new light, if I may express it, has been thrown upon the question by the reasonings of the learned

Judges, and very important additions have been made by the arguments to-day to those arguments and that learning which had been brought to bear upon that question in its former shape, in your Lordships' House, in Westminster Hall, and in the courts of Scotland.

Under these circumstances it is not for me to say that the opinion, or rather the leaning of opinion, which it is well known to your Lordships I formerly expressed, is not materially altered by the quite new form in which the argument is now placed. I am by no means prepared to state that I shall not, on reconsidering the reasons of the learned Judges now submitted, find a sufficient answer to the difficulties which formerly [536] pressed upon me, which I very fully stated to your Lordships, I think, in the year 1835.

Upon these grounds I entirely agree in thinking that the further consideration of this case ought to be postponed. I ought to add, that in the whole of the first part of the reasoning of the learned Judges I was prepared to agree. What I have doubted is the latter part of the reasoning. One thing has struck me, that, supposing your Lordships shall ultimately be of opinion that you ought to decide in favour of the defendant in error, and to affirm the judgment of the Court below, it will be absolutely necessary that the legislature should interfere, in order to allay the evils which will arise out of the conflict of law, respecting the personal status in the two parts of the kingdom.

Lord Brougham (10th August).—This was an ejectment brought to recover lands situated in Yorkshire; and a verdict being taken, subject to a special case for the opinion of the Court of King's Bench, (from which the record came,) with leave to either party to turn it into a special verdict, it came before this House by writ of error, and was twice argued; first in 1830, when the Judges attended and gave their opinion through the Chief Baron (Sir William Alexander); and again in 1838, when your Lordships also had the assistance of the Judges, who have now given their opinion, through the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. The question raised by the special verdict, and argued upon these several occasions, is this, whether a person born in Scotland of parents domiciled there and married there, but after his birth, and who, by the law of Scotland, [537] is legitimate in consequence of that subsequent marriage, can take real estate in England as heir. The Court below held, that he could not, and the Judges have all agreed in this opinion.

When, in 1835, I took the liberty of calling the attention of your Lordships to this question, I pointed out what appeared to me to have been material defects in the argument, both below and here, on the part of the defendant in error,—that is, in support of the judgment below. The learned and elaborate opinion last given by the Judges has made very valuable additions to the clear and able, though more succinct statement, given upon the former occasion. It is now for your Lordships finally to dispose of the case; and I deem it my duty to offer a few remarks upon the subject, on account of its great importance, and more especially of the bearing which the principles connected with it, and about to be recognized in your decision, must almost unavoidably leave upon other questions.

While I willingly acknowledge the great value of the assistance which we have received from the learned Judges upon this occasion, I feel convinced that there are several matters which still remain to be considered, and some difficulties to be got over, before we can with perfect confidence rely upon the conclusion at which they have arrived. But I shall rest satisfied with referring generally to the scope of the argument which I submitted to your Lordships upon the former occasion, 1835, and with observing that a considerable portion of it is left untouched by the present argument of the learned Judges; and that I, on the other hand, should find it not difficult to reach a conclusion the opposite of theirs, while I yet admitted a very large portion of [538] their positions. In the observations which I am about to offer upon their argument, I purposely abstain from any thing more than thus generally referring to its scope, as contrasted with that of the opposite reasoning. What I wish further now to state relates to the detail of their statement, and must be taken as independent of any general answer to it, for which I refer to what I before submitted to your Lordships.

The authorities cited by the learned Judges, especially in the earlier part of their opinion, do not seem conclusive; as, for example, Lord Coke's definition of heir, ex justis nuptiis procreatus, and the text in the Mirror, "that the law only taketh him to be a son whom the marriage proveth to be so." These and other authorities only prove the dependence on and connexion of legitimacy with marriage, or of inheritable quality with marriage, which in no part of the argument ever could have been denied. The text in Glanville seems at first to take the distinction between legitimacy generally or absolutely, and legitimacy by being born in lawful wedlock, as connected with right to inherit; for it says, "neither a bastard, nor any person not born in lawful wedlock, can be an heir." But in a subsequent chapter the writ is given, and that sets forth the denial by the demandant of the tenant's right, because he is a bastard, born before marriage of the parents, which seems to indicate that the marriage was required to precede the birth, only in order to negative the bastardy. The writ indeed adds, "that it does not belong to the temporal court to inquire concerning bastardy, wherefore it is sent to the court christian."

It is said that the law frames the writ for the purpose [539] of preventing the court christian from answering the question according to the canon or civil law. Nevertheless, the bishops were not compelled by the exigency of the writ to confine themselves to the question, whether the party was born before or since the marriage, because the bastardy is introduced in terms, as well as the birth and marriage.

A council, however, was held soon after the parliament of Merton, and at that council it was directed that the writ should merely require the ordinary to examine the date of the birth, and, whether before or after marriage, to prevent, as is said "any evasion or subtilty" on the part of the ecclesiastical authorities.

The argument of the learned Judges upon the statute of Merton is deserving of great attention; nor can I at all go along with those who have contended, both in the Court below and here, that it is not a statute, but a refusal to make a statute. Such was the contention of the learned Chief Justice in the able argument which he held, when at the bar in the King's Bench, against the decision. This statute is only different from other statutes, inasmuch as it is in substance declaratory, and in form somewhat different from that of declaratory acts in modern times. It is a distinct declaration of what the law had ever been before the statute, and a refusal to alter it. But it is to be observed, that the bishops, in calling for the alteration, put their demand expressly on the ground, that ante-nati are legitimate by the canon law; and it is in consequence of their legitimacy that the bishops claim the recognition of their right to inherit. The barons only affirm that such ante-nati had no right of inheritance by the common law, without saying whether, by the common law, they [540] were legitimate or not,—though assuredly the common law is understood to be declared by the statute against their legitimacy universally and in all respects, as well as with respect to feudal inheritance. But I agree that it somewhat aids the views taken by the learned Judges, when we find that special bastardy ceased, from the time of the statute, to be tried by the bishop, and has ever since been tried per pais.

It may be remarked, that the proceeding appears, from the Grand Coustumier, c. 27., to have been a writ of bastardy general, directed to the ordinary; but the description of bastards there given is worthy of attention:—"Tous ceulx sont bastards qui sont engendres hors mariage;" and then immediately it goes on to say, "mais ceulx qui furent engendres devant le mariage, si le pere espouse depuis la mere, ils sont tenus legitimes." So that, apparently, though born de facto out of wedlock, they were, in contemplation of law, born within wedlock. It may be further observed, that Littleton, section 188., in treating of villenage, gives, as the reason why a bastard is quasi nullius filius, that he cannot be heir to any "pur ceo que il ne poit enheriter à nulluy."

The learned Judges object to the observations made at the bar upon the title prefixed to the chapter in question of the statute, namely, that this title showed the enactment only was intended to be a declaration of the personal status. "This title," say the learned Judges, "is not to be found in the original statute;" and they refer to the edition published by the Record Commission, where Provisiones de Merton is the only heading of the act; and they add "that no more argument can justly be built upon the title prefixed [541] in some editions, than upon the marginal notes against the different sections." If, however, the learned counsel at your Lordships' bar were led into any error in this matter, they had very high example in going astray, no less than that of the Court below, whence this writ of error is brought, and where, when the cause was first decided, one of the learned Judges (5 Barnewall and Cresswell, 453.) argued in support of the decision now under revision, on the ground of the heading or title. "We have no occasion," (says Mr. Justice Bayley,) "in order to answer the question, who is hæres?—we have no occasion to go beyond the statute, in order to answer that question; the title of it is, 'He is a bastard who is born before the marriage of his parents,' not restricting it to those born in England." For myself, I consider the assistance to be equally slender which the one argument and the other derives from this title, even supposing it to have been the one given by the legislature to the chapter of the act, which it appears not to have been; indeed, it could not have been, for no titles at all were put on statutes till the 11th Henry 7., as is said by Treby, Chief Justice, in Chance v. Adams; Hardwicke, 324.

I am inclined to regard, as the most important part of the argument of the learned Judges, their observations on the state of the crown dominions at the making of the statute. This point had been made in the Court below, but without much explanation, and not much dwelt upon. The Lord Chief Justice (Abbott) takes it, though only in general terms, yet quite intelligibly (5 Barnewall and Cresswell, 452). The learned Judges here have very carefully explained the argument, and [542] illustrated it by important remarks; they have contended that an ante-natus within the king's legiance, but born in Normandy, (which, by the way, had, for above thirty years before the statute, ceased to be English de facto, though it was not formally ceded till twenty-five years after,) Aquitaine, and other provinces where the civil law prevailed, could not have inherited lands in England under the statute,—chiefly because no exception is there made per expressum of such persons, although the connexion of the countries would naturally call the attention of the legislature to the case, and because no tacit or implied exception can be supposed in favour of the canon law for Norman subjects of the crown, when the express words of the act refuse to adopt the same canon law for English subjects of the crown. The silence of contemporary writers, as Bracton, and the author of Fleta, is very justly referred to in aid of the same conclusion. The other reasoning of the learned Judges on the passage of Bracton, and which, as well as the reference to the customs of gavelkind and borough English, was urged below, seems there to have met with a sufficient answer in the argument at the bar;—that those authorities apply to English parties, and those customs to the rule of succession, none of which matters are disputed; so that the authorities may well stand with the opposite argument. No doubt, if the fact of being born within lawful wedlock be as much a necessary quality to the character of heir by the custom of England, as the fact of being youngest heir is to being heir by the custom of borough English manors,—if that fact, of being born within lawful wedlock, can only be judged of according to the English law, and admits of as little dispute as the fact [543] of being eldest or youngest child,—there is, and there must be, an end of the question; but unless these things are so, the cases put have no useful application to the one in hand.

So of the proposition repeatedly affirmed below, and now largely stated by the learned Judges here, that the law or custom is something inherent in the land, a quality of the land itself, as it were, and not of the claimant. This of course would, in one sense, decide the question, but then it would beg it also. In any other sense it leaves the question untouched, for the dispute would still arise, what description of person is that to which the descendible quality of the land carries it?

The argument drawn by the learned Judges from the observation of Lord Coke, in the 2d Institute, 98, on the title of William the Conqueror, had been used in the Court below; 5 Barnewall and Cresswell, 448. The passage is not very clear. But when Lord Coke says, that some held William the Conqueror to have had right by the civil and canon law, in consequence of the subsequent marriage of his parents, he is, I presume, supposed to mean right to the crown of England as nearest maternal relation to Edward the Confessor, which he certainly was, being grandson of his maternal uncle Richard of Normandy. That this could give him no right to the exclusion of the male branch represented by Edgar Atheling, the Confessor's great-nephew, and who, being grandson of his elder brother Edmund Ironsides, had indeed a title paramount, that of the Confessor himself, is quite clear. And although the Conqueror appears to have called himself rex hereditarius in some charters, historians and antiquaries are agreed that [544] this could only mean heir under the supposed will of the Confessor; for the only dispute as to his title that has ever been raised is, whether he took by the sword or as conqueror by purchase, (Spelman's Glossary, vide Conquestor), under the supposed will or gift of the Confessor, about the existence of which much controversy has always been held. As to his taking as heir by inheritance, no person has ever asserted his title; and if he took under the Confessor's gift or will, his legitimacy was really of as little importance as it was to the other and more secure title which he derived from his sword. If, indeed, Lord Coke, or rather those whom he refers to, for any reason supposed the male branch to be extinct, then we can understand the passage, always supposing that a mother's relatives could succeed; and in that case the passage might bear upon the argument; or it may bear upon it if we suppose Lord Coke puts the case hypothetically, or refers to some who did consider the male branch settled in Hungary extinct. Still this seems not very intelligible; for it is believed that Edward the Confessor had called them over as his end approached,—that his nephew Edward, the outlaw or exile, came back, and died here; but, wherever he died, it is quite certain that he left Edgar Atheling, his son, who was notoriously in England at the conquest, and was made to join in some proceedings to confirm William's title, and afterwards was engaged in an unsuccessful rebellion against him. The passage, therefore, is really not very easily explained, nor is any light thrown on it by the reference to the authorities cited: William of Malmesbury, B. III.; Ingulphus, lib. VI. cap. 19.; and the Grand Coustumier, cap. 27. The first of these, at the place referred to, [545] only says, that William's father married his mother,—aliquandiu justac uxoris loco habuit (scil. Arlottam); and the second reference (to Ingulphus) seems erroneous, for there are no books and chapters in Ingulphus, at least in any editions which we now have, or which are known ever to have existed; but all that he says of William (who was his patron, and of whom he writes largely, and in praise and defence,) is, that the Confessor, aware of Edgar's weakness, turned his thoughts towards William, taking into consideration "cognationem suam," an expression which he repeats afterwards. The text of the Grand Coustumier (which is the third reference) merely gives the law of bastardy and legitimation generally; nor can I see any reference to William's case in the Commentaries; though I will not undertake to say there may not be some such reference. In the text cited by Lord Coke there is certainly none, and in the Commentary I can find none; but the difficulties do not end here, because, even if Edgar were set aside for imbecility, still the Conqueror was not next heir, for he was only the Confessor's cousin-german by the mother once removed (Welch nephew, as we say, or nephew a la mode de Bretagne, as the French have it; and this accounts for some writers calling the Confessor cousin and some uncle to the Conqueror); whereas Edgar's sister, afterwards married to Malcolm in Scotland, was his great niece by his elder brother. And, moreover, we have now been all along supposing that the connexion of William with the Confessor, through the mother of the latter only, made no difference; whereas, suppose the whole paternal relations had been extinguished, it is difficult to see how upon any feudal principle any person could [546] inherit who was not of the blood of the English royal family. William's only connexion with England was, that his aunt had been married to an English king; consequently it seems quite impossible to understand how he ever could be considered as having right, even on the supposition that the lawful course of succession was by nomination and selection from among the whole members of a given royal family. Subject to these observations, we may perhaps consider this passage in Lord Coke as some kind of indication of his opinion, always supposing the passage to be correct. But there can be little doubt that these observations make it exceedingly uncertain whether Lord Coke ever wrote it as we now have it,—in a work too, be it observed, which was not published in his lifetime. If there were no such uncertainty hanging over the passage its importance to the argument would be undeniable; it would amount to neither more nor less than Lord Coke's opinion upon the case at bar. But it is probable that some such considerations as those to which I have been adverting, operated in preventing any attention being paid to this authority in the Court below, where it was cited, but occasioned no remark, either at the bar or from the bench.

The learned Judges refer to the illustration drawn from a person supposed to claim through the ante-natus, he having predeceased his father; and they hold this to be disposed of by the opinion given on the principal case or question, inasmuch as, if incapable of inheriting himself, he could not transmit heritable blood to his issue; and, generally speaking, no doubt it would be so, although contrary to Lord Coke's supposed opinion as to issue of aliens inheriting to each other collaterally, it [547] has been decided that a brother may succeed to a brother, the only connexion of the two being through an alien father who had no inheritable blood, (Collingwood v. Pace, 1 Levinz, 59,) where the opinion generally ascribed, and, among others, by Blackstone, to Lord Coke, is denied by the majority of the Judges to be his, and by none of them affirmed to be so. But a nearer case to the present may be put, where, by the law of the country, as in Scotland and on the Continent, legitimation per subsequens matrimonium is admitted, it seems that the authorities are agreed in holding that if the ante-natus dies before the marriage of his parents, leaving lawful issue, the issue shall take as heir to his grandfather, though he must claim through a person who lived and died illegitimate.

Nor is this case of one who never could himself be heir, transmitting inheritable blood to his issue, confined to those countries and that law of legitimation. We have an example in our own law in the case of bastard eigne, and it is worth while to consider how this is treated, though I know not that it materially impeaches the general conclusion to which the argument of the learned Judges leads them, unless by showing how entirely the law proceeds upon the supposition that it is his bastardy, and his bastardy only, which excludes the ante-natus from succession.

Littleton, in sections 399 and 400, says, that the issue of the bastard eigne who, having entered, died seised, shall have the land, by reason of a colour to enter as heir to his father; "for by the law of holy church he is mulier, albeit by the law of the land he is bastard."

[548] Lord Coke, in commenting upon the words of Littleton, that in such a case the mulier puisne is "without remedy," says, that the descent from the bastard eigne not only takes away the entry, like other descents which leave the party to his action, but makes the issue of the bastard become lawful heir, adding that even if the mulier be within age he is barred, because the bastard's issue is become in judgment of law lawful heir. "For the law," says he, "doth prefer legitimation before the privilege of infancy." Collateral heirs too are barred as well as the mulier, and the bastard becoming a monk professed, which is a civil death, has the same effect; his issue succeeds during the natural life of the bastard, and the legitimate heir is barred. In the 2d Institute, Lord Coke, as a confirmation of the doctrine, gives the record of a judgment in the 18th Edward the First, showing that the mulier cannot have an assize of mort d'ancestor, and upon the ground that the bastard eigne has entered as heir; and the reason assigned by Lord Coke is that the bastard is accounted of the blood with the mulier puisne. (2d Institute, 97.) But in Coke, Littleton, 244 b, he puts the case which has been referred to from the law of Scotland and the Continent, of the bastard eigne dying in his father's lifetime, and, leaving issue, this son enters as heir to the grandfather, and dies seised; the mulier is barred. "The descent," says Lord Coke, "binds him." Now this cannot be from the laches of the mulier during the bastard's life, for, by the supposition, nothing had been done by the bastard to make the mulier claim, nor could he claim, for the grandfather was still alive. The laches was in the grandson's life; so that here the reason given [549] for the law fails, viz., that it is unjust to treat a person all his life as legitimate, and bastardize him after his death; for here the ante-natus never was treated as legitimate at all; he lived and died a bastard, yet his issue claiming through him who had no inheritable blood, entered as heir to the common ancestor, and, by dying seised, barred the lawful issue. Although, however, this consideration somewhat contradicts the answer given by the learned Judges to the argument at the bar, it yet furnishes another answer to that argument, by showing that if it proves any thing, it proves too much, since, in the case of bastard eigne, there is no question whatever of his right being excluded in the common case, (of English marriage, birth, and domicile,) unless where there has been an entry and dying seised without counter-claim.

The short observation made by the learned Judges on the cases of Sheddan v. Patrick [see p. 504], and of the Strathmore Peerage [see p. 504], appears hardly to be satisfactory. "These cases," it is said, "only decide that no one can inherit without the personal status of legitimacy, and do not show what is alone in dispute, that such personal status is sufficient ground for claiming English real estate as heir." It appears that these cases establish somewhat more than the first of those positions, and, although they do not decide the second, they appear to give it much countenance. They show that the quality, whatever it is, that must be possessed by a claimant, in order that he may take land or honours in Scotland, is given to or withholden from him according to the law, not of Scotland, where the [550] real estate lies, but of the country where his birth and his father's marriage and domicile were. Whether that quality be called legitimacy, or any thing else, is not material; nor is it material whether the quality is required in relation to the property by some positive statutory enactment of the country where it lies, or only by the common law of that country, or by some statute (like that of Merton) which declares what the common law always has been. The land in Scotland is impressed with a particular quality, that of being descendible to the ante-nati where the parents have intermarried; it is of such a nature as not to descend upon the mulier puise, but upon the bastard eigne; while, in England, it is of such a nature as to descend to the mulier, and not to the bastard. The one quality is as firmly fixed in the soil of Scotland, as the other is in that of England. Then what have the Courts, and what has this House, decided in those celebrated cases? That notwithstanding the inherent descendible quality, and notwithstanding the general rule of the lex loci rei sitae, so much relied on by the learned Judges, both below and here, through their whole argument, the law of the country where the property is must bend to the law of the domicile, marriage, and birth; and because the latter law excludes ante-nati from legitimacy, they shall be excluded from the succession to which the former law calls them. The Scotch common law says, "Let the land go to the ante-natus, such is its descendible quality." The English common law says, "Let the land not go to the ante-natus." The question, and the only question, is, have we a right to look beyond the fact, or to ask any but one question, namely, [551] whether a person is ante-natus or post-natus, whether his parents were married or not at his birth? Are we bound by the simple fact, or may we look to the view taken of it by the law of the foreign country to which the claimant and his parents belonged? The decided cases say, in the instance of Scotland, that we may and must look to the foreign law; that the subsequent marriage is immaterial for succession in Scotland, if it is immaterial for legitimation in the claimant's country; and the question is, whether, according to the principle of these decisions, it is possible to exclude all reference to the foreign law, where the same kind of question arises as to English succession? It is very possible that the principle of the cases may be inapplicable; this may, possibly, be proved by argument, but it can hardly be said to have been proved by the only remark made on these cases in the statement of the learned Judges; and this scanty discussion of those cases is the more to be lamented, because, in deciding the present question, the Court below expressly referred to this House as the place where Sheddan v. Patrick and the Strathmore Peerage would meet with ample attention as to their bearing upon this argument.

The learned Judges have given no opinion upon the question, whether or not a person legitimated by subsequent marriage in a country where that law prevails is, therefore, legitimate all the world over; nor, perhaps, was it incumbent on them to argue this for the purpose of answering the question put to them by the House. They contend that the statute, or rather the common law recognized and declared by the statute, requires something beyond mere legitimacy to make an [552] heir to English real estate. They agree with the Court below that legitimacy alone is not sufficient; it must be, as was there said, (5 Barn. and Cress. 454,) legitimacy sub modo, legitimacy and being born in wedlock. Consequently they appear plainly to admit that a person may be legitimate for all other purposes, and yet incapable of taking land by descent; that we ought not to say "a man's eldest lawful son is his heir at law" but his eldest lawful son, if born in lawful wedlock.

In another case, Munro v. Munro, (1 Robinson's Appeal Cases, 492,) which has been decided to-day, we held here, as it had been held in the Court below, that a party is entitled to take real estate by descent as legitimate according to the law of the country where it lies, who is bastard by the law established in the country of the birth and marriage. In the courts which administer the law, (the law of England in the case put,) would the party be considered as bastard or as legitimate, where any right unconnected with real property was claimed? If bastard, then the same person is legitimate in one country and not in another; bastard where born, and legitimate where the parents are domiciled; though some of the Judges, with whom we agreed in that case, held this to be a solecism in law, considering it clear that the status must be everywhere the same. If legitimate, then it follows that the question of personal status depends on the law of foreign countries, and that the law is imported into England as to the consequences of the marriage contract, although the lex loci contractus alone regulates the constitution of that contract.

[553] But, which way soever we may hold as to these questions, the principles of the two decided cases referred to are quite consistent with that of the last-mentioned case decided to-day. They are not so easily reconciled to the judgment at present before your Lordships.

Having stated what occurs to me upon the arguments of the learned Judges, again expressing my high sense of the service which they have rendered by the great attention bestowed upon the subject, I rest satisfied with intimating my opinion upon the difficulties which still beset the question, and the anomalies likely to arise from the future application of the principles countenanced in the decision; and though I shall not move your Lordships to give judgment for the defendant in error, if my noble and learned friends move, I shall offer no opposition.

Lord Chancellor.—I was not in your Lordships' House when this case was first argued, but I was present at the argument when the learned Judges were present, and I gave my attention to the opinion expressed by the Lord Chief Justice, and I entirely concur in that opinion. I am extremely satisfied with the ground upon which they put it; because they put the question on a ground which avoids the difficulty which seems to surround the question, of interfering with those general principles peculiar to the law of England, and which seem at first sight to interfere with the decisions to which the Courts have come. Under these circumstances, as my noble and learned friend does not move the judgment for the defendant [554] in error, I move, that judgment be entered for the defendant in error.

Ordered, That the said Judgment given in the said Court of King's Bench be and the same is hereby affirmed; and that the record be remitted, to the end such proceeding may be had thereupon, as if no such writ of error had been brought into this House.

[555] FROM THE COURT OF CHANCERY.

The Right Honourable CHARLES PHILIP Earl of Hardwicke,—Appellant;
Sir CHARLES EURWICKE DOUGLAS,—Respondent [30th July and 10th August 1840].

[Moss' Dig. xv. 400. S.C. 7 Cl. and F. 795; and, in Court below, sub nom. Douglas v. Leake, 5 L.J. Ch. 25. Cited in Lee v. Delane, 1850, 4 De G. and S. 5.]

Mr. Charles Yorke by his will, after giving several legacies, gives the residue of his estate to trustees, in trust to pay the income to his wife for life, and after her death to transfer the residue to Sir Charles Douglas. By a codicil, after giving specific and pecuniary legacies, there is the following clause:—"All the rest and residue of my property not herein-before (or by my will or any other codicil) disposed of, I give and bequeath to my nephew Charles Philip Yorke, and to Sir Charles Eurwicke Douglas, Knight, their executors, administrators, and assigns, after the death of my wife, equally to be divided between them.”—Held, that the residue of the testator’s property passed under the residuary clause of the codicil, and revoked the gift of the residue bequeathed by the will;—Lord Lyndhurst and Lord Brougham concurring; the Lord Chancellor dissentiente, and being of opinion that nothing passed under the residuary clause of the codicil, the whole of the residuary property being disposed of by the will.

The Right Honourable Charles Philip Yorke, by his will dated the 19th of April 1827, which was attested by three witnesses, after bequeathing to his wife the sum of £500, to be paid to her within six calendar months next after his decease, and the use of either his house in Bruton Street, London, or at Bon-[556]-ningtons in Hertfordshire, together with the furniture belonging to it, for her life, directed that the whole of the sum of £12,000, in pursuance of a power given him for charging his brother Lord Hardwicke’s estates with that sum, should be raised and paid to his executors as soon as conveniently might be after the decease and failure of male issue of Lord Hardwicke, and that it should be considered as part of his general personal estate. The will then proceeds as follows :

“ And I give and bequeath the said sum of £12,000 so herein-before charged by me upon the estates of the said Philip Earl of Hardwicke as aforesaid, and also all my leasehold estates in Bruton Street and at Bonningtons aforesaid, or elsewhere; and all my monies, securities for money, stock in the public or government funds or annuities, household goods, furniture, plate, linen, china, pictures, prints, books, goods, chattels, and other personal estate and effects, whatsoever and wheresoever; and all my estate, right, title, and interest therein and thereto respectively; but subject nevertheless and without prejudice to the bequests herein-before contained and made unto or in favour of my said wife Harriet Yorke for her life and otherwise as aforesaid; and also subject to the payment of my just debts, and funeral and testamentary expenses, and such legacies as I may hereafter give or bequeath by any codicil or codicils to this my will, unto my said dear wife Harriet Yorke, and my excellent friends the aforesaid Charles William Manningham, Sir Edward Hyde East, William Martin Leake, and Thomas Atkinson, and their executors, administrators, and assigns, upon the trusts, and to and for the intents and purposes herein-after [557] expressed and declared of and concerning the same; that is to say, upon trust that they the said Harriet Yorke, Charles William Manningham, Sir Edward Hyde East, William Martin Leake, and Thomas Atkinson, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the executors, administrators, and assigns of such survivor, do and shall forthwith, or as soon after my decease as they, she, or he shall think proper or expedient, make sale and dispose of such parts of my said leasehold and residuary personal estates and effects respectively as are or shall be in their nature saleable; and collect, get in, and receive such parts thereof as are not or shall not be in their nature saleable; and do and shall lay out and invest the monies to arise from such sale or sales, and so to be collected and received as aforesaid, in their, her, or his names or name, in some or one of the public stocks or funds, or in or upon real or government securities in England, (with full power to alter, vary, and transpose such stocks, funds, and securities, or any other stocks, funds, or securities, subject to the trusts of this my will, from time to time, at their, his, or her discretion,) and do and shall stand and be possessed of and interested in the said stocks, funds, and securities; and also of and in all such part and parts of my said residuary personal estate and effects as shall consist of stocks, funds, or securities at my death, and every of them respectively, upon the trusts, for the intents and purposes, and under and subject to the provisoes and declarations herein-after declared or expressed of and concerning the same, that is to say, upon trust during the life of my said wife Harriet Yorke, to receive and pay to her, the said Harriet Yorke, or permit and [558] suffer her to retain and keep, to and for her own use and benefit, all the dividends, interest, and annual proceeds of or to arise from the said several stocks, funds, and securities, trust monies and premises, and every of them, and every part thereof respectively, when and as such dividends, interest, and annual proceeds shall from time to time become due and payable; and from and after the decease of my said wife Harriet Yorke, upon trust to assign, transfer, and pay all the said stocks, funds, and securities, trust monies and premises, and every of them, and every part thereof respectively, unto my natural son Charles Eurwicke Douglas, (wishing him to use the name of Eurwicke only,) his executors, administrators, and assigns, for his and their own absolute use and benefit, in case he the said Charles Eurwicke Douglas shall be living at my death, and shall then have attained, or shall afterwards live to attain, the age of twenty-five years, or be married, with the previous consent of my said wife Harriet Yorke, during her life, or after her decease, with the consent of the said Charles William Manningham, Sir Edward Hyde East, William Martin Leake, and Thomas Atkinson, or the survivors or survivor of them, his executors or administrators."

The testator then proceeded to dispose of his residuary property, in case the respondent had died in his lifetime, or under the age of twenty-five, without having been married with consent, to (the appellant) his nephew Charles Philip Yorke, in case he should be living at his death, with divers contingent limitations over in case of his death; and appointed Mrs. Yorke executrix, and the other trustees executors, of his will.

[559] By deed poll, dated the 3d May 1827, subject to a power of revocation therein contained, after reciting that he had transferred into the names of trustees £4655 7s. Od. new 4 per cent. annuities, £500 4 per cent. annuities, £3529 8s. 3d. 3 per cent. reduced annuities, £1600 3 per cent. annuities, and £40 long annuities, it was declared that they should stand possessed of the same, upon trust to pay the dividends to the testator for life, and after his decease to transfer the same to the respondent in case he should attain the age of twenty-five, or be married with consent.

By deed poll, endorsed on the last-mentioned deed poll, dated the 30th November 1832, the testator, after reciting that the £40 long annuities had been sold, and the proceeds invested in £1142 17s. 2d. reduced 3½ per cent. annuities in the names of the trustees, and that he had since invested £664 17s. 7d. 3½ per cent. annuities in the names of the trustees, with the intention that the same should be held upon the same trusts as the bank annuities within mentioned, but that no declaration of the trusts thereof in writing had been made, revoked the trusts of the within-written deed poll declared concerning all the stocks and funds then vested in the names of the trustees, and declared that the trustees should stand possessed thereof in trust for the testator, his executors, administrators, and assigns.

By a settlement, dated the 22d of December 1832, made in contemplation of a marriage, which was afterwards had, between the respondent and Mary Ann Des Vœux, the testator vested in the names of trustees the several sums of £5320 4s. 7d. new 3½ per cent. annuities, £1600 3 per cent. consolidated annuities, £3529 8s. 3d. 3 per cent. annuities, £500 4 per cent. [560] annuities, and £1142 17s. 2d. 3½ per cent. annuities; and covenanted, that his heirs or executors should, after the decease of himself and Mrs. Yorke, pay to the trustees of the settlement £10,000, upon trust that they should stand possessed of the several stocks and £10,000, for the benefit of the husband and wife for their lives, and after their decease for the benefit of the issue of the marriage. Miss Des Vœux's fortune was £7000, and was put, into settlement.

On the 1st of May 1883, Mr. Yorke made a codicil to his will, attested by three witnesses, which had been prepared by his solicitors, whereby he not only confirmed the charge of £12,000, mentioned in his will, upon the property specified in his will; but likewise charged all his brother's estates which he had power to charge with the payment of that sum, and directed that it should not be raised during Mrs. Yorke's life, provided interest at the rate of 4 per cent. was punctually paid. He directed that £5000, part of the charge of £12,000, should be paid, after the death of Mrs. Yorke, to the trustees named in the respondent's marriage settlement, in part satisfaction of his covenant for payment of £10,000; and directed that the remainder should be paid out of his general personal estate; that £2000 should be paid to Thomas Atkinson and the respondent, upon certain trusts; and that £5000, residue of the sum of £12,000, should not be raised if any son or grandson of his late brother, Sir Joseph Sydney Yorke, should be entitled in possession to the estates charged therewith, and that they should be altogether discharged from the payment of that portion; and that if the £12,000 had been raised during Mrs. Yorke's lifetime, or after her decease, then he [561] directed, that in the event of such son or grandson of Sir Joseph Sydney Yorke being so entitled as aforesaid, that the said sum of £5000 should be applied by his trustees towards the discharge of any incumbrances affecting the same estates, or in the purchase of other property, to be settled in the same manner as the estates charged; and he "ratified and confirmed his said will in every other respect whatsoever."

On the following day Mr. Yorke made another codicil to his will, dated 2d May 1833, which commences as follows:—"This is a codicil of specific and pecuniary legacies, to be also added to my will." By this codicil he desires that his body may be opened, or that a surgeon should be employed to perform such short and decisive operation upon it as might ensure his being really dead, and that for his trouble he should be paid £10 upon the spot; and desires that he may be buried at Wimpole, as near as may be to his dear and lamented brother Sir Joseph Sydney Yorke. He added the name of Sir Charles Eurwicke Douglas to the number of his executors, and bequeathed to such of them as should act the sum of £20 for mourning. To several relations he gave pecuniary legacies, to be paid to such of them as should be living at Mrs. Yorke's death; amongst the number is a legacy of £100 to the appellant. The testator then bequeathed several small annuities to different persons, to be paid half-yearly; the first payment to be made on the first usual quarter-day that might happen after his decease; and directs, that as they should respectively cease, they should fall into and become part of his personal estate and its residue. After bequeathing certain gilt plate given to him by his constituents, and gilt candlesticks which he had [562] added to it, and certain silver inkstands and candlesticks which came to him as secretary-at-war, and pictures of Lord Chancellors Hardwicke and Somers and of Sir J. S. Yorke, and crayon drawings by his mother, and his maps, plans, and charts, with his Egyptian and hieroglyphical engravings, drawing books, and tracts, and all his classical and other books relating to ancient literature, (except duplicates, which he gave to Sir. C. E. Douglas,) upon trust, for the possessor of Wimpole of his name and blood, to be used and enjoyed in the nature of heir-looms, and after desiring his wife, after his decease, to dispose of the diamonds, jewels, and trinkets which came from his family, after her decease to the future wife of the appellant, or to his niece, or to one or more of the wives of his nephews, as she might prefer, and after giving an antique ring, which belonged to his grandfather Johnson, to his eldest nephew, and a broad gold ring with a motto to Sir E. H. East, and that with a scarabaeus and title of Thothmos of Egyptian pebble to W. M. Leake, and mourning rings to various other persons, and to servants who had lived three years with him two years wages and mourning, he gives all his swords and other arms to Sir C. E. Douglas, together with his gold watch, chain, and seals, and the sum of £100, to be paid to him as soon as convenient after his decease. Then follows the following clause: "All the rest and residue of my property, not herein-before (or by my will or any other codicil) disposed of, I give and bequeath to my nephew Charles Philip Yorke, and to Sir Charles Eurwicke Douglas, Knight, their executors, administrators, and assigns, after the death of my said dear wife, equally to be divided between them; and I leave it at the option of [563] Sir Charles Eurwicke Douglas to assume or not the name of Eurwicke singly, or to bear it as at present, without alteration. Signed by me, C. P. YORKE. May 21. 1833."

On the 13th March 1834, the testator, Mr. Yorke, died without issue, leaving his brother the Earl of Hardwicke, since deceased, and his nephew (the appellant) next heir presumptive to the earldom, and to the estates upon which the sum of £12,000 was charged.

Shortly after Mr. Yorke's death, William Martin Leake, Thomas Atkinson, and the respondent duly proved his will and codicils, with the usual power to the other executors likewise to prove them, when they should think fit; and the personal estate was ascertained to be of considerable amount and value, greatly exceeding what was necessary to pay and satisfy his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and the legacies and annuities which he had bequeathed.

On the 4th of July 1834 the respondent filed his bill in the Court of Chancery against William Martin Leake, Thomas Atkinson, Harriet Yorke, and the appellant, stating that he, the respondent, was entitled to the whole residuary personal estate after Mrs. Yorke's decease; and praying that the usual accounts might be taken, "and that the clear residue of the testator's personal estate and effects might be ascertained, and might be invested and secured upon the trusts of the said will, and that the rights and interests of the respondent, and of all other parties, in or to the same, might be ascertained and declared."

To this bill the several defendants appeared, and put in their answers. The appellant, in his answer, insisted [564] that he "was entitled to an equal share of the testator's residuary estate with the respondent, on the decease of Mrs. Yorke, under and by virtue of the second codicil."

The cause being at issue, and having come on to be heard on the 16th of November 1835 before the Master of the Rolls, on the 19th of November 1835 his Honour declared, "That, according to the true construction of the will of the Right Honourable Charles Philip Yorke, the testator in the pleadings of this cause named, and of the codicils thereto, dated respectively the first and second days of May 1833, the plaintiff" (respondent) "was entitled to the clear residue of the said testator's personal estate, subject to the life interest therein of the defendant, Harriet Yorke; and ordered that the plaintiff's bill should stand dismissed out of court, as against the defendant, Charles Philip Earl of Hardwicke," (the appellant,) with costs. The costs of the appellant, and all parties to the suit, to be paid out of the testator's personal estate.

Against this decree the Earl of Hardwicke, the present appellant, has brought this appeal.

Mr. Pemberton for the Appellant.—The question is, who is entitled to the residue? Between the date of the will and codicils several events had happened; Sir C. Douglas had attained twenty-five, had married with the consent of Mr. Yorke, who had made upon his marriage an irrevocable settlement, and Sir Joseph Yorke had died, all which circumstances might have induced the testator to have made a different disposition by his codicil from what he had made by his will. The [565] effect of the first codicil is to take £7000 out of the residuary clause, and to make his nephew share equally with Sir C. Douglas, in respect of the £12,000; by the second codicil he has given an equal share of the residue to his nephew. He gives by his codicil to the possessor of Wimpole several specific articles, which, under the will, would have gone to Sir C. Douglas; the predominating consideration in his mind was to benefit the name and blood to which he belonged. What would be the use of giving Sir C. Douglas £100 legacy, if he intended that he should remain residuary legatee under the will? By his will he wishes him to take the name of Eurwicke; by the codicil he leaves it to his own option, no longer considering him as his representative. If the residuary clause in the codicil does not take effect, it is a clause which is totally inoperative.

Mr. Wigram for the Respondent.—No inference ought to be drawn, from slight circumstances, to control the express words of a will. By the will all the specific articles were directed to be sold; they were not given specifically to Sir C. Douglas. Sir C. Douglas's wife's family might have objected to the change of name. By the second codicil he adds the name of Sir C. Douglas as an executor; by the first codicil Sir C. Douglas is deprived of £7000, the reason for which may be on account of the wife's fortune amounting to that sum. If he intended a greater benefit to his nephew, why did he not discharge the estates from the whole of the £12,000? Whenever he intends to make a serious disposition of his property he calls in his solicitor; then is it not probable that, if he intended to alter the whole residuary bequest, he should have called in his solicitor [566] to make the second codicil? The gift of £100 to the nephew, after the death of Mrs. Yorke, is not consistent with giving him half the residue. He says, this is a codicil of specific and pecuniary legacies; the residue is not a specific bequest or pecuniary legacy. It is doing great violence to the words of the codicil if you do not give effect to the words, "not herein-before disposed of by my will."

Mr. Pemberton in reply.—It is agreed, if the residue passes under the will, that the residuary clause in the codicil is inoperative. The two codicils are to be considered as one instrument confirming his will, except as to the residue, which he divides. In construing an instrument you must give an interpretation to every clause. A revocation may be express or implied; express, where there is a direct revocation; implied, where a subsequent codicil makes a gift inconsistent with the gift made by the will; and it is not a revocation of the whole of the residuary property given by the will, but only of the moiety.

Lord Brougham (10th August).—The question in this appeal arises upon the construction of the will and codicils of the late Mr. Yorke, brother of the half blood of the late Earl of Hardwicke, uncle of the whole blood of the present Earl the appellant, and putative father of the respondent, and it turns mainly upon the concluding paragraph or clause of the second codicil.

The case appears to stand thus: there are legacies in the will, and there is a gift of the residue. There are legacies in the codicil, and there is then the clause in [567] question. "All the rest and residue of my property, not herein-before (or by my will or any other codicil) disposed of, I give and bequeath to my nephew Charles Philip Yorke, and to Sir Charles Eurwicke Douglas, Knight, their executors, administrators, and assigns, after the death of my said dear wife, equally to be divided between them. I leave it at the option of Sir Charles Eurwicke Douglas to assume or not the name of Eurwicke singly, or to bear it as at present without alteration."

It is certain that the testator had the will before him when the codicils were made, particularly that he had it before him when the second codicil was made, when he wrote it, which he did himself. It is more particularly clear that when he added the clause in question he had before him the gift of the residue in the will, for he makes an alteration in one portion of the residuary clause in the will, videlicet, a direction respecting the name to be borne by the respondent.

Then take the terms of the clause "all the rest and residue of my property;" thus far all is plain. The question is, whether these residuary words are altered by what follows, "not herein-before disposed of;" this too would still raise no doubt, because by "herein-before" he means "in the second codicil," as seems plain from the words which come immediately after, "or by my will or any other codicil;" but it makes no difference if the two codicils are taken as one, and then "herein-before" means both the codicils together, and has no reference to the will. Now, neither in the one codicil nor the other is there any thing like a residuary gift before the clause in question, therefore there can no doubt be raised as to the sense of the words "all the [568] rest and residue of my property," by the qualification "not herein-before disposed of," and, consequently, up to this point all is plain enough. But he adds "or by my will," and the question is whether these words do not qualify the preceding ones, or except from the gift the residue given by the will; if they do they wholly annul the words and destroy the gift. The testator had the residuary gift in the will before him, therefore to support this construction it must be contended that being aware of having given the residue in the will, he says, in the codicil, "all the residue other than the residue already given," or "all the residue over the residue already given," which is not a sensible construction. If we read it "all the residue other than or over the legacies given," it is only tautology, but a very usual tautology. If we take the clause as a gift with an exception, "all the residue of my property, except what I have given in my will," we must read the exception so as not to destroy the gift, or suppose it is not a gift with an exception, but only a qualification in a description of the thing given. Still it is more reasonable, and more according to all just rules of construction, to give such a sense to the qualification as shall not make the whole a nullity.

The one construction makes the testator give "all the residue of his property, over the particular legacies given in the will and codicils," which is a sensible construction, and leaves something for the words to act upon. The other construction makes him give all the residue over the legacies, and over all the residue, that is, all that remains after the legacies, and after what remains over these legacies, which is not a sensible construction, and leaves nothing whatever; and it is mate-[569]-rial to observe that this is not a mere mistake of the testator, or an eventual defeat of his intention. It is not that he may have supposed he was giving something by the words when he had nothing to give, but the construction assumes him to have intended this absurdity, for he had the former residuary clause before him; and, therefore, if he meant by the reference to the will a reference to that clause, so as to qualify by such reference the residuary gift now made, he must have known that he was making an exception or qualification which left nothing to give, and must have been aware of the absurd construction. It seems very difficult to suppose that he would frame a clause of this kind.

The clause is framed with sufficient care, and indicates that he was aware of giving something material by it. He gives the thing, whatever it is, with reference to the time of it vesting in possession, namely, after the death of his wife, to whom he had before given it for her life, and he gives it to the parties, their executors, administrators, and assigns, to be equally divided between them.

It seems a less strained construction to take the words in the parenthesis, as they have now been taken, than in the sense put on them below, and it seems a less violence to the instrument to hold, that the testator, having before him the residuary gift in the will, altered it in the manner supposed, than to hold that he made a gift to the parties in equal moieties of what amounted to nothing, and could not possibly amount to anything. The alteration which the construction now put on the clause supposes, is in the persons who are to take an interest in the residue expectant upon the determination of the life interest given to the wife. By the will the residue, after [570] the wife's life interest, had been given to one of the parties; the codicil gives it to both equally.

I abstain from entering into any of the other arguments connected with the case, and from one or two observations which might be made in support of the view now taken, for this reason: the substance of what has been now stated was reduced into writing, and agreed to by Lord Lyndhurst and myself, and we both deemed that it led to the conclusion at which, after considerable doubt, we have arrived. It was the conclusion to which we were inclined at the first hearing. The doubts occurred afterwards, but we now consider them to be removed. In these circumstances, as Lord Lyndhurst is absent, I prefer only stating the argument which he has seen, and in which he concurs, although there has been no difference of opinion between us upon any of the other less important matters, yet those not having been reduced to writing, and considered by us in that shape, I have thought it better to omit them.

The consequence of this is, that in concurrence with my noble and learned friend, who is unavoidably prevented attending to-day, I would move your Lordships to reverse the decree below, and to make a declaration, different from that which was made below, as to the true meaning of the will and codicil, by substituting for that a declaration that the true meaning of the codicil is, that the appellant and respondent should take it equally divided; and to reverse the part of the decree which dismisses the appellant from the suit. The accounts must of course go on; in fact that is not appealed from. The only part appealed from is the declaration.

[571] Lord Chancellor.—My Lord Lyndhurst and my noble and learned friend having come to a conclusion upon these testamentary papers in favour of the present appellant,—as the opinion which I have formed differs from that at which they have arrived in their superior judgment,—I think it right, as it involves a question of principle, to state to your Lordships the ground on which I originally formed an opinion in favour of the respondent, and on which I still consider that that is the sound construction of these testamentary papers.

I think it is much more probable that the conclusion to which my noble and learned friend has come is consistent with what the testator intended. I think the great probability is, that having by his will given the residue to Sir Charles Douglas,—what he intended to do by his codicil was, instead of giving the whole residue to him, to divide it between him and another object of his bounty,—the difficulty is how far we are justified in coming to a conclusion which shall give effect to that probable intention; and I must say, I find no words in this codicil which can lead to such a conclusion. It is more from the situation of the parties, and the probability of the case, that I infer that that probably was the intention of the testator, than from any thing I find in the testamentary papers; but if the words do not bear it, it is contrary to all rule to speculate upon the intention, for the ground of the conclusion ought not to be found in any thing but the expressions which are used.

Now what actually is the state of the testamentary disposition? He gives the residue by the will to trustees, in trust to pay the income to his (the testator's) wife [572] for her life, and after her death to transfer the residue to Sir Charles Douglas; in the event of Sir Charles Douglas dying under a certain age to go over,—that, however, is immaterial, because he attained that age; then by his codicil he gives various descriptions of property to different persons, money legacies to some, and specific articles to others ; and then comes this clause :—" All the rest and residue of my property, not herein-before (or by my will or any other codicil) disposed of, I give and bequeath to my nephew Charles Philip Yorke and to Sir Charles Eurwicke Douglas, Knight, their executors, administrators, and assigns, after the death of my said dear wife, equally to be divided between them." In construing these words the obvious course is to look back to the will, to see what property there is not, by that or by any other codicil, given ; because to that subject matter the testator has by this codicil confined himself. Now if you look back you will find there is no property that is not included in the will, because there is a clause in the will which carries with it all the property. The result is, undoubtedly, therefore, that if the construction to be naturally put upon this residuary clause in the codicil be adopted, there are two residuary clauses, not a very uncommon thing to be found in a will. It frequently happens that there is found such a residuary clause, and that for greater caution, and to avoid the possibility of not having included some things, you find words which, though altogether of a general residuary kind, are not intended to apply to an antecedent gift. Then there is no ambiguity in these words ; they become useless if the residuary clause in the will is to take effect ; these fail, not from any ambiguity in the expressions used, but because the subject matter is disposed of by the residuary clause in the will.

It is not, according to my impression of the rules upon which the Courts have acted, consistent with the principles of construction, to set aside the effect of clear and unambiguous words, because there is reason to suppose that they do not produce the effect which the testator intended they should produce. If there be an ambiguity, then, of course, it is the duty of all Courts to put that construction upon the words which seems best to carry the intention into effect, but if there be no ambiguity, however unfortunate it may be that the intention of the testator shall fail, there is no right in any court of justice to say those words shall not have their plain and unambiguous meaning. Taking this clause by itself, there can be no difficulty in coming to a conclusion, because what he gives is what is not given by any codicil or will. Under these circumstances, what appeared to me before appears to me still, that, however probable it may be that putting this construction upon the words may effect the intention of the testator, the words are of that character and description that they do not open the door to carry out any intention which is not to be found in the words so used.

There is also considerable difficulty in supposing the testator to have intended to have revoked the former clause, because the residue, by the will, was given to trustees upon trust ; and what he might have intended to do, and, I think, very probably did intend to do, was to say, that that interest which Sir Charles Douglas would have taken under the will, I intend to give equally between him and Sir Charles Yorke, that would be the object which the testator must be presumed to have [574] had, if the construction which my noble and learned friends put upon this clause, in order to carry out the supposed intention of the testator, is to prevail. Certainly the words employed do not, in my opinion, indicate any such intention ; if one were to take the trouble of seeing how he would have expressed that intention which is now contended for, and what would be the way of carrying it into effect, meaning to revoke what he had given to any individual, and then intended for that individual and another, he would naturally have revoked that disposition, and have given all the rest and residue of his property, which rest and residue had been given to trustees, the ultimate trust being in favour of Sir Charles Douglas, to the trustees, for the benefit of those he then meant to favour. Under these circumstances, I certainly have not been able to see that the expressions used are so flexible, and so capable of being adapted to the intention supposed to be entertained by the testator, as to justify the construction which my noble and learned friends have thought themselves at liberty to adopt, but which, if adopted, would very likely carry his intentions into effect.

Decree reversed, and cause remitted, with declaration.

GEORGE JACKSON,—Appellant; ROBERT JACKSON, ELIZABETH MAUNSELL, and MARIA MAUNSELL,—Respondents [4th June and 11th August 1840].

[Mews' Dig. i. 356. S.C. 7 Cl. and F. 977.]

A father being tenant for life of a certain estate held upon lives, with power of appointment amongst one or more of his children, by deed of the 14th January 1804, appoints to his son, in tail male. By deed of the 18th January 1804, the father and son, in consideration of £1600, to be applied in paying interest of debts upon the estates, and of fines due for the renewal of the lives on the estates, demise part of the estate for the lives therein named, and for lives which might afterwards be added. By lease and release of the 10th and 11th December 1807, in consideration of the debts paid by the father for the son, the son reconveys to the father the estate which had been appointed to the son.—Held, that from the circumstances of the two first deeds being executed nearly at the same time, of the father's debts being provided for out of the estate, and of the son restoring the estate to the father, there was so much doubt as to the validity of the appointment, notwithstanding a recital in one of the deeds, that the father had paid the debts of the son, as to make it necessary to inquire into the validity of the appointment.—Decree reversed, and inquiry directed.

[576] By a settlement dated 22d June 1780, made previously to a marriage afterwards had between William Marcus Jackson and Jane Devereux, after reciting that William Jackson was seised of and entitled to two several freehold interests, the one in the lands of Moylish, and the other in the lands of Clonlara, both in the north liberties of the city of Limerick, by virtue of two several leases for lives thereof respectively, with covenants for perpetual renewal, he conveyed the same unto trustees, their heirs and assigns, upon trust for William Marcus Jackson for life, and after his decease (charged with a jointure of £50 for Jane Devereux) to the use of all and every or such one or more of the children of the said William Marcus Jackson by the said Jane Devereux, and for such estate or estates in tail male, and in such parts, shares, and proportions, manner or form, as William Marcus Jackson should, by deed or will, appoint; and in default of appointment, or as to such parts whereof no appointment should be made, to the use of the first son of the said William Marcus Jackson by the said Jane Devereux, and of the heirs male of the body of such first son, with remainder to the use of the second and all and every other the son and sons of the said William Marcus Jackson by the said Jane Devereux, severally and successively, in tail male, with several remainders over.

There was issue of the marriage four sons, William Devereux Jackson (since deceased) the eldest son, George Jackson (the appellant) the second son, the respondent Robert Jackson the third son, and Thomas Jackson (since deceased) the fourth son, and no other issue.

William Marcus Jackson, in pursuance of the power [577] given him by the settlement, by a deed poll dated the 14th January 1804, appointed the lands of Moylish with the appurtenances, to William Devereux Jackson, and to the heirs male of his body.

By indenture of lease dated the 18th January 1804, and made between William Marcus Jackson and William Devereux Jackson of the one part, and Nicholas Mahon, gent., of the other part, in consideration of £1600 paid by Nicholas Mahon to William Marcus Jackson and William Devereux Jackson, they the said William Marcus Jackson and William Devereux Jackson did demise unto the said Nicholas Mahon, his heirs and assigns, part of the lands of Moylish, as therein particularly described; to hold the same unto Nicholas Mahon, his heirs and assigns, for the lives of the several persons therein named, as cestuisque vies, and the survivor of them, and for the lives and life of such other person or persons as should for ever thereafter be added to that demise, pursuant to the covenant for perpetual renewal therein contained, at the yearly rent of £110, payable half-yearly, as therein mentioned.

And in the said indenture is contained a covenant by the said William Marcus Jackson and William Devereux Jackson, for themselves, their heirs and assigns, with the said Nicholas Mahon, his heirs and assigns, for the perpetual renewal of the said lease, at the costs and charges of Nicholas Mahon, on payment or tender of a peppercorn for every new life to be added. And it was by the said indenture agreed, that so much of the said sum of £1600 as should be sufficient should be laid out and applied by the said William Marcus Jackson and William Devereux Jackson, first, towards paying off, satisfying, and discharging all the debts by specialty [578] judgment, or otherwise, affecting the estate of the said William Marcus Jackson; secondly, towards defraying the costs and expenses of renewing the lease for three lives, which he the said William Marcus Jackson held of the said lands of Moylish from the Earl of Shelbourne, with covenant for perpetual renewal, and out of which the interest demised by the indenture now under statement was derived, and paying such renewal fines as were then due and to be paid to the Earl of Shelbourne by the said William Marcus Jackson, his heirs and assigns, pursuant to his covenants with the said Earl of Shelbourne, on his inserting and adding lives in the place and stead of such as had not yet been supplied, so as to enable the said William Marcus Jackson and William Devereux Jackson, their heirs and assigns, to grant to the said Nicholas Mahon, his heirs and assigns, the estate and interest so intended to be demised to him. And after reciting that a fine had been levied by William Marcus Jackson and William Devereux Jackson, unto the said Nicholas Mahon and his heirs, of part of the lands of Moylish, then in his possession, for the purpose of obviating all doubts as to the estates which William Marcus Jackson and Wm. Devereux Jackson might have taken in the said lands under the settlement of 22d June 1780, and for barring all estates tail under the settlement, it was declared that the fine should enure for the purposes of the demise thereby intended to be granted. And by the said indenture of lease the said Nicholas Mahon covenanted with the said William Marcus Jackson, his heirs and assigns, that he the said Nicholas Mahon would at all times thereafter advance and pay all such sum and sums of money as should be necessary to procure renewals from the said Earl of [579] Shelbourne, under the covenant for perpetual renewal contained in the said lease by which the said lands were held as aforesaid; it being the intent and meaning of the parties, that the said fines so thereafter to be paid to the said Earl of Shelbourne, his heirs and assigns, should at all times be paid by the said Nicholas Mahon, his heirs and assigns, and no part thereof by the said William Marcus Jackson and William Devereux Jackson, their heirs and assigns.

By an indenture dated the 12th April 1806, and made between the said William Marcus Jackson of the first part, the said William Devereux Jackson of the second part, the said William Holland and Edward Jones of the third part, and Henry Wilson and John Jackson, Esquires, of the fourth part, the said William Marcus Jackson did, by virtue of the said indenture of settlement of the 22d June 1780, appoint the town and lands of Clonlara, with their appurtenances, to the said William Devereux Jackson, and to the heirs male of his body, subject, however, to the life estate of the said William Marcus Jackson. And by the said indenture the said William Marcus Jackson and William Devereux Jackson did bar all entails of the said William Devereux Jackson in the lands of Clonlara.

By an indenture of lease dated the 12th April 1806, and made between the said William Marcus Jackson and William Devereux Jackson of the one part, and John Young, Esq., of the other part, for the considerations therein mentioned, William Marcus Jackson and William Devereux Jackson demised unto the said John Young part of the lands of Clonlara, containing 37 A. 2 R. 35 P., Irish plantation measure, as therein particularly described, for the lives of the three persons [580] therein named, and for the term of thirty-one years from the decease of the survivor of them, at the yearly rent of £3 8s. 3d. per acre.

By another indenture of lease, also dated the 12th April 1806, and made between the said William Marcus Jackson and William Devereux Jackson of the one part, and Samuel Young, Gent., of the other part, for the considerations therein mentioned, William Marcus Jackson and William Devereux Jackson demised unto Samuel Young other part of the lands of Clonlara, containing 37 A. 2 R. 35 P., Irish plantation measure, as therein particularly described, for the lives of the three several persons therein named, and for the term of thirty-one years from the decease of the survivor of them, at the yearly rent of £3 8s. 3d. an acre.

By indentures of lease and release, dated the 10th and 11th December 1807, the release being made between the said William Devereux Jackson, Henry Wilson, and John Jackson, Esquires, of the one part, and the said William Marcus Jackson of the other part, after reciting the several deeds before mentioned, and that it being found convenient by the said William Marcus Jackson, and also by the said William Devereux Jackson, not only for the purpose of family settlements, but under certain agreements for leases of the said lands of Moylish and Clonlara, entered into and since concluded by the said William Marcus Jackson and William Devereux Jackson to certain of the tenants of the said lands, who for greater safety were advised that the entails in the said several lands should be barred by means of the aforesaid deeds, and also for the purpose of enabling the said William Marcus Jackson to pay off several debts and engagements incurred by the said Wil-[581]-liam Devereux Jackson, and the said William Marcus Jackson, reposing the fullest confidence in his said son the said William Devereux Jackson, did, for the purposes aforesaid, convey in the manner as in the said several deeds was expressed the said lands, It was witnessed that the said William Devereux Jackson, in consideration of the said several debts by the said William Marcus Jackson for him paid, and of 5s., and in discharge of the trusts and confidence so as above reposed in him by the said William Devereux Jackson, did, in due form of law, convey and assure unto the said William Marcus Jackson, and to his heirs and assigns, all the said lands of Moylish and Clonlara, with the appurtenances, and all the right, title, and interest of him the said William Devereux Jackson therein or thereto.

In the year 1815 William Devereux Jackson died intestate, and without issue, whereupon the appellant became the eldest son of the said William Marcus Jackson.

The said lands of Clonlara were afterwards sold and disposed of by William Marcus Jackson.

William Marcus Jackson, by his will, dated the 20th October 1821, (duly attested by three witnesses,) gave, devised, and bequeathed all his estate and interest in and to the said lands of Moylish unto his said wife Jane Jackson, and to Edward Gloster, therein named, in trust that his wife should have and receive during her life an annuity of £50 in addition to the jointure settled upon her by his marriage settlement, the said annuity to be paid to his wife out of that part of the said lands of Moylish tenanted by one Nicholas Mahon, on the 1st May and 1st November [582] in every year during her life, in equal portions, the first half-yearly payment thereof to be made on such of the said days as should first happen after his decease; and upon further trust that his said trustees should, after payment of the said annuity, yearly receive out of the said lands of Moylish the sum of £100 by two half-yearly payments, on the days aforesaid, and place the same out at interest, until the sum of £550 should be made up, to be applied in the manner therein mentioned; and that when that sum should be made up the said testator declared that the said sum of £100 should go to increase the jointure of his said wife, and should be paid to her at the same times as the said sum of £50 a year was therein-before made payable. And as to the residue of the rents of the said lands of Moylish, after the said sums of £50 and £100, annually, in trust to pay the same to the appellant during the life of his (the said testator's) said wife; but on her death, and on the sum of £550 being raised out of the rents of the said lands of Moylish as aforesaid, the said testator declared that the said Edward Gloster, his heirs and assigns, should stand seised of the said lands of Moylish to the use of testator's sons, the appellant, and the respondent Robert Jackson, during their natural lives respectively, to be held by them as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants, with remainder to the legitimate issue of the appellant, and the respondent Robert Jackson, in such manner and form, shares and proportions, as the appellant, and the respondent Robert Jackson, should by deed or will, duly executed, direct or appoint; and in failure of legitimate issue in either of his (the said testator's) said sons, he devised his share so dying without legitimate issue to the other [583] of them, his heirs and assigns, for ever. And as to the said sum of £550, when the same should be raised out of the rents of the said lands of Moylish, and as to a certain sum of £450 which the said testator stated the said Edward Gloster owed him, he the said testator gave and bequeathed the said two sums, making together £1000, to his grand-daughters, the respondents Elizabeth Maunsell and Maria Maunsell, daughters of William Maunsell, Esquire, share and share alike, the same to be paid to them at their respective ages of twenty-one years or days of marriage, whichever should first happen, provided such marriage should take place with the consent therein mentioned, the interest to be paid to his said wife, and applied as she should please towards their education and maintenance in the meantime. And the said testator expressly devised the said sum of £1000 to his said grand-daughters in payment and full discharge of any sum or sums of money claimed to be due by him the said testator to their father the said William Maunsell, either by bill, bond, note, book account, or in any manner ; ; and the said testator declared that should the said William Maunsell not deliver up the said bonds, notes, and other securities cancelled, to his (the said testator's) executors, or should the said William Maunsell demand any of the said sums of money, or any part thereof, then he (the said testator) devised the said sum of £1000 to his residuary legatee. And as to all the rest, residue, and remainder of his real, freehold, and personal estate and property, of every kind and nature whatsoever, which he should die seised and possessed of or in any manner entitled to, and not therein-before disposed of, the testator gave, devised, and bequeathed such residue to his wife, her [584] heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, as his residuary legatee.

In November 1822 William Marcus Jackson died, leaving the appellant, and the respondent Robert Jackson, his only children, him surviving.

On the 21st January 1824 a bill was filed by Jane Jackson, the widow of the testator, against George Jackson (the appellant), for establishing the will of William Marcus Jackson.

The appellant appeared and put in his answer to the said bill, and issue having been joined therein, and the said cause having been set down for hearing, the said bill was, by the decree of the Court, dated the 21st June 1836, dismissed with costs, and which costs were ultimately paid to the appellant.

In 1833 Jane Jackson died.

On the 21st January 1836 the respondent Robert Jackson filed his bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, against the appellant, and the respondents Elizabeth Maunsell and Maria Maunsell, charging, amongst other things, that the deed of January 1804 was a fair execution of the power given to the said William Marcus Jackson by the deed of 1780, and that the deed of 11th December 1807 was untinctured by any fraud, and was not executed in consideration of the previous appointment or any corrupt agreement; and praying that the will of William Marcus Jackson might be declared well proved, and that the same might be established, and the trusts thereof carried into execution by the decree of the said Court; and that the respondent Robert Jackson might be declared to be entitled to an estate in quasi tail in one moiety of the said lands of Moylish, under the construction of the said will, and [585] might be put into possession thereof accordingly; and that an account might be taken of the rents and profits received by the appellant out of the said lands since the death of the respondent Robert Jackson's mother, and that the said respondent Robert Jackson might be declared entitled to one moiety thereof, and that the appellant might be decreed to pay the same to the said respondent Robert Jackson, by a short day, to be named for that purpose; or if the said Court should be of opinion that the said deeds of the 14th January 1804 and the 11th December 1807 were void, then that the said will of the said William Marcus Jackson, deceased, of the 20th October 1821, might be deemed and taken to be a valid execution of the power of appointment contained in the said deed of the 22d June 1780, and that the respondent's rights might be decreed thereunder.

The appellant by his answer insisted that the said deed of appointment of the 14th January 1804 was not made in bona fide execution of the said power of appointment given by the said marriage settlement of 1780, but that the same was made to enable the said William Marcus Jackson to derive benefit therefrom to himself, and also to enable him to have executed the several leases herein-before mentioned, on which he, William Marcus Jackson, also received fines, and that the said deed of appointment was fraudulent and void in equity for the reasons aforesaid, and that the said deed of 1807 was executed in consideration of a corrupt agreement between William Marcus

Jackson and William Devereux Jackson, and insisted that in the event of the said deeds being declared void the said will of William Marcus Jackson, in the said bill mentioned, was [586] not a good and valid execution of the power of appointment given him by the deed of 1780.

On the 1st May 1838 the cause came on to be heard before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. On the 3d May 1838 his Lordship, by his decree, established the will of the testator William Marcus Jackson, and declared that the respondent Robert Jackson was entitled to an estate quasi in tail in one moiety of the lands of Moylish from the decease of Jane Jackson, and that the respondents Elizabeth Maunsell and Maria Maunsell were entitled to the legacies bequeathed by the will, if the amount of the rents of the lands of Moylish received by the appellant during the life of Jane Jackson was sufficient for that purpose.

From this decree the appellant George Jackson appealed.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Wakefield for the Appellant.—The consideration for the appointment by the father in favour of the son was fraudulent. The appointment was made in consideration of the father's debts, amounting to £1600, being paid. It is not proved that the son received any benefit from this transaction; but if he had, the transaction would have been fraudulent. The will cannot be considered as a good execution of the power; certain sums are given to grandchildren; annuities are given, and the appointment to the son is in tail, not in tail male. It has been said that a cross bill ought to have been filed, but the whole transaction has been put in issue upon the record, and no objection was taken in the Court below.

[587] Mr. Knight Bruce and Mr. Eade for the Respondents.—The deed of the 14th January 1804 is a good appointment, and there is no evidence to connect that deed with the subsequent deed of the 18th January 1804. The estate could not be sold without paying off the incumbrances on the estate. It has been assumed that the payment of these debts was for the benefit of the father, whereas it was for the benefit of the purchaser. It is too much to say, at the instance of the defendant, that the deed ought to be set aside thirty-six years after its execution, when all the parties to the transaction are dead. It appears by the deed of 1807 that the father had paid off the debts of the son; the father might buy the estate of the son. The levying of the fine was unnecessary; the estate was barred by a conveyance. If the son had filed a bill against the father to invalidate the appointment in reasonable time it might have been relieved against; but if the appointment is bad under the deed, the will executing the power is good; it is only void for the excess.

Lord Chancellor (11th August).—This is a case from the Court of Chancery in Ireland, which, on examination of the pleadings, it appears has come before your Lordships under very peculiar circumstances. The suit is by a party claiming under the will of the father, a will in which the father has assumed the right of disposing of certain lands stated to be situated in a place called Moylish. The answer to this claim is, that that estate was not the estate of the father, at least not an estate over which the father had a right to exercise the power of disposition by will, it being stated that he derived his [588] title under a settlement by which the father was tenant for life, with the power of appointing to his children in tail male.

The father, it appears, appointed in favour of his eldest son, and upon the face of that instrument there is nothing to impeach it. But other instruments are stated which certainly throw very great doubt upon the propriety of that transaction, because by another deed, of the 18th January 1804, the father and son joined together in granting a lease for three lives, renewable for ever, in consideration of £1600, that £1600 being in the very terms of the deed to be applied in relieving the estate from certain debts of the father.

The deed of the 11th December 1807 increases those doubts; for it speaks of the conveyance to the son having been upon trust and confidence, and it is as a conveyance back to the father of the estate which had been so apparently appointed to the son. It also speaks of fines, by which the estate tail was barred; but as to those fines, under what circumstances or for what purpose they were levied is only to be inferred from what is stated in that deed.

Now the decree assumes that this estate was the absolute property of the father, and directs that one moiety of the estate shall be held by the respondent, assuming that the title under the father's will was good. It also directs that the defendant shall account for a moiety of the rents from the death of the father, although his title did not accrue till the death of the mother in 1833.

Now the only ground upon which that can be explained is, that the will directed a sum of £100 a year to accumulate until £550 should be realized, that sum [589] when realized to go to make up a sum of £1000 left to certain children of the testator. I presume, although it is very indistinctly stated upon the pleadings and in the decree, that the object of that part of the decree was to relieve the estate of the plaintiff from that burden of any portion of the £550. Now if that was the object of the decree, it is not in the shape and form in which it ought to be to carry out that object; because if it was only for the purpose of relieving the estate of the plaintiff from that burden of £550, or any portion of it, the first inquiry would have been, what portion of that £550 remained unpaid, and whether the income received by the defendant (always supposing the decree to be right upon the merits) between the interval of the death of the father and the death of the mother had or had not been sufficient for the purpose of meeting and providing for that charge; because if that charge had been provided for, and it had been ascertained that a sufficient amount of rent had been received for that purpose,—if, for instance, the rents had amounted to ten times that sum,—the mere fact of the defendant having received property equal to that sum would not have been a sufficient ground for the decree. That, however, I refer to only incidentally; because it does not appear to me a matter which can justify the shape which the decree has assumed.

But, on the merits of the case, I think the decree cannot be supported in its present form. The decree assumes that all these objections to the title of the father are of no avail. It decrees at once, upon the state of information then before the Court, that all these transactions and appointments were valid, and that the father had, by means of the appointment, and the title he got [590] from the son in whose favour the appointment was made, a valid title, and therefore decrees in favour of the plaintiff claiming under the will.

Now, without expressing any final opinion (because I do not think the case is as yet ripe for it) as to the effect of all these transactions, it is quite obvious that there is ample ground for suspicion. In the first place, these two deeds coming together almost at the same moment, the appointment in favour of the son, and the deed by which £1600 was raised by fine upon that very estate, to be applied in satisfying the debts which were charged on the estate, which were the debts of the father, would of itself raise a strong suspicion that it was not an appointment by the father, honestly and fairly exercising the power which the settlement gave him, but that he was influenced in making the appointment by the benefit which he expected and contracted to receive for himself. But the deed of 1807 makes the case much stronger, because we there find the son restoring the estate to the father. It is true that that deed states the father to have paid various debts of the son; that may or may not be true. It may be, that the object of all this was to raise money to pay the son's debts; it may be that there was no intention to commit any fraud by this appointment. But whether the recital was true or not the Court has no means of judging, for there is no evidence in the cause; there is nothing before the Court to enable it to form any opinion as to the validity of these transactions but what appears upon the face of the instruments themselves.

Under these circumstances, we are left entirely in the dark whether any title was obtained independently [591] of this appointment, for it appears that the son was tenant in tail under the appointment. One argument was, that supposing the appointment was entirely out of the question, the father and the son together had, by means of the estate, independently of the appointment, the means of procuring an absolute dominion over the property. But under what circumstances all these transactions took place is without any proof, except so far as they are stated in those deeds to which I have referred. Therefore, under these circumstances, and with the facts appearing upon these deeds, I think it was too much for the Court to assume that the title of the father was good, and therefore that, as it respected the parties claiming under the will, it was property of which the father had an absolute power of disposing. I am equally of opinion that it is not a case in which it is competent to the Court to come to any determination in favour of the defendant, but that the defendant has merely thrown suspicion upon the title of the plaintiff, by that which appeared upon the deeds produced. It might be that the statement in the deed of 1807 would be established; namely, that the whole object of this was to pay the debts of the son; whether it was or not does not appear; but this ought not to be left to conjecture, but the facts ought to be ascertained before the Court proceeds to act upon the deed. I apprehend the duty of a court of equity to be, when it finds itself in a situation not to be able either to decide in favour of the plaintiff or in favour of the defendant, and so to adjudicate as to the title, to enter into a course of investigation, by which the real facts of the case may be ascertained, before it comes to any final adjudication upon the merits. What I propose, [592] therefore, to your Lordships is, to reverse this decree, and to declare that before any adjudication upon the plaintiff's title under the will, there should be an inquiry before the Master what title the testator had at the time of his death in the lands of Moylish, and how the same was derived, and particularly whether the appointment of those lands in favour of the son William Devereux Jackson was a good and valid appointment, with liberty to state special circumstances; and in order to avoid the expense and delay of another reference at a future stage of the cause, I would propose that there should be an inquiry whether the £550, or any and what part thereof, is or was due at the time of the death of the testator, and what is now due in respect thereof; and whether the rents received by George Jackson during the lifetime of Jane the widow were sufficient to pay the same. These inquiries, it is true, would not arise until the question of title had been decided, but I think it would be expedient, in order to save time, that the Master should at the same time pursue that inquiry.

Decree reversed, and cause remitted to the Court of Chancery in Ireland.

ON APPEAL AND CROSS-APPEAL.

A. Forbes, having equally divided his property amongst his wife and children, directed that £400 a year should be paid to his wife, for the maintenance of herself and children, during her widowhood, but upon her second marriage £60 a year, and that his children should be maintained out of his estate. The widow having married Ross M'Can concealed her marriage, and received the [594] £400 a year, and having been appointed receiver in 1792 passed an account before the Master under the name of Margaret Forbes, wherein the £400 per annum was allowed. Margaret Forbes died; and Ross M'Can, as administrator of her and A. Forbes, passed an account in 1795 before the Master, and, being appointed guardian of the children and receiver of the property of the testator, agreed with the children, who had all attained twenty-one, to refer the accounts of their father's estate to arbitration. During the pendency of the arbitration, Catherine, one of the daughters of the testator, by articles in contemplation of a marriage which afterwards took place between herself and John O'Ferrall, agreed that £1000 of her fortune should be paid to John O'Ferrall, and that the interest of the residue should be paid to them during their lives, and after the death of the survivor amongst their children, as they should appoint, and in default equally amongst the children. The award was afterwards made, Catherine Forbes, under her maiden name, having consented to enlarge the time; and several accounts were passed before the Master by Ross M'Can, as receiver of the testator's estate, and the proceedings carried on under the name of Catherine Forbes.—Held, that the accounts which were passed in 1792 and 1795 were fraudulent, to the extent of the difference between the £400 and £60, although an allowance ought to be made for the maintenance of the children out of the estate of the testator; that the award and accounts passed by Ross M'Can were invalid against Catherine O'Ferrall and her children, Ross M'Can having a knowledge of the marriage of Catherine Forbes at the time the award was made and the accounts passed; and that Ross M'Can, as receiver and representative of A. Forbes and Margaret his widow, having paid to John O'Ferrall various sums in respect of which he ought to have accounted to the Court, was primarily liable, yet that the representative of John O'Ferrall ought to be kept before the Court in case of a deficiency of assets of Ross M'Can to satisfy the demands under the articles.

[595] The Reverend Arthur Forbes, of Drumconragh, in the county Meath, by will dated 17th of July 1783, after giving certain legacies to his four children, gave to his wife Margaret Forbes and her children the sum of four hundred pounds yearly for her and her children's maintenance and education whilst she continued unmarried; but in case she married again in lieu thereof £60 a year; and directed his executors to pay such sum as his nephew and other relations should think necessary for the education and maintenance of his children; and after making certain specific bequests bequeathed the residue of his substance to be equally divided between his wife and children, and appointed his wife Margaret, and his niece Priscilla, executrixes of his will.

On the 24th of July 1783 Arthur Forbes died, leaving Margaret Forbes his widow, Arthur Forbes, Catherine Forbes, Priscilla Forbes, and John Forbes, who died an infant prior to the year 1790, his only children.

On the 24th February 1790, after a protracted litigation, Margaret Forbes obtained probate of the will.

On the 13th March 1790, on the petition of Margaret Forbes, Charles Walker, one of the masters of the Court, was appointed guardian of the estate of the children, and on the 17th July in the same year Margaret Forbes was appointed guardian of the persons of the children of the testator, and Thomas Walker, one of the masters of the Court, was appointed guardian of their estates, in the place of Charles Walker, deceased.

On the 7th June 1791, on the petition of Thomas Walker, Margaret Forbes was appointed receiver of [596] the estates of her children. In the month of June 1791 Margaret Forbes intermarried with Ross M'Can, and on the 26th June 1792 passed her account as receiver under the name of Margaret Forbes, concealing the fact of her second marriage. On the 7th November 1794 Margaret M'Can died intestate, and in February 1795 Ross M'Can obtained letters of administration to the estate of his wife, and to the goods of A. Forbes, unadministered, during the minority of his children.

On the 4th December 1795 Ross M'Can, as administrator of Margaret Forbes and of Arthur Forbes, passed an account of the estate of the minors from the death of their father, without alluding to the account passed by Margaret Forbes.

In the two accounts passed in 1792 and 1795 credit was given for the £400 a year paid to Margaret Forbes up to the time of her death.

By orders of the 8th of January and 31st March 1796 Ross M'Can was appointed receiver of the estates, and guardian of the persons of the minors, upon entering into the usual security to account.

On the 25th March 1796 the Court of Chancery ordered that £80 a year should be allowed to Ross M'Can for the maintenance and education of each of the minors, to commence from the 17th July 1795.

On the 17th January 1798 Catherine Forbes, and, prior to 1802, Arthur Forbes and Priscilla Forbes, attained the age of twenty-one.

On the 4th March 1802 a deed of submission was signed and sealed by them and Ross M'Can, whereby all matters in difference between them and Ross M'Can were referred to Arthur Browne, the prime serjeant, and [597] Gerald O'Ferrall, and which was made a rule of court the 12th May 1802.

By marriage articles, dated the 22d day of May 1802, in contemplation of a marriage which was had on the day of the date of the articles, and made and executed by and between John O'Ferrall of the first part, Catherine Forbes of the second part, and Gerald O'Ferrall, one of the arbitrators, of the third part, whereby, after reciting that Catherine Forbes had then in the hands of Ross M'Can £5000 or thereabouts, it was agreed, after the marriage, that it should be lawful for Gerald O'Ferrall to call in and receive from Ross M'Can all such sums of money and securities for money as Catherine Forbes was then entitled to, upon trust to pay to John O'Ferrall the sum of £1000 for his advancement in his profession, and to place the remainder at interest in such manner as John O'Ferrall and Catherine Forbes (notwithstanding her coverture) should direct, and that the interest thereof should be paid to John O'Ferrall during their joint lives and the life of the survivor of them, and after the decease of the survivor in such shares and proportions as he or she, by deed or will, should think fit, amongst the issue of the marriage, and in default of appointment amongst the children equally, and if but one child to such one child.

On the 25th June 1802, the time for making the award having then expired, an order was made by the Court of Chancery, expressed to be upon the consent of Catherine Forbes, under her maiden name, for enlarging the time for making the award until the 26th of June 1802.

[598] On the 26th of June 1802 the arbitrators made their award, whereby they awarded that Ross M'Can should pay to Catherine O'Ferrall, Arthur Forbes, and Priscilla Forbes, the sums therein mentioned.

Ross M'Can's account of Catherine Forbes's fortune, upon which the award was founded, was made up to the 7th January 1802.

In December 1803 Matthew O'Connor intermarried with Priscilla Forbes.

On the 6th September 1802 an order was made that Ross M'Can should account for the fortunes of the minors.

On the 9th November 1802 Catherine O'Ferrall, in the name of Catherine Forbes, together with Arthur Forbes and Priscilla Forbes, signed and gave a power of attorney to Ross M'Can, enabling him to receive out of Court certain securities which had been lodged by him in the Bank of Ireland, and, on a petition presented by him for that purpose, and supported by his affidavit, by an order of the 4th October 1803 it was ordered, that Ross M'Can should account before the master, as administrator of Arthur Forbes and Margaret Forbes, and as guardian and receiver of the fortunes of the late minors respectively, and the master was ordered to inquire when they respectively attained twenty-one, and what was due to them respectively, and why Ross M'Can had not duly accounted before; but neither of the orders to make him account were ever prosecuted.

In 1806, 1810, and 1814 Ross M'Can passed accounts before the master as receiver, and the proceedings were carried on under the name of Catherine Forbes. [599] The account of 1806 was adopted, as it appears by the report, and affidavit of Ross M'Can, upon the alleged consent and approval of Catherine Forbes and the other children, and the account of 1810, as appears by an affidavit of Ross M'Can, upon the consent of John O'Ferrall, Matthew O'Connor, and Arthur Forbes. The account of 1814 was passed, and Ross M'Can's recognizance was vacated, upon an undertaking from him in a letter to John O'Ferrall that the account then taken should not be binding.

Between the 18th September 1802 and the 8th November 1806, by an account sent by Ross M'Can to John O'Ferrall, and which was admitted by John O'Ferrall to be correct, Ross M'Can paid to John O'Ferrall himself, and to Catherine his wife, for her use, the sum of £8004 16s. 6½d., on account of her fortune. Amongst the items in this account was a payment to John O'Ferrall of £1000, ordered by the Court of Chancery on the 19th July 1806 to be paid to Catherine O'Ferrall, upon a petition presented by her under the name of Catherine Forbes, and supported by an affidavit of Ross M'Can; and for this payment Catherine O'Ferrall had signed to the receipt the name of Catherine Forbes.

In 1819 John O'Ferrall and Catherine his wife filed their bill of complaint against Ross M'Can, for an account of the assets of the testator Arthur Forbes; and Arthur Forbes, his son, having died pending the suit, the suit was revived against Ross M'Can, as administrator of Arthur Forbes the son; and Ross M'Can having also died in February 1828, the same was again revived against Joseph Henry M'Can, as [600] the personal representative of Ross M'Can, and was dismissed in 1832, upon Joseph Henry M'Can undertaking within a month to give security in a sum of £8000 to abide any decree to be made on a bill to be filed in relation to the assets of the testator Arthur Forbes, on behalf of Catherine O'Ferrall and her children.

Ross M'Can, in his answer to the bill, denied that he had any knowledge of the marriage of John O'Ferrall with Catherine O'Ferrall until September 1802, or that he knew of the existence of the articles of settlement until 1811; but Priscilla O'Connor proved his knowledge of the marriage, as he informed her of it two days before it took place, and on the 17th June 1802 Ross M'Can wrote to John O'Ferrall, desiring John O'Ferrall to bring with him Mrs. O'Ferrall's private book.

On the 25th May 1832 Catherine O'Ferrall and her children filed their bill against Joseph Henry M'Can, John O'Ferrall, Matthew O'Connor, and Priscilla O'Connor his wife, who had obtained letters of administration to the testator Arthur Forbes, and Edward O'Ferrall, the executor of Gerald O'Ferrall, and Edward O'Ferrall having died the suit was duly revived against Sarah O'Ferrall, administratrix of Edward O'Ferrall, and administratrix de bonis non of Gerald O'Ferrall, alleging that the accounts of 1792, 1795, and 1814 were in several particulars therein mentioned fraudulent and erroneous, that the award was founded upon fraudulent accounts produced by Ross M'Can, and that it was void and fraudulent, and that the submission was revoked by the marriage of Catherine [601] Forbes; and praying that the accounts passed in 1792, 1795, 1814, and the award of 1802 might be declared fraudulent and void, and that the usual accounts of the personal estate of Arthur Forbes might be taken; that interest might be charged, with half-yearly rests, on the balances in the hands of Margaret and Ross M'Can respectively; and that the trusts of the will might be carried into execution; and that an account might be taken of what was due on the foot thereof to Catherine O'Ferrall and the other children of the testator, and that Ross M'Can might not have credit for any sums paid to John O'Ferrall beyond £1000; that the articles of the 22d May 1802 might be reformed, so as to include the whole fortune of Catherine O'Ferrall, except £1000 therein mentioned, and that an annual sum, independent of John O'Ferrall, might be settled upon her during the life of John O'Ferrall; and that the interest of John O'Ferrall in certain freehold lands which he possessed in right of his wife might be sequestered, to make good to Catherine O'Ferrall the losses occasioned by his conduct; and that in case the assets of Ross M'Can should not be found sufficient for that purpose, that then John O'Ferrall might be decreed to pay into Court such portion of the fortune of his wife Catherine O'Ferrall as he might have received, over and above the annual interest thereof, and that an account might be taken for that purpose; and if the assets of Ross M'Can should be found insufficient to make good the sum found due to the appellants, that the personal representatives of the said Gerald O'Ferrall might be decreed chargeable therewith, to such amount as the Court might direct.

[602] The defendants to the bill having put in their answers, and the cause being at issue, the cause came on to be heard before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland on the 14th and five following days of January 1834, and on the 6th of March following his Lordship decreed that the portion of Catherine O'Ferrall, as found by the award, ought to be increased by the sum therein mentioned, and after deducting therefrom £1000, to which John O'Ferrall was entitled under the marriage articles, it was ordered that the same should be laid out by Joseph Henry M'Can, within one month from the date thereof, in the purchase of government three and a half per cent. stock, to be transferred to the credit of the cause, and John O'Ferrall was declared entitled to have the interest of the portion of Catherine O'Ferrall, from the day of his marriage with her; and in taking the account John O'Ferrall was to be charged with all sums paid by Ross M'Can to Catherine O'Ferrall from the 7th January 1802 to the day of her marriage, and with all sums paid to John O'Ferrall after the marriage; and Ross M'Can was to be debited with half-yearly interest on her portion, except on the £1000 from the time it was paid off; and if upon taking the account any balance should appear due to Joseph Henry M'Can, John O'Ferrall should pay the same to Joseph Henry M'Can. And it was ordered, that a receiver should be appointed over Catherine O'Ferrall's moiety of the lands at Rowskly and Bruslanstown, and that such receiver should bring in, and from time to time invest in like government three and a half per cent. stock, the balance which should from time to time be in his hands, to be transferred to the credit of the [603] cause; and in case John O'Ferrall should not pay the aforesaid balance to Joseph Henry M'Can, with the costs in the decree mentioned, Joseph Henry M'Can should have his remedy for the same against the life estate of John O'Ferrall in the interest and dividends on the said principal sums therein mentioned, and against the rents and profits of the said lands and premises, so far as John O'Ferrall was interested therein as the husband of Catherine O'Ferrall, and against the fund arising out of the rents. And, subject thereto, it was declared that Catherine O'Ferrall, John O'Ferrall having consented thereto, was entitled to the dividends of the principal sum and the rents of the said lands for her life, to her sole and separate use, so as she should not anticipate or incumber the same, and that her children were entitled to the principal sum according to the trusts of the marriage articles. And it was ordered that the defendant Sarah O'Ferrall, representative of Gerald O'Ferrall, deceased, should abide her own costs, and that the consideration of the liability of Gerald O'Ferrall should be reserved, in case Catherine O'Ferrall and her children should be unable to recover the same from Joseph Henry M'Can, or in case he should make default. And it was ordered, that the bill be dismissed against Sarah O'Ferrall, without costs. And it was ordered, that Joseph Henry M'Can, within one fortnight, according to the terms of the decretal order of 20th January 1832, in the cause of O'Ferrall and wife against M'Can and others, should give security in a sum of £8000 to abide the decree; and in case Joseph Henry M'Can should not, within one month from the date of the decree, transfer to the credit of the cause the sum before directed, it was [604] ordered that the appellants should be at liberty forthwith to proceed at law as they might be advised, upon the recognizance entered into by Ross M'Can, Sir Marcus Somerville, and David Hanly, and upon such other recognizance as might be entered into by Ross M'Can and his sureties; and that the amount thereof, when levied, should be invested in like government three and a half per cent. stock, and transferred to the credit of the cause; and that the several recognizances should stand as securities to plaintiffs for their costs, in that and the cross cause, until paid. And it was ordered, that the defendants Matthew O'Connor and Priscilla his wife should have their costs in the cause from the appellants, and that the appellants should have the same along with their own costs in the said cause against John O'Ferrall and Joseph Henry M'Can, and that the respondent John O'Ferrall should pay Joseph Henry M'Can his costs in the cause, and also the appellants' costs, in case the appellants should enforce the same against the respondent Joseph Henry M'Can.

On the 16th of June 1832 Joseph Henry M'Can filed a cross bill against the parties to the original cause, charging that John O'Ferrall and Catherine his wife, and Gerald O'Ferrall, deceased, had been guilty of frauds in concealing from the Court of Chancery and Ross M'Can the marriage articles made upon the marriage of John O'Ferrall with Catherine his wife, and that she had represented herself to the Court of Chancery as an unmarried woman, and thereby induced the Court to pay her £1000 of her fortune, and that the same had been done without the knowledge of Ross M'Can, and praying that the award might be established, and that an account might be taken on [605] the footing of the award of the assets of Arthur Forbes, and if Catherine O'Ferrall or John O'Ferrall, or Matthew O'Connor or Priscilla O'Connor, had received more of the assets than they were entitled to, then that such party might pay to Joseph Henry M'Can such surplus, and that he might have credit against Catherine O'Ferrall and her children for all sums paid by Ross M'Can to John O'Ferrall and Catherine O'Ferrall, on account of her fortune, subsequent to their marriage, and if it should appear to the Court that Joseph Henry M'Can or Ross M'Can was bound by the marriage articles, that then Edward O'Ferrall, as executor of Gerald O'Ferrall, might be decreed a trustee for Catherine O'Ferrall and her sons, and that Joseph Henry M'Can might have credit for all payments made by Gerald O'Ferrall's direction or consent, and if it should appear that Ross M'Can had paid to Catherine O'Ferrall or her husband the full amount of the sum awarded her, that Joseph Henry M'Can might be decreed not further responsible to Catherine O'Ferrall or her trustee, or any person claiming under the articles.

Edward O'Ferrall having died, the suit was revived against Sarah O'Ferrall, his personal representative; and the defendants having put in their answers to the cross bill, the cross cause came on to be heard at the same time as the original cause, and was, by the decree of the 6th March 1834, dismissed with costs.

On the 16th of June 1834 the respondent Joseph Henry M'Can presented a petition, praying that the said cause might be reheard.

On a rehearing of the original and cross causes, on the 10th July 1834, the decree was varied by enlarging [606] the time for payment and transfer of the sum of £3822 ls. 7½d. until the 24th of July, and by directing the payment and transfer by Joseph Henry M'Can of £1000, as a fund for the plaintiffs' costs.

In the month of May 1835 John O'Ferrall, the husband of Catherine O'Ferrall, having taken the benefit of the insolvent act, John Dodd, as his assignee, was, by supplemental bill, made a party to the suit.

On the 19th November 1835 the Lord Chancellor, on a re-hearing, varied the decree of the 6th of March 1834, by directing that in case the payments made by Ross M'Can to John O'Ferrall should exceed what was due for interest on the sums secured by the articles of the 22d May 1802, then that such excess should be taken as paid in discharge of the principal, and deducted therefrom, and that interest should thenceforth be calculated on the balance which should be then remaining due only, and if the payment so made by Ross M'Can should have amounted to the whole of such sums so secured, that from thenceforth the interest of the said principal sum of £4000, secured by the articles, should cease during the lifetime of John O'Ferrall.

From the decrees of the 6th of March 1834 and 10th of July 1835 Joseph Henry M'Can appealed; and from the decrees of the 6th March 1834, 10th July 1834, and the 19th November 1835, Catherine O'Ferrall, Gerald O'Ferrall, Arthur O'Ferrall, and John O'Ferrall the younger, appealed.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Kindersley for the Appellant, Joseph Henry M'Can.—Mr. Gerald O'Ferrall being a trustee, was guilty of fraud in permitting John [607] O'Ferrall to receive his wife's fortune; he never gave notice of the marriage settlement to Ross M'Can, which bears date the day of the marriage, and might have been executed many years after the marriage; the witness who proves the execution of the settlement is not asked when it was executed. John O'Ferrall received from Ross M'Can upwards of £8000 on account of his wife's fortune; having no notice of the settlement, the payments made to John O'Ferrall on account of his wife were good payments, and Mrs. Catherine O'Ferrall having joined in the fraud has no right to relief. By an order of the 19th July 1806, Catherine O'Ferrall, upon her own petition and receipt, obtained £1000 of her fortune, and is this to be accounted for and paid to the trustees of the marriage settlement? Coverture is no excuse for fraud on the part of a married woman or infant, Cory v. Gertcken (2 Mad. 40), Evans v. Bicknell (6 Ves. 174), Savage v. Foster (9 Mod. 35); but even if she has a right to relief, Gerald O'Ferrall, who concealed the settlement, is primarily liable to make good the deficiency. The statute of limitations would prevent accounts of so long standing being opened after a period of more than thirty years from the date of the award, and sixty years after the death of the testator; it would be impossible, under such circumstances, to give a general account of his assets.

Mr. Wakefield and Mr. Hallett for the Respondents, Catherine O'Ferrall and her children.—Ross M'Can took credit for the £400 a year which was forfeited [608] upon the marriage of Catherine Forbes. Ross M'Can is proved to have known of the marriage of Catherine O'Ferrall before it took place, and he must be presumed to have had notice of the marriage articles before the award; and supposing he had not notice, it was his duty, as her guardian and receiver of her fortune, to have acquainted the Court of Chancery with her marriage, that a proper settlement might be made, under the sanction of the Court. Catherine O'Ferrall must be presumed to have acted under the control of her husband, over whom Ross M'Can had great influence. Ross M'Can was continually committing a fraud upon the Court; the accounts were all passed under the maiden name of Catherine Forbes. The award, therefore, and accounts, are all fraudulent and void. The statute of limitations is no bar to fraud. Ross M'Can was not only a mere executor or trustee, but he was the receiver appointed by the Court over the fortunes of the minors, and the Court will not sanction a fraud in one of its own officers.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. James Russell for Sarah O'Ferrall.—M'Can admits he knew of the articles in 1811, and he still continues making payments to John O'Ferrall to 1816. The statute of limitations applies more strongly in favour of Gerald Ferrall than Ross M'Can. Ross M'Can is a receiver, and has never been discharged, and must be primarily liable before Gerald O'Ferrall can be charged. Gerald O'Ferrall never received any part of Catherine O'Ferrall's fortune, nor is there any proof that he was privy to the frauds practised by Ross M'Can and John O'Ferrall.

[609] Mr. Pemberton in reply.—The award has been made a rule of Court, and the parties are bound by it; the award is not bad in consequence of the marriage, because all the parties interested had concurred in it. The parents having consented after marriage, the children are bound. Gerald O'Ferrall was a party to the marriage articles, and ought to have given notice to M'Can of the marriage articles; he never gives notice, and acts quite inconsistently with his duty as a trustee. M'Can can only be called upon in the second degree; he can only be answerable through the medium of the trustee; it is owing to the default of the trustee that the whole mischief has happened.

Lord Chancellor (27th April 1841).—This case affords a melancholy instance of the extent to which frauds may be practised within the precincts of a court of equity. When such cases occur the Court must feel an anxious wish to afford all such relief as may be consistent with its principles and practice, and, as far as possible, to prevent its proceedings from being instrumental in protecting the author of such frauds. This is not only due to the parties injured, but to the public, who have an interest in the result, which may deter others from attempting similar practices.

The papers in the cause are very voluminous, and the argument, both at the bar and in the Court below, took a very extensive range; but it will not be necessary for me to occupy much time in stating the grounds upon which I have formed the opinion, that the plaintiffs, the appellants, are entitled to a much more [610] extensive relief than the decree appealed from has given.

The appellant Catherine O'Ferrall is one of the children of the Reverend Arthur Forbes, who died in 1783, having by his will given the residue of his property equally between his wife and children, having thereby directed that during his wife's widowhood £400 per annum should be paid to her for herself and the maintenance and education of his children, but that upon her second marriage she should receive £60 per annum only; and in that case he directed that the maintenance and education of his children should be paid out of his estate, under the direction of his nephews and certain other relations.

Margaret, the widow, after a contest, obtained probate of this will in 1790, and in 1791 married Ross M'Can, of whose estate the respondent Joseph Henry M'Can is now the representative, and died on the 17th November 1794, whereupon Ross M'Can obtained administration of her estate, and of the estate of the testator Arthur Forbes, during the minority of the children, which terminated on the 17th of January 1798, by the appellant Catherine then attaining twenty-one, and upon Arthur, another of the children, attaining twenty-one in August 1801, administration was granted to him; but Ross M'Can had, by an order of the Court of Chancery in Ireland of the 8th of January 1796, been appointed receiver of the fortune of the children, entering into security to account for such part of the fortunes of the minors as he should from time to time receive, as is usual in such cases.

[611] On the 22d of May 1802 Catherine married John O'Ferrall, and by articles, executed in contemplation of the marriage, it was provided that Gerald O'Ferrall, a trustee, should get in the fortune of Catherine, then in the hands of Ross M'Can, and otherwise, and pay £1000 to John O'Ferrall the husband, and invest the residue, and pay the income to the husband, for the joint lives of the husband and wife and the survivor, and after the death of the survivor divide the same among the children, as the husband and wife, or the survivor, should appoint, and in default of appointment, equally. It does not appear that any suit had been instituted during this period, but in 1791 the widow, and in 1796 Ross M'Can, were appointed receivers of the fortunes of the infants, under the direction of the Master, which appears to be according to the practice of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, and in 1796, on the 25th of May, an allowance of £80 per annum was ordered for the maintenance of the children, the widow being then dead; but it appears that from the time of the marriage between her and Ross M'Can the £400 was paid to her or her husband, although by the will she was entitled only to £60, which was effected by concealing from the Court the fact of such marriage. Although, therefore, it appears that in 1792 the widow, and in December 1795 Ross M'Can, passed accounts before the Master, to which no irregularity in point of form has been imputed, it is certain that such accounts were erroneous and fraudulent to the extent of the difference between the £400 and £60 per annum, unless some allowance might have been claimed for the maintenance of the children from the date of the mother's marriage, she having been appointed guardian of their persons. [612] It does not appear that any other account was taken, or that any thing else took place affecting the interest of the children, or the liability of the accounting parties, till after the marriage of Catherine in 1802. There had, indeed, been a reference to arbitration, and an order for that purpose, but the time for making the award had expired, and no consent had been given to enlarge the time when the marriage took place.

Ross M'Can by his answer denied knowledge of this marriage until September 1802, and of the articles of the marriage until 1811. This knowledge of the marriage at the time it took place is, however, established by the evidence of Priscilla O'Connor, who says that she was informed of the intended marriage a couple of days before it took place by Ross M'Can, and by a letter from him to John O'Ferrall, dated the 17th of June 1802, in which he desires John O'Ferrall to bring with him Mrs. O'Ferrall's private book. Of his knowledge of the articles prior to 1811 there is not, I believe, any direct proof, but when it is considered that he was the husband of the mother of Catherine O'Ferrall, and that Gerald O'Ferrall was the trustee of the settlement, and that these parties combined with John O'Ferrall the husband to conceal the fact of this marriage also from the Court, there can scarcely be any moral doubt of his knowledge of the settlement. To have made known the existence of the settlement, or even the fact of the marriage, would have been destructive of the scheme which he appears to have formed of settling his accounts with John O'Ferrall, and that through the instrumentality of Gerald O'Ferrall, whom these parties had appointed as arbitrator, together with [613] Mr. Serjeant Browne, to settle all matters in difference between the children and Ross M'Can.

On the 25th of June 1802 an order was made, expressed to be upon the consent of Catherine Forbes, but who was then Mrs. O'Ferrall, and to which Ross M'Can was also a party, enlarging the time for making the award until the 26th of June instant, and on that day the arbitrators made an award, directing Ross M'Can to pay to Catherine Forbes £4872 13s. 4d.

At this time Catherine was a married woman, and the capital of her fortune was the property of her children. The submission, therefore, and the award, were inoperative, and so they seem to have been treated by the parties, for on the 6th of September 1802 an order was made for Ross M'Can accounting before the Master, and on the 4th of October 1803 an order was made that Ross M'Can should account before the Master as administrator of the original testator and of Margaret Forbes, and as guardian of the persons and receiver of the fortunes of the late minors respectively, and to inquire when they respectively attained twenty-one, and what was due to them respectively, and why M'Can had not duly accounted before. This reference was never prosecuted, and no report was ever made, and nothing which afterwards took place in the cause can have the effect of protecting Ross M'Can from accounting for the share of Catherine; although he appears to have passed an account before the Master in 1806, and in 1810, and 1814, as receiver, yet the proceedings were carried on in the name of Catherine Forbes, her settlement being concealed, although Ross M'Can admitted that he knew of the settlement in 1811. The accounts [614] of 1806 were not in fact taken by the Master at all, but as appears by the report itself, and by an affidavit of Ross M'Can of the 30th of April 1806, were adopted upon the alleged consent and approval of Catherine Forbes and the other children, the respondent M'Can well knowing that Mrs. O'Ferrall was a married woman, and incapable of consenting, and the whole of her property being at the time in trust for her children; and the accounts of 1810 appear, by an affidavit of Ross M'Can of the 9th of June 1810, to have been adopted by the Master upon the consent of John O'Ferrall. The accounts in 1814 were passed, and Ross M'Can's recognizance vacated, under an arrangement that they should not be binding, as appears from a letter from him to John O'Ferrall, dated the 15th of February 1815, in which he uses the following words:—"By your consenting to have my recognizance vacated under the accounts which I passed before the Master in July last I do not mean to bind you or Mrs. O'Ferrall by that account; on the contrary, you and I will settle our accounts relative to the late Reverend Arthur Forbes's property as if no such account had been passed." These accounts cannot raise any impediment to the claims of the children of Catherine Forbes, and nothing more appears to have taken place till 1819, when a bill was filed by John Ferrall and his wife, which, having abated by the death of Ross M'Can, was revived against the present respondent Joseph Henry M'Can, and was dismissed in 1832, the defendant undertaking to give security for £8000 to abide any decree to be made on a bill to be filed in relation to the assets of the testator Arthur Forbes, on behalf of Catherine O'Ferrall and her children, or any of them. [615] The bill upon which the decree in question was made was accordingly filed by Catherine O'Ferrall and her children. This decree seems to assume, for certain purposes, the validity of the award, for it makes the sum thereby to be awarded the foundation of the claim which it enforces against M'Can's estate, adding, however, certain sums to it, which it appeared to the Court had been improperly withheld from the notice of the arbitrators, or which at least had not been included in their award.

I do not very well understand this mode of dealing with the award, supposing it to be valid, or dealing with it at all, if invalid and inoperative; and, being of opinion that it is invalid and inoperative as against the plaintiffs, I think the decree must be altered in this respect, and the account directed without reference to the award at all. But, as I do not find any ground for impeaching the regularity of the accounts passed in 1792 and 1795, the accounts to be taken must be upon the footing of the accounts so passed; but as it is proved that there are material errors and omissions in those accounts, the Master must look into, and, if necessary, correct such accounts, and such accounts must be in particular corrected by taking therefrom the £400 per annum from the time of the marriage of Margaret Forbes, and by substituting in the place of it £60 per annum, to which she was entitled after such marriage, to which there must be added an inquiry of who maintained the children from the marriage of the mother in June 1791 until the 25th of May 1796, when £80 per annum was allowed for the maintenance of the children, and if Ross M'Can or the mother maintained them, what ought to be allowed for such [616] maintenance during the time, and the amount thereof to be charged in the account, and interest, calculated upon the difference between the £400 per annum and the sum so to be credited to the account, in the same manner as interest is calculated upon the rest of the account. And that the Master do ascertain what balances were from time to time in the hands of Ross M'Can. And as John O'Ferrall has received large sums, part of the share of Catherine, in the testator's property, that an account be taken of what he has so received, and when and under what circumstances each of such sums was so received. This account is proper, not because payments to her by Ross M'Can can even prima facie be discharged as against the owners of the fund, inasmuch as Ross M'Can's connexion with the estate at the time of Catherine's marriage was confined to his office of receiver, and to what remained due from him in respect of his former office of representative of Arthur Forbes and Margaret his widow, in all which characters it was his duty to account to the Court, and which he had been ordered to do,—in such a case, if one even innocently pays money to other persons whom he supposes to be entitled in right of the parties in the cause, but who prove not to be so entitled, he will be responsible to such parties, inasmuch as in making such payments he departs from the strict line of his duty, and is therefore liable for any error he may commit; such account is also proper because the owners of the fund, although their primary claim is against Ross M'Can, may, if they fail to obtain payment out of his estate, recover it from John O'Ferrall, and because, although it is premature to declare rights dependent on circumstances not yet ascertained, and [617] it is not regular to do so between co-defendants, it may become necessary hereafter to act upon the result of such account between the estate of Ross M'Can and John O'Ferrall. It is also, I think, premature to make any provision as to the manner in which the articles upon the marriage of John O'Ferrall and Catherine Forbes ought to be carried into effect, the fund which is to be the subject of that settlement, and the liabilities of John O'Ferrall towards that fund, being unascertained; the answers show a sufficient title in Catherine to support her position as co-plaintiff with her children. It would also be premature to make any declaration as to the liability of Gerald O'Ferrall; but I think his personal representative ought to have been retained before the Court. That, however, is not complained of; for the complaint of John Henry M'Can's appeal is only that he ought to have been primarily liable, for which there is no pretence. All questions of interest and costs ought also to be postponed until after the report. The cross appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Now, the usual course of proceeding in this House in arranging the minutes of the decree has been, to declare the principle upon which the decree is to be founded, and to refer it back to the Court to carry it into execution. That, however, has been found to lead, sometimes, to repetitions of appeals, the Court below not always carrying into effect the intention of this House in the way in which the parties understood the House that it should be carried into effect; therefore, where it is possible, I think it more expedient, and calculated to save expense to the parties, that this House, in making its order, should frame the decree [618] in such a manner as to prevent the necessity of any further reference to the Court below.

It is ordered, That the original appeal be dismissed: And it is further ordered, That the appellant in the original appeal pay the costs of the respondents Catherine O'Ferrall, Gerald O'Ferrall, Arthur O'Ferrall, since deceased, and John O'Ferrall the younger, and of the respondent Sarah O'Ferrall, administratrix of Gerald O'Ferrall the elder, incurred by them in respect of the original appeal, to the said respondents Catherine O'Ferrall, Gerald O'Ferrall, and John O'Ferrall the younger, and to the said respondent Sarah O'Ferrall, administratrix of Gerald O'Ferrall the elder: the amount of such costs to be certified by the clerk assistant: And it is further ordered, That the decrees of the 6th March and 10th July 1834, the two orders of the 2d July and 31st October 1835, and the decree of the 19th of November 1835, complained of in the cross-appeal, be reversed: And it is declared, That the plaintiffs in the cause of O'Ferrall v. M'Can in the Court of Chancery in Ireland are entitled to a decree for an account of the personal estate of Arthur Forbes, and of the receipts and payments in respect thereof of Margaret Forbes and of Ross M'Can, as personal representatives of Arthur Forbes, and as guardians and receivers of the fortunes of his children, and otherwise howsoever, without regard to the award of the 26th of June 1802, on any account taken subsequently to the marriage of Catherine O'Ferrall with the defendant John O'Ferrall, and also of the receipts and payments of the defendant Joseph Henry M'Can in respect of such estate; and that such accounts ought accordingly to be taken against Joseph Henry M'Can, and the estate of Margaret Forbes and Ross M'Can, and that it ought by such decree to be declared, that in taking such accounts Margaret Forbes is to be considered as entitled under the will of the testator Arthur Forbes to the annual sum of £400 only up to the time of her marriage with Ross M'Can, and to the annual sum of £60 only from that time; and that inquiries ought by such decree to be directed as to [619] by whom the plaintiff Catherine O'Ferrall and the other children of the said testator were maintained from the time of the marriage of Margaret O'Ferrall up to the 17th of July 1795, when the allowance of £80 per annum commenced, under the order of the 25th of March 1796; and if it should appear that they were maintained during the time by Margaret O'Ferrall or Ross M'Can, that then the Master ought to be directed to inquire what ought to be allowed for such maintenance during that time; and that the Master ought to be directed to inquire what balances were from time to time in the hands of Margaret Forbes and Ross M'Can on account of such estate, or of the share therein of Catherine O'Ferrall, and also to ascertain what, at the time of the marriage of Catherine O'Ferrall with the defendant John O'Ferrall, was the amount of her share and interest of and in such personal estate, and when, and by whom, and to whom, and in what manner, the same, and each and every part thereof, was paid, laid out, and invested, and what has become thereof, and what part thereof, and of the personal estate of the said testator, has at any time been paid to or received by or possessed by the defendant John O'Ferrall, and when, and by whom, and by what authority each and every part thereof was so paid, received, and possessed; and that it ought by such decree to be declared, that in taking such accounts against the estate of Margaret O'Ferrall and Ross M'Can regard is to be had to the accounts passed on the 26th of June 1792 and 4th December 1795; but that any of the parties are to be at liberty to show errors and omissions in such accounts, and that the Master is to be at liberty, in taking the accounts directed by the said decree, to correct any such errors and omissions; and that such decree should reserve the consideration of all matters relating to the settlements made upon the marriage of Catherine O'Ferrall with the defendant John O'Ferrall, and to the claims and liabilities of John O'Ferrall in respect thereof, and of the liabilities of the estate of the late Gerald O'Ferrall in respect thereof, and also the consideration of interest upon balances, and of the costs of the suit: And it is further declared, That [620] the costs, charges, and expenses of the appellants in the said cross-appeal ought to be paid out of the fortune of the said Catherine O'Ferrall: And it is further ordered, That the cause be remitted back to the Court of Chancery in Ireland, to make a decree conformable to the above declarations, and to carry these directions into effect.

BARONY OF HASTINGS.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL for the CROWN. Sir WILLIAM FOLLETT for Mr. LE STRANGE STYLEMAN LE STRANGE. Sir HARRIS NICOLAS for Sir JACOB ASTLEY [13th May 1841].

[Mews' Dig. x. 310; xiv. 1729. S.C. 8 Cl. and F. 144; 4 St. Tr. N.S. 1367. See Kintore v. Kintore, 1886, 11 A.C. 394; Parl. Pap. 1895, 272, p. 5.]

A summons to parliament, and a sitting under it, is evidence of a title to a peerage descending to the heirs of the body including females; so likewise is it evidence of a similar title, where there have been several summonses, both prior and subsequent to a sitting in parliament, and a sitting in parliament, though no sitting under a summons, has been proved, proof being adduced that during the period of that sitting there were no writs of summons in existence.

The petition of Sir Jacob Astley of Melton Constable in the county of Norfolk, and of Seaton Delaval in the county of Northumberland, praying that Her Majesty would be pleased to determine the abeyance of the barony of Hastings in his favour, by commanding a writ of summons to be issued to him by that title, [622] together with Her Majesty's reference, and a report of the attorney general thereunto annexed, and a similar petition of Henry Le Strange Styleman Le Strange of Hunstanton in the county of Norfolk, with Her Majesty's reference, and the report of the attorney general, were severally referred to the committee for privileges.

From the evidence produced in respect of the pedigree it appeared to the committee, That Mr. Styleman Le Strange, claiming from Armine, the eldest daughter of Sir Nicholas Le Strange, and Sir Jacob Astley, claiming through Lucy, the second daughter of Sir Nicholas Le Strange, had proved their descent from Sir John de Hastings, the second baron, who sat in the House of Peers in the 18th Edward I.:

That the barony fell into abeyance on the death of Sir Hugh de Hastings in 1543; and that Mrs. Browne of Elsing Hall, near Dereham in the county of Norfolk, (who was not a claimant,) was descended from Anne Hastings, the eldest daughter of Sir Hugh de Hastings; Henry Le Strange Styleman from Armine, the eldest daughter, and Sir Jacob Astley from Lucy, the second daughter, of Sir Nicholas Le Strange, who died in 1724.

In respect of the claim to the peerage it was proved, That on the 24th December, 49th Henry III., 1264,* Sir Henry de Hastings, from whom the claimants are descended, was summoned by writ to parliament:

* This is the earliest writ of summons to parliament now extant, by which the baronies of Lord Despencer and De Roos have been created; but as the rolls of parliament do not commence until the reign of Edward I., proof cannot be adduced from the parliamentary rolls of those peers having sat in parliament.

[623] That in the 18th Edward I., 1290, Sir John de Hastings, second Baron Hastings, the son of Sir Henry de Hastings, was proved to have sat in parliament by the parliamentary roll; wherein it is stated that Sir John de Hastings, et ceteri magnates et procures tunc in parlamento existentes, had granted to the king, for the marriage of his eldest daughter, as much as Henry III. had received on the marriage of his daughter:

That no writs of summons to parliament from the 49th Henry III. to the 23d Edward I. had been found:

That on the 23d, 27th, 28th, and 34th Edward I., and on the 1st and 6th Edward II., the same Sir John de Hastings was summoned to parliament, had a writ of summons to the coronation of Edward II., and died on the 6th Edward II., 1313:

That on the 6th and 18th Edward II. Sir John de Hastings (the third Baron Hastings), son and heir of the first Sir John de Hastings, was summoned to parliament, and died in the year 1325.

Lord Chancellor.—This case had come before your Lordships under a reference by Her Majesty, upon a petition of Sir Jacob Astley, and another of Mr. Styleman Le Strange, claiming the barony of Hastings, which is stated to have been either created or certainly to have existed in the 49th Henry III.

The pedigree, so far as it traces the descent from the party in whom that barony was vested, appears to me, after a laborious investigation of the evidence affording the different links in the pedigree, to have been made out. At the same time there always is [624] some degree of doubt in coming to a conclusion upon facts of such a very ancient date, and we always feel some hesitation in coming to a conclusion on evidence of that description. It does, however, happen in this case, that most of the steps of the pedigree are supported by public documents, inquisitions, and other instruments, which leave no doubt as to the facts which are stated in those documents; and, upon the whole, your Lordships will, I think, be safe in acting upon the evidence.

The evidence shews that the descent fell into abeyance in the year 1543. Anne Hastings, who was the daughter of Sir Hugh Hastings, and her sister Elizabeth, were the only two children of that Sir Hugh Hastings who would have been entitled to the barony if it had been claimed and acted on in the manner set out in this petition, and from that Anne Hastings is descended, not either of the parties claiming the title, but another party, who is not before your Lordships as a party claiming according to the form of proceeding which is adopted by your Lordships in cases of this sort. Mrs. Browne is proved to have been descended from that Anne Hastings; she, therefore, would be one of the parties in whom the title is vested as a co-heir.

The other sister, Elizabeth, is the ancestor of both the other claimants, Mr. Styleman Le Strange being descended from Armine, who was the elder daughter of Sir Nicholas Le Strange, and who died in the year 1768, and Sir Jacob Astley being descended from Lucy, the younger sister of that Armine. There are three parties, therefore, in whom the title is vested; Mrs. Browne, who is descended from the elder branch, [625] and the other two, who are descended from the junior branch, namely, the daughters of Sir Nicholas Le Strange.

Some questions have been raised at your Lordships' bar, which, undoubtedly, are entitled to the most serious consideration. The first of those is, how far there has been proved in this case that which is required, in the absence of a patent, to establish a title descendible to heirs general, namely, a summons and a sitting. That a summons and a sitting constitute a title descendible to heirs general has been established and acted upon in so many cases that I need not now consider it a question open to discussion. The point, therefore, is, in this case, whether there has been proved that which, according to former decisions, constitutes a title to a dignity of this description. The other is a point, not of law, but rather of fact, namely, whether the absence of any exercise of the right to this title, from the time when it is proved to have been last held by Sir John de Hastings, who died in the year 1389, does not raise a presumption that there must at that time have been something, which cannot now be traced, which precluded the party, who would otherwise have been entitled, from claiming the barony at that period.

Though length of time itself is undoubtedly no bar to a claim, yet when you are examining matters of fact, and are endeavouring to ascertain the rights of persons who now come forward to claim a dignity, undoubtedly it raises a great presumption against the validity of that claim when you find a dignity, descendible at a particular period, in a way that would entitle a party to take it up, and you find that that claim was not made, or, at all events, that the party did not [626] succeed, unless there are circumstances in the case which enable your Lordships to come to a satisfactory conclusion, that the circumstance of the dignity not having been taken up is satisfactorily explained. Where a title falls into abeyance, and is claimable either by two sisters, or the descendants of two sisters, no doubt the presumption against the title does not arise, because neither of those parties could assert a right to the title without the assent of the crown; and if the crown did not think proper to exercise its prerogative, by deciding to which of the two sisters the title should descend, neither party could assert her title in her own right. If the crown does not so decide in the first instance, it may go on from generation to generation; and the circumstances, therefore, of it falling into abeyance, and not being claimed, undoubtedly do not raise any strong presumption against the claim.

There have been cases before your Lordships in which you have reported in favour of the titles, where that circumstance did not exist, and where the title appears not to have been taken up by the next possessor, it not appearing that the circumstances of the case were such as presented any impediment which would have prevented him from claiming the title. It must always depend upon the particular circumstances of each case; it is, at most, but a case of presumption, that is to say, a presumption that there must have been something which cannot now be discovered, which might have prevented the party who would otherwise be entitled to the dignity from claiming it.

With regard to the first of those points, namely, how far, in this case, there has been a summons and a sitting, both being necessary to constitute a title to the [627] dignity claimed, the facts may be very shortly stated. Sir Henry de Hastings, the father of Sir John de Hastings, from whom the claimants are descended, appears to have been summoned to parliament on the 24th day of December in the 49th year of Henry III.; of that there appears to be no question; the proceedings in parliament at that period are preserved, and they prove the fact; but there is no evidence that that Sir Henry de Hastings sat in parliament; there is undoubted proof of his having been summoned, but no proof of his having sat. His son John de Hastings is, I think, clearly proved to have sat in parliament the 18th Edward I.

A sitting in parliament must be proved by some proceeding in parliament itself, and there is produced and proved, as of the date of the 18th Edward I. in the year 1290, a document professing to be in the nature of a grant to the king, described to be "in pleno parlamento ipsius domini Regis," which states the barons and lords present, and, among others, Johannes de Hastings, and, after naming others, it says, "et ceteri magnates et procures tunc in parlamento existentes." The grant is stated to have been not properly the subject of a grant by parliament, but, whether properly the subject of a grant by parliament or not, is, I apprehend, not material, provided it appears clearly that it was a proceeding in parliament, and the document itself states that it was "in pleno parlamento," and states the parties present to have been, among others, "Johannes de Hastings, et ceteri magnates et procures tunc in parlamento existentes."

There is nothing to impeach this as having been a proceeding in parliament; it is, therefore, a parlia-[628]-mentary proceeding, recognising Johannes de Hastings as being then a member of your Lordships' House, and I apprehend it comes therefore within all the rules by which your Lordships try the fact, of whether there has been a sitting. This has not been or pretended to be the great difficulty in the present case; but the difficulty in the present case is, that there is no proof produced of the summons of that Sir John de Hastings to sit in that parliament. At a subsequent date there are many instances proved of the same individual having been summoned; but then, in those subsequent parliaments, there is no proof of his having sat.

Now your Lordships, in investigating this, finds this as a matter of fact. You find an individual whose father was certainly summoned to parliament; you find the same individual summoned to subsequent parliaments; and you find the same individual sitting in a preceding parliament; and the question is, whether there be any rule by which your Lordships are to be guided in coming to the conclusion that he was regularly summoned to the parliament in which you find that he sat. I apprehend that there is no such rule; but, although it is quite clear that in order to constitute the dignity claimed there must be a summons and a sitting, your Lordships having the fact of a sitting proved, must, according to the ordinary rules, investigate the question, whether that sitting was or was not under a summons, of which there is now no positive proof. Under the decisions, strictly speaking, the proper test and evidence of a summons would be the writ itself; but there are many cases in which writs cannot be produced, and in this case there is proof [629] that the writs of that period, that is, the period covered by the year 1290, in which this individual must have been summoned, if summoned at all, are not forthcoming. The case, therefore, as far as regards summons, rests on this individual himself having been summoned at different periods, your Lordships not having the summons produced for this period, but having the fact of his having sat in parliament in that year.

Under these circumstances, it appears to me that your Lordships may be well justified in coming to the conclusion that he had a writ of summons, which, at that period, would alone entitle him to sit in this House; for the only suggestion consistent with his having sat in this House at all without a summons would be his having intruded himself into the House without authority; whereas no peer at that time, nor at the present time, could enter this House without having his summons with him. The question is, whether your Lordships are to presume that he was there without that legal authority, or whether, connected with other collateral facts, of a summons at an earlier period, and summonses at a subsequent period of time, your Lordships may not safely come to the conclusion that he was summoned at that time upon the principle of law omnia præsuntur legitime facta donec probetur in contrarium. I apprehend your Lordships may do what you have done on former occasions; presume, upon the collateral evidence in this case, that that took place which alone could justify the sitting, namely, that Sir John de Hastings was summoned to parliament in the 18th Edward I.

[630] Take Sir John de Hastings, because there is no evidence of Sir Henry de Hastings having sat, though no moral doubt can exist of his having been the peer from whom Sir John de Hastings derives his title; but when a party is claiming a dignity, and he derives his title from some individual as his ancestor, he is bound to show the concurrence of those two circumstances of a summons and a sitting in that ancestor.

It appears to me that your Lordships are acting within the principle which has regulated your former proceedings in cases of this sort, in coming to the conclusion upon the evidence, that Sir John de Hastings was summoned and sat in the parliament of the 18th Edward I.

The title descended in the issue of that Sir John de Hastings through several generations; that Sir John de Hastings having had one son, whose issue enjoyed the barony for a certain period of time, but which issue failed in the year 1389. That Sir John de Hastings had also a daughter, Elizabeth, who married Lord Grey de Ruthyn, from whom another line descended, now represented by Lady Hastings.

Upon the failure of the line of the son of Sir John de Hastings, Sir John de Hastings, Sir Lawrence de Hastings, and then Sir John de Hastings again, upon the failure of that line, Sir John de Hastings having, it is very clearly proved, married another wife, both of his wives being named Isabel,—from his second wife was descended Sir Hugh Hastings, who is the ancestor of the present claimant. According to the rules of law the barony would, on his decease, have fallen to the Hugh Hastings who was descended in that line, who [631] died in 1396, and upon his death it would have gone to his brother Sir Edward, and thence arises the second difficulty which has been suggested at your Lordships' bar. I do not detain your Lordships by observing upon the difficulty, which at one time was suggested, of the proof of the second marriage of Sir John de Hastings with Lady Isabel, the daughter of Hugh Le Despenser, because it appears to me, upon looking at the inquisitions which have since been produced, that that fact is very satisfactorily established; and there is no doubt that Sir John de Hastings, by his second marriage with that Isabel, had the descendants who are represented in this pedigree as being the ancestors of the present claimants.

Then this question arises:—Sir John de Hastings, who died in 1389, was the last possessor of the dignity; and there was this difficulty raised at your Lordships' bar; —that the male descendants of the second wife of Sir John were the parties entitled to the peerage, but that they did not make any claim to it, and that from that period to the present there has not been any enjoyment of the dignity by any person to whom, under those circumstances, it would vest.

If the case had stood nakedly upon those facts, although there are cases which would justify your Lordships in passing over that difficulty, and not concluding the case on account of not being able to explain how that happened, there would have been great difficulty in assuming that they were, in fact, entitled to the dignity, when no person descended from Sir John de Hastings had, during so long a period, asserted that title. But the circumstances of this case appear to me [632] to remove that difficulty; because it appears that upon the death of the male line of Sir John, called the second Baron Hastings,—there being descendants of Elizabeth, the daughter of that Sir John,—the question arose, how far the descendants of that daughter were entitled, in preference to the descendants of the son of a subsequent marriage, there being a rule of law applicable to land, and the question arising, whether the rule of law applicable to land did or did not apply to a dignity.

It is also proved that a contest arose* between the [633] descendants of that Eliza-

* The controversy arose between Reginald Lord Grey of Ruthyn, the heir of the whole blood of the third Earl of Pembroke, and Sir Edward Hastings, the collateral heir male, respecting the right to bear the arms of Hastings, without a mark of difference or abatement.

Though merely called “a plea of arms,” it would appear that the honours as well as the arms of the family were involved in the question, it being then understood that dignities, like lands, descended upon the heir of the whole blood of the person last seised, instead of upon the heir of the person first created. Reginald Lord Grey, who asserted that “the arms, inheritance, and name of Lord Hastings,” belonged to him, assumed that title, and it was always borne by his descendants, the Lords Grey de Ruthyn and Earls of Kent, until 1641, when the House of Lords, after referring the question to the Judges, resolved that the Lords Grey de Ruthyn never had any right to the barony of Hastings.

Sir Edward Hastings, however, also assumed the title of “Lord Hastings,” and never relinquished it. On the 9th of May, 11 Hen. IV. 1410, the controversy was decided in favour of Lord Grey de Ruthyn; but Sir Edward Hastings immediately appealed against the judgment; and on the accession of King Henry the Fifth a new commission was appointed for hearing the appeal. The proceedings were interrupted by the absence of one of the commissioners, and afterwards by the expedition to France in 1415, Sir Edward Hastings having been retained to serve in the retinue of the Earl of Dorset, by indentures dated in May 1415, under the designation of “Edward Seigneur de Hastings et de Stuteville.” In 1417 the appeal was resumed, but (as would appear from a petition of Sir Edward Hastings to the King, about 1421,) before judgment was given he was arrested by Lord Grey for the sum of £987, the costs of the original suit, and was thrown into the Marshalsea.

Fearing that the payment of those costs would be deemed an acknowledgment of Lord Grey's right to the honours and arms of his family, Sir Edward Hastings continued a prisoner for twenty-six years, part of which time he was, he says, in some pathetic documents on the subject, “boundyn in fetters of iron lyker a thief or a traitor than like a gentleman of birth.” Imprisonment and chains, the destruction of his own health, and the death of his wife and children, could not shake his firmness. He steadily refused Lord Grey's offer to release him from the debt, if he would admit his superior right to the objects in dispute. The only compromise to which he could be induced to consent was a marriage, either in his own person, or in that of one of his children, with one of those of his adversary; and in case his eldest son John Hastings should marry one of Lord Grey's daughters, he said he would relinquish to him and the heirs of that marriage “the name, right, inheritance, and arms,” etc., which he claimed as heir of John last Earl of Pembroke, “for I doubt not,” he says, “to shew the possession, right, and claim of my father, my brother Hugh, and to me descended as well by right and position of arms, as it is to shew by diem clausit extremum for two parts after the decease of John Hastings last Earl of Pembroke, as for the third part to me after the decease of the last Countess of Pembroke, which descent, beth and Sir Edward Hastings, and that that contest continued for a considerable length of time, and was not determined until the year 1641, upon the question how far the dignity was affected by the rule of law applicable to land. And I wish to call your Lordships' attention to the fact, that when that contest was determined, and that question of law was decided, the title was in abeyance between Anne Hastings [634] and Elizabeth, the daughters of Sir Hugh, who died in 1514. From the year 1514 the title was in abeyance; and in 1641, when it appears that it was decided that the possessio fratris did not apply to a dignity, the parties then claiming the benefit of this dignity were not persons who could of their own authority take it up and exercise the privilege, but they were the descendants of daughters who could not claim the peerage without the act of the crown declaring in whose behalf the abeyance should be determined.

Therefore, at that period of time, it was precisely the same question that has been so often determined with respect to a title in abeyance, in which case there is no presumption arising from no claim having been made, because there is no right in either party to enforce that claim. When, therefore, your Lordships see, that at the period at which the ancestors of the present claimants would have been entitled to assert a title to the present dignity a question of law existed which prevented that right from being asserted until a period at which the title descendible in the line of issue male of the second marriage had fallen into abeyance, I think you have circumstances proved sufficient to explain how it happened that the title had been so long suspended, and why no person came forward to assert it.

This being the only circumstance in this case in which it differs from many others which your Lordships have had before you, and there being quite sufficient, in my opinion, to induce your Lordships to come to the conclusion that this point is not sufficient to overturn the title as derived from the evidence which [635] has been given, I should recommend your Lordships to come to the conclusion, that the claimants have made out their title; that is to say, that Mr. Styleman Le Strange, claiming from Armine, the eldest daughter of Sir Nicholas Le Strange, and Sir Jacob Astley, claiming through Lucy, the second daughter of Sir Nicholas Le Strange, have proved their descent from Sir John de Hastings, the second baron, who appears to have sat in this House in the 18th of Edward I., and held the dignity of the barony of Hastings; that it appears that the dignity fell into abeyance on the death of Sir Hugh Hastings in 1540; and that Mrs. Browne, who is not claiming, but whose title has been proved by the other claimants, is descended from Anne Hastings, the eldest daughter of Sir Hugh Hastings, who died in 1514, and which was therefore the elder branch. If your Lordships come to this decision, you will ascertain the fact that the barony was in abeyance in those three individuals, and that it will remain so till the crown think proper to determine it. I move your Lordships to find that the barony of Hastings was vested as a barony descendible to heirs general of the body in John de Hastings, who died in 1313, and that the said John de Hastings Baron Hastings was summoned to and sat in parliament in the 18th of Edward I., and left one son and daughter Elizabeth by his first marriage, and two sons by his second marriage; that the issue of the said John, the son of the said Baron Hastings, by his first marriage, failed in 1389, and that Frances, the wife of the Reverend Richard Browne, Henry Le Strange Styleman Le Strange, and Sir Jacob right, claim, and inheritance, God's curse and mine have all mine heirs that will not sue the right after me, and upon these points I will . . . . . life;" adding, "for plainly I will never renounce my right without that my son have a great parcel of my right, other than in semblable wise as I have proffered you."

The latest of those remarkable papers, now extant, was written about January 1433-4, when Sir Edward Hastings was still in prison, and in which, as before, he styled himself "Edward Lord Hastings." After 1434 nothing has been discovered respecting him, except his death in January 1437. His son, John Hastings, warned, perhaps, by his father's unhappy fate, seems to have yielded to the usurpation of his rights by the Lords Grey of Ruthyn; and in the reign of King Henry the Eighth the representation of the house of Hastings fell among co-heirs, in which state it has ever since continued, and now remains.—From the original documents in the possession of Mr. Styleman Le Strange.

Astley, Baronet, are descended [636] from the eldest surviving son of the said Sir John Baron Hastings, who died in 1313, by his second marriage; and that the said barony is in abeyance between the said Frances Brown, being descended from Anne, the eldest daughter of Sir Hugh de Hastings, who died in 1540, and the said Henry Le Strange Styleman Le Strange, and the said Sir Jacob Astley, being descended from Elizabeth, the younger daughter of the same Sir Hugh Hastings, the said Henry Le Strange Styleman Le Strange being descended from Armine, the eldest daughter, and the said Sir Jacob Astley being descended from Lucy, the second daughter of Sir Nicholas Le Strange, who died in 1724.

The same was determined in the affirmative, and the Chairman was directed to report the same to the House.

Gardiner Street, and SAVILLE RICHARD WILLIAM L'ESTRANGE, —Respondents [25th and 27th May, 3d and 7th June 1841].

J. M. brought his bill against an infant and several other defendants, claiming, as against them, certain estates, upon two points,—one of law, upon the construction of Lord Sunderlin's will,—the other of fact, that he was the heir male of Lord Sunderlin, charging by his bill that the marriage between his father and mother took place in or about the month of January 1801. With the consent of all parties, one of them being an infant, an issue was directed to inquire whether the plaintiff was the heir at law of his father; and the plaintiff, by [638] the evidence of his mother, proved that the marriage took place in January 1801, and that her son Anthony was born in July of the same year (which would have negatived the claim of the plaintiff, by proving that he had an elder brother); but she swore that Anthony was the last child born before and the plaintiff the eldest son born after her marriage. The infant, having afterwards attained twenty one, was permitted to put in a new answer, and make a new defence; and it was afterwards ordered that a new trial of the issue should take place, with liberty for him and other defendants to appear by counsel on the trial, and to give the judges report in evidence in respect of those witnesses who, having given evidence in the first trial, had died.—Held, that though it is a matter of discretion in a court of equity whether it will first decide the law or the fact, that the Court had, in the present instance, exercised a sound discretion in adopting the latter mode, inasmuch as all but one had concurred in that course, and a different course as to one might have led to different determinations upon the same point:

That the issue directing the jury to inquire whether the plaintiff was the heir at law was the proper issue to be tried:

That though the date of the marriage proved was at variance with that alleged on the record, the Court was right in not dismissing the bill, but granting a new trial, on the ground of their being a misapprehension of the date or the facts:

That the infant, though strictly speaking not a party to the issue, being permitted to make a new defence, was bound by the issue:

That the judges report was properly directed to be received in evidence, being evidence between the same parties and to the same point.

Quere, Whether a party who was an infant when a decree was pronounced, would, in a case like the present, be entitled to be let into a new defence?

[639] The Right Honourable Anthony Malone, being in and previous to the year 1774, seised in fee simple of real estates, of his own acquisition, also seised for life, with remainder in tail male to his nephew Richard Malone afterwards Lord Sunderlin, of certain other lands, and seised for life, with remainder for life to his said nephew, of certain fee farm rents, which estates held by him for life were his paternal estates, by his will of the 12th July 1774, after charging the estates of his own acquisition with certain legacies, devised the estates of which he had the power to dispose in the following words:

"It is my will, and I do accordingly devise all my real and freehold estates of my own purchase or acquisition, or over which I have any power or dominion enabling me to dispose thereof, situate in the counties of Westmeath, Roscommon, Longford, Cavan, and the county of the city of Dublin, or elsewhere in the kingdom of Ireland, unto my nephew Richard Malone, the eldest son and heir of my lately deceased brother Edmond Malone, in whom I place the utmost confidence, his heirs and assigns for ever; not entertaining the least doubt but that he will in due time, and upon the first proper occasion, take care not only to have the said estates, so devised to him by me, but my paternal estates settled in such manner that the said estates may continue in the male line of our family, and in our name and blood, and go to the several branches of it in succession, one after another, according to their priority of birth and seniority of age, the elder and his issue male being always preferred to the younger and his issue male, according to the usual course of family settlements, [640] as by the rules of law the same may be properly done. And I do hereby most earnestly recommend it to my said nephew to see the same so settled, still, however, reserving to himself, and limiting to all the male branches of our family to whom estates only for life shall be limited in remainder or succession, all such proper and reasonable powers as are usually given and attendant upon such limited estates, in order to enable him and them, as they shall be respectively seised in possession, to settle jointures upon their wives in such manner as they shall happen to marry, and to provide for their younger children, or for their daughters, if they should happen to have daughters only, and no issue male, and to make leases for reasonable limited terms when they shall be respectively seised, and in actual possession by virtue of any remainder that shall be so limited to them respectively, and all such other reasonable powers as my said nephew may think necessary or expedient to add, in order to guard against the consequences of unforeseen accidents or events. And I do hereby appoint my said nephew Richard Malone sole executor of this my will, and request that he will take upon him the execution thereof, and the performance of the trusts thereby reposed in him."

On the 8th of May 1776 the testator died, and thereupon his nephew Richard Malone afterwards Lord Sunderlin entered upon the estates of the testator, as well the fee simple estates as those which he held for the term of his life.

Anthony Malone at the time of his death left surviving him the following persons, and no other of the male line of his family, and of his name and blood; [641] (that is to say), the devisee, Richard Malone afterwards Lord Sunderlin, Edmond Malone, brother of the devisee, who were the sons of the testator's eldest brother Edmond, Henry, Richard, and Anthony Malone, the sons of Richard Malone, the testator's youngest brother, and Richard Malone, only son of the aforesaid Henry Malone.

Edmond Malone, the brother of Lord Sunderlin, died in the year 1812 without issue. Henry Malone died in the year 1814, leaving Richard his only son, and two daughters, Alicia, afterwards the wife of Henry O'Connor, and Catherine, afterwards the wife of Michael Whitestone. Lord Sunderlin died in April 1816, intestate, and without issue, having by recoveries acquired the fee of the paternal estates, leaving Henrietta Malone and Catherine Malone, his two sisters, who, as his co-heiresses, upon his death entered upon the estates.

In December 1816, Richard Malone, the son of Henry, instituted a suit in Chancery against Henrietta and Catherine Malone, for having the paternal and acquired estates of Anthony Malone settled in such manner as his will directed.

The cause was partly argued before the Chancellor, when, in consequence of a compromise between the parties to the suit, a deed, dated the 1st of June 1820, was executed by them, whereby the paternal and acquired estates of Anthony Malone were conveyed to trustees by Henrietta and Catherine Malone, upon trust that they should receive for their lives or the life of the survivor an annuity of £3000, and, subject thereto, to the use of Richard Malone for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to him in fee.

[642] Under the deed of the 1st of June 1820 Richard Malone entered into possession of all the estates, and by his will, dated the 16th of April 1830, gave all his estates, real and personal, to Henry O'Connor, since deceased, and to Alicia O'Connor his wife, Hugh Morgan Tuite, and Thomas Ardill, upon trust, after certain payments therein mentioned, to convey the paternal and acquired estates of Anthony Malone to Alicia O'Connor and Henry O'Connor, since deceased, for their lives and the life of the survivor, with remainder to Edmond Malone, since deceased, eldest son of Edmond Malone of Ballinahoun, for life, with remainder to his first and every other son in tail male, with remainder to the appellant John Malone, the second son of the said last-mentioned Edmond Malone, for life, with divers remainders over.

On the 16th January 1834 Richard Malone, the son of Henry Malone, died without issue, leaving his sisters, Alicia O'Connor and Catherine Whitestone, his co-heiresses at law, who were also co-heiresses at law of Lord Sunderlin, and of Anthony Malone; whereupon the respondent John Malone, of Coburg Place, claimed, as the eldest son of Richard Malone (who had died in 1806),—which Richard Malone was the son of Richard, which Richard was one of the brothers of Anthony Malone, the testator,—to be entitled as heir male of that Anthony, under the limitations contained in his will, and on the 11th August 1836 filed his bill against the respondent John Malone, of Gardiner Street, who claimed the estates as heir male of Anthony Malone, alleging that the father of the respondent John Malone, of Coburg Place, had died without lawful issue; and also against the appellant and the other respondents, [643] who derived their title to the estates from the will of the testator Richard Malone; stating the facts before mentioned, and alleging that the defendants at times pretended that said Richard Malone, the respondent's father, died without lawful issue, and that the respondent was not, as his son and heir, entitled to the said estates, respondent not being, as the defendants alleged, legitimate, in consequence of some alleged informality in the marriage of respondent's father and mother, the contrary of which pretence the respondent charged to be the truth, his father and mother having been legally and duly married before the birth of respondent. And the respondent further alleged in his bill, that the said defendants at other times pretended, that although a marriage was solemnized in the month of January 1801, which was before the birth of respondent, between the said Richard Malone and respondent's mother, yet such marriage was not valid, inasmuch as the same was celebrated by a Roman Catholic clergyman, the said Richard Malone being then a protestant. And the respondent further charged, that although his said father had been educated and brought up a member of the established church, yet, several years before his said marriage with the respondent's mother, his said father became, and at the time of said marriage was, and thenceforth continued to be and profess himself, a Roman Catholic, and that he ever after lived in that faith, and died therein; and that the said marriage was legally solemnized between his father and mother, then both professing the Roman catholic religion. And the bill charged, that the said marriage took place in or about the month of January 1801, in the chapel of Townsend Street in the city of Dublin; and the bill [644] prayed, amongst other things, that the trusts of the will of the said Anthony Malone might be carried into execution, and that the respondent's kindred and degree of relationship to the said Anthony Malone might be ascertained, and that the respondent might be decreed entitled to an estate in tail male in possession in all the estates devised by the will of said Anthony Malone; and for an injunction and receiver.

The respondents by their answer submitted that Anthony Malone had made no declaration of trust binding upon Lord Sunderlin; and denied that the father and mother of the respondent were duly or legally married before the birth of the respondent, and insisted that such marriage, as was alleged by the respondent to have taken place, if any such had been celebrated, was not valid, inasmuch as same was celebrated (if at all) by a Roman catholic clergyman only; the father having been at the time of the alleged marriage, and until his death, a protestant of the church of England. The appellant, then a minor, by his answer, submitted his rights to the protection of the Court.

The plaintiff, for the purpose of proving the marriage of his father and mother, examined his mother, Bridget Malone, who, after having deposed to a former marriage between her and Richard Malone, which was celebrated by a degraded Roman catholic priest, and which was invalid, deposed, that she went to Preston in Lancashire, and resided there for nearly two years, that a second ceremony of marriage was performed between them in Townsend Street chapel, then called Lazars Hill, in January 1801, by the Reverend Patrick Smith, a Roman catholic priest; and that at the period of the said marriage, and for some years before, she and her [645] husband both professed the Roman Catholic religion; and she further deposed, that her youngest child living, when the second marriage took place, was named Anthony, who was then about six months old, and was born at Preston, and that the respondent, the plaintiff, was the first child born after the second marriage. In another part of her depositions she stated that her son Anthony was born in Preston in the month of July 1801, and that the marriage took place after her return from Preston to Dublin; that her son Anthony was living, from whom she had received a letter two years ago. The plaintiff examined another witness present at the marriage, who stated that the marriage was celebrated in January 1801, and the marriage was entered by the priest in the register book of the chapel of Townsend Street, under the general date, at the head of the page, of January 1801; and the entry seemed to have been inserted after the entries written under it had been made.

On the 13th May 1837 the cause came on to be heard, when the counsel for the appellant submitted to the Court that, as he would be adult in March following, the cause should stand over as to him; but counsel for John Malone of Coburg Place objecting, the cause proceeded; whereupon the Lord Chancellor, by consent of all the parties, given by counsel in open court, ordered, that an issue should be tried, John Malone of Coburg Place being plaintiff, and Alicia O'Connor, Hugh Morgan Tuite, and Thomas Ardill, defendants, with liberty for John Malone of Gardiner Street to attend by counsel at the trial, to inquire whether the plaintiff John Malone of Coburg Place was the heir at law of his father Richard Malone, deceased. On the [646] 6th of December 1837 the issue came on to be tried, and after the trial had lasted several days a verdict was found for the plaintiff John Malone of Coburg Place.

On the 12th January 1838 the defendants in the issue applied for a new trial, on the grounds that the case made by the plaintiff varied from the case made in the equity cause, that the defendants were surprised at the trial, that the verdict was against evidence, and illegal evidence had been received; whereupon, by an order of the 19th of February 1838, it was ordered, that there should be a new trial of the issue by the order of the 13th of November directed, with liberty to the respondent John Malone of Coburg Place to give the former verdict in evidence, as he might be advised; and as to evidence on the new trial of any of the witnesses who might have died since the former trial, it was ordered, that the Judge's report should be received in lieu thereof. A new trial was had, and, on the 4th December 1838, the plaintiff obtained a verdict, but none of the defendants appeared on the trial.

On the 18th June 1838 the appellant, having on the 25th March of that year attained twenty-one, in pursuance of an order of the 9th of June 1838, upon an application made by him for that purpose, put in a new answer, and insisted, upon the same grounds as the other respondents had done, that the respondent John Malone of Coburg Place was illegitimate; but that if any marriage had taken place between his father and mother, that the marriage had taken place in January 1801, and his brother Anthony, who was born in July 1801, was his elder brother, and had a [647] prior claim; and, having entered into evidence, the cause came on to be heard before the Lord Chancellor on the 5th December 1838, when the Court declared as follows:—"This cause being set down by the plaintiff to be heard against the defendant John Malone, (the appellant), and his counsel having insisted that upon the pleadings and proofs in this cause the plaintiff's bill should be dismissed, the Court is pleased to declare that the same ought not to be so dismissed. And the Court declining to enter into the consideration of the question as to the construction of the will of the Right Honourable Anthony Malone, in the pleadings mentioned, until the right of the plaintiff to raise that question shall have been first determined, it was ordered, that the cause should stand over to be heard, for further directions against the said defendant John Malone, at the same time as the same shall be heard against the several other defendants."

The plaintiff served a draft of the decree, and proceeded to make up the decree; but the appellant having objected, it was never made up or signed by the registrar.

The respondents Alicia O'Connor, Hugh Morgan Tuite, and Thomas Ardill having appealed against the order of the 19th of February 1838, on the 6th day of June 1839 the House of Lords ordered, that the order of the 19th of February 1838 should be varied by omitting such part thereof as directed the plaintiff to be at liberty on such new trial to give the former verdict in evidence, and that the defendants Alicia O'Connor, Hugh Morgan Tuite, and Thomas Ardill, [648] the trustees, should pay the costs of the former trial, and that, subject to such variation, the order should be affirmed.

On the 15th of November 1839 the cause came on to be heard, on the order of the House of Lords, the certificate of the second trial, and for further directions, and a supplemental suit against Saville Richard William L'Estrange, the first tenant in tail under the will of Richard Malone, when it was ordered, that the order of the 6th of June 1839 should be varied in the manner directed by the House of Lords; and it was ordered, that a new trial of the said issue should take place, with liberty for all the parties in the first cause to appear by counsel on the trial, and as to any witnesses examined at the first trial who were dead, the Judge's report to be received in lieu of their evidence, with a reservation of costs, and further directions. And it was further ordered, in the supplemental cause, that the defendant Saville Richard William L'Estrange should be at liberty to appear by counsel at the trial of the issue, and to make full defence, in like manner as if he had been a defendant to the issue; and that the supplemental cause should stand over to be heard at the same time as the original cause.

At the sittings after Hilary Term 1840 a new trial of the issue was had, when, after a trial of nine days, the jury was discharged by the learned Judge, the jurors not having been able to agree to a verdict.

From the orders of the 13th November 1837, the 5th December 1838, and the 15th November 1839, the appellant appealed.

[649] Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Knight Bruce for the Appellant.—When the cause came on to be heard, the appellant, being an infant, objected to the cause being heard till he came of age; the objection was overruled, and an order made for the trial of the issue, with the consent of all parties. The appellant, being an infant, was incapable of giving his consent and attending at the trial. He did not consent; the statement of his consent is an error upon the record, and he is not bound by the trial. The issue as directed is improperly framed. The plaintiff might have been the heir at law of his father, and yet not entitled under the description in the will; his brother might have been living at the time the bill was filed, and died afterwards. The bill ought to have been dismissed, as the case put upon the record differs from the case proved. The validity of the marriage depends upon the date; and if the marriage, as alleged in the bill, took place in January 1801, there is an elder son who was born subsequent to the marriage. The Court, before it directed an issue, ought to have first put a construction upon the will. The whole expense of the trial may be useless if it eventually turns out that there is no trust. In Gordon v. Gordon (3 Swanston, 459) Lord Eldon stated, that the expense and time of the trial was wasted, and that the right ought to have been decided before the character assumed by the plaintiff had been established. So Blackburn v. Jepson (17 Vesey, 473); and in Lynn v. Beaver (1 Tur. and Russ. 63) the trial was stayed until a construction had been put upon the will. There is a serious doubt if the plaintiff succeeds in the issue whether he will be entitled under the will. The latter cases have restricted cases of this [650] nature. Cunliffe v. Cunliffe (Ambler, 686); Knight v. Knight (3 Beavan, 148); Meredith v. Henegge (1 Simons, 542). There is not sufficient certainty either as to the objects or as to the subject matter devised. There is a different direction with regard to L'Estrange and the other parties. Under the liberty for all parties to appear by counsel, they could not address the jury or call witnesses. Wright and another v. Wright (7 Bingham, 459). And it is ordered that the Judge's report be received as evidence, as far as regards those witnesses who have died in the absence of the appellant, who had no opportunity of a cross-examination; and they cited Cockburne and Hussey (2 Ridgeway, 504), and Blake and Vaysie (3 Dow, 192).

Sir William Follett and Mr. Jacob for the Respondents.—There is a mistake as to the dates, but there is no misapprehension as to the facts. Anthony was born at Preston before the marriage, and the appellant was born after their return to Dublin. It frequently happens in trials at nisi prius that there are contradictions as to dates, though the facts are correct. The right course, therefore, under these circumstances, was to submit the case again to the jury, which, with certain variations, was so established by this House. The appellant puts in his answer, enters into evidence, and makes the same defence as the respondents; it is too late to object to the trial of this issue; the right of the plaintiff to be heard depends upon this issue; the right to be heard did not depend upon the issue directed in Gordon v. Gordon. When the plaintiff has established his legitimacy, then the Court will enter into the construction [651]-tion of the will; this is not the proper time to enter upon that subject. The bill ought not to be dismissed, because the bill alleges a marriage in 1801, and there is evidence of a marriage in 1802. It might have been a surprise, and upon that ground a new trial was directed, and this House affirmed that order; but then it is said the issue is not properly framed. If the plaintiff is the heir at law, he must be the heir male, and this is the common form. With regard to his not being able to address the jury, the practice is not uniform. In a case in which Sir William Follett was counsel, Mr. Earl, under a similar direction, addressed the jury. When an issue is drawn, the parties agree who are to have the conduct of it; if the parties are dissatisfied with the directions, they can apply to the Court for other directions. Issues do not bind any particular person; they are directed to inform the conscience of the Court. In Rhodes v. De Beauvoir (6 Bligh, 195) the Tibbutts were ordered to be examined as witnesses, yet they are interested, and were ordered to attend. In Blundell v. Gladstone, before the Vice Chancellor, which it not reported, twenty or thirty persons were interested under the will, yet there was only the tenant for life plaintiff, and one defendant; the remainder-men and other parties interested did not have liberty to attend the trial, not having desired it. In the Duke of Roxborough's case a great number of persons were interested and only some of the parties were ordered to try the issue. In Humphreys v. Hollis (Jacob, 73) three persons who were interested, were not made parties to the issue, and there an action was held to have been properly tried during an abatement by the [652] death of one of the defendants, who was not directed to attend the trial. These parties, though they do not attend the trial, are bound by the issue. Infants likewise are bound by a decree taken by consent. Wall v. Bushby (1 Brown, 484). If the plaintiff wanted to vary the order, he ought to have applied for a rehearing. In Kelsall v. Kelsall (2 M. and K. 409), the Court allowed an infant, after decree, upon his attaining twenty-one, to make a new case. The direction that the Judge's report should be read has been affirmed by this House. The depositions of deceased witnesses might have been read without any order for that purpose. The Judge's report was ordered to be read, in order to save expense of proof.

Mr. Pemberton in reply.—The plaintiff having put his case upon a marriage of 1801, it was proved an eldest son was born in August of that year. He disproved his own case, and the Court ought to have dismissed the bill. If the plaintiff had intended to have made a new case, he ought to have applied to the Court to amend the record, or file the supplemental bill for that purpose. The mother, a witness, and the priest who makes the entry, all concur in fixing the date of the marriage as being in January 1801. If ever there was a state of circumstances favourable to the construction of the law, before the fact of legitimacy was tried, this was the case. Protracted litigation, and expense incurred, which may be perfectly useless. I cannot distinguish this case from Gordon v. Gordon; in both cases the fact of legitimacy was in issue. If the plaintiff had not been legitimate, he had no colour of [653] title. In Rhodes v. De Beauvoir, Tibbutts had a very small interest. If this House had ordered Rhodes to have been examined, and to have excluded him, then that would have been an analogous case. Here is the owner of the estate, having no opportunity of addressing the jury or examining the witnesses.

Lord Chancellor (7th June).—This case involves several points of very considerable importance in the practice of courts of equity, on some of which it will be necessary to come to a decision; and others of which, although they have been discussed at the bar, do not, in the view that I take of this case, call for any opinion.

The contest between the parties arises upon a will of one Anthony Malone, who, by his will, left his property to his nephew, with a recommendation that he should continue that property in the male line of the family. He, however, assumed that this recommendation from the testator did not bind him to settle the property, so as to continue it in the male line of the family; but he conceived that the will gave him an absolute dominion over the property; and he accordingly, or those who claimed through him, settled the property to the present appellant as tenant for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail expectant upon the prior estate for life. The present plaintiff alleges that he is the heir male; that is, the male representative of that Anthony Malone; and, contending that the recommendation in the will of Anthony Malone was obligatory upon Richard Lord Sunderlin, who took under that will he insists that he is now entitled to have the property so settled as [654] that he, John Malone, should be entitled to that property in possession.

In stating this he states the mode in which he derives his relationship from that Anthony Malone who made the will. He states that he is the son of Richard Malone, which Richard Malone was the son of Richard, which Richard was one of the brothers of Anthony Malone the testator; and, according to the statement of it, if these facts were verified and established, no doubt the plaintiff would fill the character which he assumes, of the heir male of the family of Anthony Malone.

It is obvious that a suit so constituted embraces two points; one of fact, and the other of law. It is necessary for the plaintiff, claiming as heir male of Anthony Malone, to make out that he does in fact fill that character. Establishing that fact, then a question of law arises, whether the will of Anthony Malone imposed a duty on Lord Sunderlin, who took immediately under the will, so to settle the estate as to make the estate descendible in the male line of the family of Malone.

In cases of that kind where the party assumes a character which he must establish before he can raise the point at law, it is contended on the part of the present appellant that it is the duty of the Court to decide the point of law in the first instance; because, if the point of law be against the plaintiff, then it is immaterial whether he fills the character he assumes or not; and, for this purpose, the case of Gordon v. Gordon was principally relied upon; other cases were cited, particularly the case of Lynn v. Beaver, which, when looked at, proves to be no authority for that [655] proposition; and if the facts of that case were at all similar to the present, it will be found that the question of practice was not the same, because if the plaintiff in that suit had been one of the next of kin, and the sole question had been whether there were not other next of kin, the question would not have been whether the plaintiff filled a situation entitling him to ask for the decision of the Court, but whether there were not other persons equally filling that situation who ought to be before the Court before the question was decided.

It appears, however, from reference to the decision in Lynn v. Beaver [1 Tur. and Rus. 63], that it was decided by the consent and concurrence of all parties, and it is quite clear that it must have been so. It was suggested at the bar that that might be an error in the report; but it is clear that it was not an error, because it appears that the Master, on the reference to him by the Vice Chancellor, Sir John Leach, found that the plaintiff was not the next of kin. The question was, whether a person of the name of Foster was next of kin; and it came before Lord Eldon on exceptions to the report. Now, upon the exceptions to the report, Lord Eldon had nothing to decide but whether the Master had come to a right conclusion. It was impossible that Lord Eldon should have come to the decision to which he came, unless he had the consent and concurrence of all parties assuming there was a plaintiff before the Court, who was himself the next of kin. That case, therefore, is no authority to the present purpose.

Other cases have occurred within my own experience, which, however, were not cited at the bar, but in [656] which very different questions have been raised, and in which Sir John Leach had adopted a practice which Lord Eldon did not entirely approve of; when cases of this sort, of persons claiming as next of kin, came before the Court, Sir John Leach was in the habit of saying, "I will not decide this question until I have all the parties before the Court who represent the next of kin; they may be numerous, or they may be few." And it was his habit to refer it to the Master in the first instance to ascertain who were the next of kin. Lord Eldon thought that occasioned very considerable expense, which, possibly, at last might be useless; and, therefore, finding that he had a next of kin before the Court who was entitled to fill that character, whether jointly with others or not, he thought it better to decide the question of law between the parties, than first to put them to the expense of deciding who were the next of kin, which might become useless, but in all those cases there was a person filling the character which he assumed.

The case of Gordon v. Gordon [3 Swan, 459] is entitled to the highest consideration, because it is a case which Lord Eldon decided; and Lord Eldon's observations, as reported, would imply that he doubted at least whether it might not have been better to have decided upon the other parts of the case before the expense was incurred of an issue as to whether the plaintiff was heir at law or not. I cannot but feel very considerable doubt whether these expressions did fall from Lord Eldon, at least without some qualification which is not to be found in the report; because, when the facts of that case were considered, (and I very well remember the [657] case at the bar,) it is clear that the Court could not deal with the question without knowing who was the heir at law.

That was a contest between two brothers for the family estates. It related to the legitimacy of the elder one, the younger brother claiming because he alleged the elder brother was illegitimate. In that contest the parties came to an arrangement between themselves, by which they agreed upon a certain division of the property. It afterwards appeared that the younger brother, at the time he got his elder brother to enter into this compromise, upon the supposed doubt whether the marriage had taken place anterior to the birth of the eldest son, was in possession of evidence of the marriage, and that, therefore, had induced his brother to part with this property, to which the elder brother was clearly entitled, upon the supposition of there being a doubt as to the marriage, when, in point of fact, he was in possession of evidence to prove it. The elder brother discovering this, filed his bill to be released from that arrangement, upon the ground that the younger brother, had practised a fraud upon him, and ultimately succeeded. But how could that question have been decided between the parties without the fact being known whether the elder brother was legitimate or illegitimate. The whole foundation of the charge was, that his younger brother knew it, and concealed the fact from him, when he got him to come into the arrangement. It is impossible, therefore, that Lord Eldon could have meant this,—that the Court had decided whether the arrangement was fraudulent or not, without first ascertaining the fact upon which the existence of the alleged fraud rested.

[658] If these authorities do not lead to a conclusion favourable to the party appealing in this case, there is no authority in his favour. In my experience I have never known a case take the turn which it is alleged this case ought to take. A party comes assuming a certain character, and, founded upon that character, assumes a certain right to the decision of the Court with respect to the property in question. If he has not first established the character he assumes, how can the Court deal with the consequential inference, without knowing whether he is the party that he assumes to be?

Then another observation which arises is, that, generally speaking, it would lead to very evil consequences if this Court were to adopt that course of practice, so as to enable a plaintiff to obtain the decision of the Court on the point of law, without putting him to the proof of the character which he assumes. If the defendants had demurred to the bill, for the purpose of raising the question at law, the fact of the plaintiff being heir male would have been admitted. Any one of the defendants had the power, if they had thought fit to adopt that course, by demurrer, to have admitted, for the purpose of argument, that the plaintiff was,—what he claimed to be,—heir at law, but adding, we demur, because we allege that, even assuming that fact to be so, he has no right to the equity he claims; but they did not think proper so to do; and the plaintiff proceeds with his case before the Court, bound to prove the fact, if he can, by evidence, or, if not, at all events to prove sufficient to entitle him to an opportunity of proving before a jury that he does maintain the character which on the pleadings he has assumed, and on the assumption of which alone he claims to be en-[659]-titled to the equity which he asks the Court to decree in his favour.

Supposing this were merely a matter of discretion, which I admit it may be considered to be, and that there is no positive rule upon the subject,—and I can easily conceive a case occurring in which it would be left to the discretion of the Court either to dismiss the plaintiff's bill upon the facts as they appeared, or to declare that, even assuming the plaintiff to be what he asserted himself to be, still he could have no equity,—then the question is, what is right to be done in that case, assuming that there is a discretion in the Court, either to decide the point of law first, or to put the plaintiff to prove his title first.

The question is raised as to the first order pronounced in this case in the year 1837, by which the Court directed an issue to be tried, whether the plaintiff was the heir male of his father. Now, the form of that has given rise to some singular objections at the bar. At that time the present appellant, who was then the defendant, was a minor. The property which had descended to those claiming through Lord Sunderlin had become vested in two trustees, and under that trust the present appellant was entitled to the estate as tenant for life in remainder. The order for the issue is drawn up by consent, and that order is the first appealed from.

Now, a case has been referred to, for the purpose of shewing that, though an infant is not competent to give consent, that is to say, that it is the duty of those who represent the infant to abstain from consenting, he not being of age to bind himself, or by his own act to dispose of property which may belong to him, yet [660] that if an infant does consent he is bound by that consent.

It does not appear to me at all necessary to enter further into that question, because if your Lordships shall be of opinion that the order made in 1837 was a right order to be made, if that consent had not been given, it is quite immaterial to consider whether the infant ought or ought not to be bound by that consent. But there is another reason which makes it immaterial to consider how far that consent was binding upon the infant, which is this: that the Court has thought proper in a subsequent stage of the cause to relieve the infant from the consequences of that consent, and to permit him to put in a new answer, and to go into new evidence. And the Court has ultimately come to a decision, which is the principal subject matter of this appeal, not upon the order for the issue in 1837, but upon the order of 1839, when this appellant had attained his majority, when he had been permitted by the Court to put in a new answer, and to enter into a new defence, and when he was in a situation to ask the Court to come to such an adjudication upon the cause as the Court might think just, without reference to the former proceedings. It appears, therefore, immaterial to consider the order of 1837, except so far as, that order having existed, and the trials having taken place under it, it might operate upon the discretion of the Court, if the Court had a discretion to exercise, in considering what course it ought to adopt when the cause ultimately came before it in 1839.

I should here observe upon a part of the case which was very much pressed at the bar, that the bill ought to have been dismissed on this ground: that the [661] plaintiff, having alleged himself to be the legitimate son of his father Richard, had then disproved his own legitimacy by the evidence of his mother Bridget, who had been examined to prove his legitimacy, but who actually proved that he was illegitimate, and; upon the depositions as printed for the appellant, no doubt that would be the result of the evidence of Bridget the mother; but those are only partial extracts from the depositions, which ought not to be looked at without looking at other parts of the same depositions; and when the deposition of Bridget the mother is looked at, although there is evidently an inaccuracy in one part of her deposition, in the other it is perfectly plain that she never meant to depose to any facts which constituted proof of the illegitimacy of her son: for Bridget says, that having contracted this marriage, and there being a doubt whether the marriage was valid, upon the ground of doubt whether the husband was a protestant or a catholic, or whether he had been a catholic twelve months previous to the marriage, she states the period at which the child was born, — she states the marriage to have taken place in January 1801, and in another part of her deposition she states the elder brother, Anthony, to have been born in July 1801, which of course would have made him the eldest child of the marriage; but in another part of the deposition she says, in so many words, that the present plaintiff in the suit was the first child born after the marriage in January 1801; and she says, that the other, who would have been the elder brother, born in July 1801, was the child born last preceding the marriage. Therefore there is clearly some misapprehension, either as to date or to some other circumstances. But it is clear [662] that, taking the whole of this deposition together, she states and proves, supposing what she says to be true, that the plaintiff was born the first child after the marriage, and consequently, therefore, would be the eldest son and heir of Richard. It is quite clear to me, therefore, that upon such evidence it would have been quite out of the question for the Court of Chancery in Ireland to have dismissed the bill. There may have been ground for doubt, arising from ambiguity or mistake in the evidence, but it certainly was a case which required further investigation before it could be dismissed.

Then the cause proceeded. The issue was tried, and that took place which has been the subject of discussion at the bar, that at the trial, instead of adhering to the marriage as it had been represented to have taken place, other evidence was given which took the other party by surprise, and which was thought a sufficient ground for the Lord Chancellor of Ireland to direct a new trial of that issue. All this time the defendant remained a minor; but he attained his majority in March 1838, and then he applied for leave to put in a new answer, and to enter into a new defence, and leave was given.

Now, that leave having been given, and that course having been adopted, and that not being a subject of complaint at the bar, I abstain from entering into that part of the case, further than to observe, that if the question should arise, how far a party who was an infant during the time when a decree was pronounced, afterwards attaining twenty-one, is entitled to be let into a new defence in a case like this,—if that question should arise, it is one which, I think, will require [663] serious consideration. There is very great obscurity and a great deal of contradiction in the authorities upon that subject, and it is a proper subject for very serious consideration whenever the question may arise. In this case it was done, and it has not been complained of, and, therefore, your Lordships can come to no decision upon that point.

That, however, put the plaintiff in this situation, that although an order has been made for an issue, and although proceedings have taken place under that order, no issue has, in fact, been tried, coming to any conclusion as to the character of the plaintiff in this suit. After the defendant had attained twenty-one, he applied to put in a new answer, claiming an interest in this property in common with others, against the claim of the plaintiff. The whole case must depend on the plaintiff's proof of the fact, and the conclusion to be come to upon the law, because if he succeeds in both, of course all those who claim under Lord Sunderlin's will lose their estate; they all stand on Lord Sunderlin's title, and their rights depend upon whether he had or had not a right under that will to dispose of the property as he did; if he had not, and if the plaintiff is the heir male, he is clearly entitled. I am far from assuming that that will be the result of this cause, but I am only stating what is the situation of the parties.

The Court, as I have stated, allowed this defendant to put in a new answer. He made a new defence; and the case came on before the Court of Chancery in Ireland, upon an order of the House, altering, in some respects, the direction for the new trial which the Court of Chancery in Ireland had made; at the [664] same time it came on on a new case made by this appellant. I pass over the intermediate order which is the subject of appeal, namely, an order of a prior date, in which the Court merely directed the cause to stand over as a subject matter of appeal, which your Lordships would not be very much disposed to encourage, particularly when, in the course of events, it was perfectly impossible that that appeal should be heard until after the time was expired to which the cause was postponed. I come at once to the last order of November 1839, in which the appellant, relieved from the consequences of the order of 1837, proceeded to make a new defence, and to examine witnesses of his own, and came before the Court of Chancery as upon an original hearing. The cause, however, came on, as far as the other parties were concerned, upon the order of this House directing the Court of Chancery in Ireland to make certain alterations in the order which had been made by that Court.

The appellant says that he considers himself as much entitled as he would have been upon the original hearing to have the decision of the Court upon the construction of the will, before any investigation was directed as to the title which the plaintiff claimed in his character of heir male.

Now, if I am right in assuming that it is a question for the discretion of the Court whether the Court will decide, in the first instance, upon the construction of the will, or will take the course of sending the question of fact to an issue, I will beg your Lordships to consider what was the subject matter then submitted to the discretion of the Court. It was then a matter of more doubt than it could have been supposed to be in [665] the outset, whether the plaintiff did or did not sustain the character he assumed. He had obtained a verdict; but upon application to the Court a new trial had been directed, and the order directing a new trial had been affirmed by this House. Here then was a question involving the interests of various defendants, some tenants for life, others tenants in remainder, and other persons interested under the title derived from Lord Sunderlin, all of whom had, by the order of 1837, bound themselves to the propriety of the issue trying the plaintiff's title, and who, therefore, could not then dispute it. That order of 1837, at least as to them, was binding. They had been through various proceedings questioning the result of that trial, and they were all parties to the order of this House; at least the defendants in the action were parties to the order of this House directing that the new trial should proceed, with certain modifications, which were introduced into the order. It appears, therefore, that the plaintiff was claiming against various defendants, all of whom, with the exception of the present appellant, had consented and were bound to take the course of having the plaintiff's title in the first instance decided.

Now, if, as I conceive, it would be right in ordinary cases,—I am not at all stating that a case may not arise in which the Court might not be justified in taking the contrary course,—but if in ordinary cases the Court would be right in calling upon the plaintiff to establish the character in which he is suing, how much more so must it be in the exercise of the discretion of the Court when all but one have concurred in the mode of investigating the question between the parties? Now, what would have been the result if a different course [666] had been followed? Supposing the Court had attended to the application of the appellant, and had said, quoad the present appellant, we will look at the will, and see whether the plaintiff is entitled to a decision upon that will, assuming that he is what he represents himself to be; if the Court had come to a decision against the plaintiff, the present bill would have been dismissed, quoad the present appellant, but the bill would not have been dismissed against the other defendants. The trial must have gone on if the parties had chosen, and the plaintiff might have got a verdict establishing his title as eldest legitimate son of Richard his father; and, having obtained that, he would have a right to ask the Court to decide upon the construction of the will. The equity of that Court might or might not have been administered by the same individual; but, whether that was so or not, a contrary conclusion might have been come to; and if it had been against the plaintiff he might have come to this bar to have that question decided, whether that construction of the will was right or not; and if this House had been of opinion that the Court below had come to an erroneous conclusion in dismissing the plaintiff's bill, the plaintiff would succeed, but succeed against whom?—against all but the most important party represented at this bar; because if the bill had been dismissed as against all but the present appellant, the present appellant would be no longer a party to the proceeding. That is a position which there would have been great reason to regret if the cause had come to this House for adjudication. If the Court was entitled to consider the expediency of the one course or the other, it does not appear to me that, under the circumstances, there could have been a [667] doubt as to the proper exercise of the discretion of the Court in proceeding in the course which it had proceeded for several years; namely, ascertaining first the accuracy of the representation of the plaintiff as to the character which he assumed.

Therefore, as to the substance of the order of 1839, I have no hesitation in stating, that in my opinion that order was correct. Some objections have been made as to the form of the order, which, however, I apprehend to be equally untenable with those to which I have adverted. One objection is, that the form in which the question of right was directed to be tried was not the form in which a matter of that sort could be investigated. The plaintiff claims as heir male; the issue is, whether he be or be not heir male. He endeavours to make out that fact by showing that he is the eldest son after the marriage. No doubt that, if established, would constitute his title. But then it is said that this may let in a title which has accrued subsequently to the institution of the suit. The issue was directed to try the real point, the real point being the character of the heir male. The issue, therefore, being directed to try that question, the rest are merely the means by which the character so stated may be established.

Then it is said, that the issue is, not to try whether he is heir male, but to try whether he is heir; and it is wrong, because it ought to have been to try whether he is heir male; that is to say, the party claiming as heir male, namely, as eldest son of his father, that it is too vague and too ambiguous to try whether he is heir, but that it ought to have been, whether he is heir male,—whether he is the eldest son. The result of [668] the investigation under the issue as directed I apprehend would be quite satisfactory as to whether he was heir male or not; but that is seriously put forward as one of the grounds of objection.

Another ground, of more importance, no doubt, but which is equally untenable, regard being had to the practice of courts of equity upon this subject, is, that the issue which has been tried is an issue which binds him, but to which he is not, strictly speaking, a party. That is the ordinary course in which issues are directed by a court of equity to be tried, and of necessity it is so, because questions arise which affect the rights of a great variety of parties who may be all interested in the question of the construction of the will; but because an issue is directed all the parties cannot be defendants. Who is to conduct the defence? Cases have occurred, and some in which I have myself directed issues, where persons were interested in the same estate, and interested in the same question, and where there appeared no means of selecting, between the one and the other, which should be the party to conduct the defence; and I remember one case particularly, of very great importance, in which it was so equally balanced between the two that I thought it right to give them an equal chance, and, therefore, I made them both parties to the issue, and put it to them to choose among themselves who should be intrusted with the defence, and I think that succeeded; they did select those who should be intrusted with the defence, without being bound by it. But it frequently happens, in a case of that sort, that a great number of persons are interested; there may be twenty or thirty persons interested in the result of the proceeding. Are they all [669] to be defendants, and all to have an equal title to conduct the defence? That would be inconvenient, and would be so impracticable, that it is not the course of the Court. The Court selects those persons whom it thinks the most proper to be selected for that purpose, and, if the case requires it, permits the other parties to attend, to see that the case is properly conducted, and that justice is done. Here the Court very properly selected those individuals who represented all the interests of those claiming under the will of Lord Sunderlin; it selected the trustees, whom the devisees, the owners of the estates, had selected to conduct the defence; and the order of 1839 gave to the present appellant, together with others, a right to attend the trial, to see whether his trustees properly conducted the defence.

That being the course of the proceeding, and that being the form of this issue, that disposes of several other minor points which were urged. The parties to the action at law are, of course, claiming against all the trustees, and representing all under an adverse title; if so, the evidence is to be regulated in the same way. Then there is no objection to the evidence of the persons who have been examined, and who may have died since the former issue, and prior to the trial of the issue now directed, being laid before the jury, by the best means the Court has of knowing what is said, namely, by the notes of the Judge being read to the jury. Courts of equity are in the habit, for the purpose of saving expense, of giving directions as to the mode of trial, which might not be correct unless such directions were given; for instance, in directing proceedings to be laid before a jury, it dispenses with the [670] formal proof of facts established before the court of equity; it saves the party the expense of going through that formal proof, and directs certain evidence to be received before the jury.

Then there are other objections also founded upon this; namely, that the present appellant, the defendant, is affected by evidence which might or might not have been false. But when your Lordships consider that the point which has been tried is the same point, and between the same parties, in which the Court came to this conclusion on the original hearing, I have no hesitation in saying I think the Court came to a right conclusion, and that, if the hearing of 1839 had been the first hearing, and no order had been made in 1837, and no order in 1838, and no intermediate trial, it would have equally been so. So much difficulty has arisen in ascertaining the truth, that, in my opinion, it was the right course for the Court to pursue, to proceed, by means of an issue, to establish the fact in the first instance, so as to enable the Court then to act upon the fact, when found. All these objections having failed, I submit to your Lordships the proper course for this House will be to dismiss the appeal, with costs.

Orders affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

[671] ON A WRIT OF ERROR FROM THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

EDWARD GILL FLIGHT, THOMAS FLIGHT, and JOHN KNIGHT,—Plaintiffs in Error; JOHN THOMAS,—Defendant in Error [8th, 10th, and 14th June 1841].

[Mews Dig. i. 352; v. 1062, 1079, 1133. S.C. 8 Cl. and F. 231; 5 Jur. 811; and in K.B. and Ex. Ch. 11 Ad. and E. 688; 10 L.J. Ex. 529. Explained in *Eaton v. Under 2 and 3 Will. IV. cap. 71, sects. 3 and 4,* a party is entitled to maintain an action for an obstruction to the enjoyment of light and air, though the twenty years' enjoyment has been obstructed by an interruption which was made for thirty-three days previous to the expiration of the twenty years. The interruption, in order to prevent an action being maintained, must be an interruption acquiesced in for one year after the party interrupted shall have had notice thereof.

[672] This was an action on the case, brought by Thomas, the defendant in error, against Flight and others, the plaintiffs in error, for raising a wall against a window in a house occupied by Thomas, whereby the light and air were prevented from entering through the window into the house.

* By the third section it is enacted, that when the access and use of light to and for any dwelling house, workshop, or other building shall have been actually enjoyed therewith for the full period of twenty years without interruption, the right thereto shall be deemed absolute and indefeasible, any local usage or custom to the contrary notwithstanding, unless it shall appear that the same was enjoyed by some consent or agreement expressly made or given for that purpose by deed or writing.

By the fourth section it is enacted, that each of the respective periods of years herein-before mentioned shall be deemed and taken to be the period next before some suit or action wherein the claim or matter to which such period may relate shall have been or shall be brought into question; and that no act or other matter shall be deemed to be an interruption, within the meaning of this statute, unless the same shall have been or shall be submitted to or acquiesced in for one year after the party interrupted shall have had or shall have notice thereof, and of the person making or authorizing the same to be made.

The defendants pleaded, that at the time of their raising the wall the window had existed and been enjoyed for nineteen years and part of another year only; and that the wall continued from the time of the raising thereof continually until the commencement of the suit, and until the time of pleading; and that the period of one year did not elapse from the said time of the raising of the wall, before or until the commencement of the suit; and that at the time of raising of the wall, to wit, on the 1st day of January, A.D. 1832, and from the time of such raising continually until the commencement of the suit, Thomas had notice that the defendants had raised the wall, and thereby prevented the light and air from entering the house through the window, with a traverse, that at the time of erecting the said wall the light and air ought to have entered in the manner and form alleged by Thomas.

Knight pleaded to both these counts, in the same manner as the Flights.

At the trial before Parke, B., at the Dorchester summer assizes, 1838, it was proved, that at the time of the raising the wall by the defendants the part of the window mentioned in the plea had been enjoyed for the space of nineteen years and 330 days; that the space of one year had not elapsed from the time of the raising of the wall before the commencement of the [673] suit; that at the time of the commencement of the suit the window had been enjoyed for the full space of twenty years, without any interruption, save and except the interruption mentioned; and that the plaintiff had notice of the wall being raised, whereby the light and air were prevented entering the house. The Judge, upon these facts, directed the jury to find (who found) a verdict for the plaintiff. The plaintiffs tendered a bill of exceptions to the Judge, who, having sealed the same, and judgment being entered upon the verdict in the Queen's Bench, a writ of error was brought in the Exchequer Chamber, where, upon argument, the judgment of the Court below was affirmed.

Upon this judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber a writ of error was brought.

Sir William Follett and Serjeant Manning for the Plaintiffs in Error.—The window had only existed nineteen years and a fraction when the defendants raised the wall against the window. The question is, whether the plaintiffs can maintain an action. By the old law they could not have maintained an action unless there had been a use of twenty years, whence a presumption would have arisen of a grant. The act was introduced by Lord Tenterden, in order to give facilities in the pleadings and proof, but not to alter the period from which a presumption of the right would arise. The consequence of holding that this action can be maintained would be, that an act, legal in the first instance, would afterwards become illegal. If the owner of the window had thrown down the wall he would have [674] been liable to an action; yet, after the twenty years had expired, he might have brought an action against the owner of the wall, and both actions might come on to be tried before the same Judge, at the same assizes. An act lawful in its origin cannot be made unlawful by any thing that afterwards occurs. Mr. Baron Parke says, "he should be glad if the absurdity arising from the clauses could be got rid of." In order to get rid of absurd consequences, the act of parliament ought to have been construed by the Judges in a different way. There is a variety of cases where a literal construction would work a wrong, where the Courts, contrary to the literal construction, have given an interpretation which would work no wrong. The intent of the act of parliament is to be regarded (Co. 2 Inst. 112; Co. Litt. 360 a; Plowden, 88, 398).

Mr. Erle for the Defendant in Error.—The title of the defendant to the enjoyment of light depends upon the construction of the act of parliament. If he has been in possession of the window without such an interruption as the act contemplates he is clearly entitled to the enjoyment of it; but the interruption, as defined by the act of parliament, must be for one year during the currency of the twenty years, and no such interruption has in the present case existed. The words of the act are perfectly clear and unambiguous, and, whatever may be the consequences, courts give effect to clear and unambiguous words. Every court has sanctioned this construction. Wright v. Williams (1 Mee and W. 77), Jones v. [675] Pricel (3 Bing ham's New Cases, 52), Tickle v. Brown (4 Adolphus and Ellis, 369). There was an inchoate right for maintaining an action for building up the wall during the twentieth year, and there are many instances of acts legal in their commencement becoming illegal. Insolvent pays a brother's debt, but if within three months he takes the benefit of the act it is an illegal payment, 1 and 2 Vict. c. 110, sec. 59. So, in the case of bankruptcy, acts legal in their commencement may become illegal by relation back.

Sir William Follett in reply.—If an interruption of a day had taken place before the act the twenty years must be reckoned from that interruption. Does the act mean that a person who has never enjoyed the right for twenty years can maintain an action to enforce his right? Such a construction would be in direct violation of the sixth section of the act: "that, in the cases mentioned in the act, no presumption shall be allowed in favour of any claim upon proof of the enjoyment of the right for a less period than the period mentioned in the act." It is said in bankruptcy, that an act legal in its commencement may afterwards become illegal; in that case there is an alteration in the circumstances of the party; here the parties stand in the same relation, and that which was legal before is now illegal. In all future cases nineteen years and a day will be sufficient to constitute a right. In rights of way and rights of water, if the judgment below be confirmed, the period which constitutes the right will be altered, and the whole term of the law unsettled.

[676] Lord Chancellor (14th June).—The facts of this case, as stated in the bill of exceptions, are, that a window having been created, and having been enjoyed for nearly twenty years, in the course of the last year, before the expiration of the twenty years, the defendant erected a wall, which the plaintiff complains obstructed the light and air of that window. Upon these facts being proved, and error assigned under the direction of the learned Judge who presided at the trial, as the bill of exceptions expresses it, "the said Baron did then and there declare and deliver his opinion to the jury that the several matters so shewn and proved to the said jury were sufficient, and ought to be allowed as decisive evidence, that the light and air ought to have entered through the said front of the same window in manner and form as the said plaintiff had in his said replication to those pleas respectively in that behalf alleged, and to entitle the said plaintiff to a verdict upon the issues raised in his replication to those pleas respectively, and with that direction left the same to the said jury."

This turns upon two sections of the act of the 2d and 3d Will. IV. chap. 71, by the third of which sections it is enacted, "that when the access and use of light to and for any dwelling house, workshop, or other building shall have been actually enjoyed therewith for the full period of twenty years without interruption, the right thereto shall be deemed absolute and indefeasible, any local usage or custom to the contrary notwithstanding." By the next section it is provided, "that each of the respective periods of years herein-before mentioned shall be deemed and [677] taken to be the period next before some suit or action, wherein the claim or matter to which such period may relate shall have been or shall be brought into question, and that no act or other matter shall be deemed to be an interruption, within the meaning of this statute, unless the same shall have been or shall be submitted to or acquiesced in for one year after the party interrupted shall have had or shall have notice thereof, and of the person making or authorizing the same to be made."

These being the words of the act of parliament, and the fact in this case being, that the twenty years' enjoyment of the window expired before the year expired after the erection of the wall which occasioned the interruption, so that, in point of fact, when the suit had commenced twenty years had elapsed from the time when the window was first opened, and one year had not elapsed since the time when the obstruction was erected, the question is, whether the learned Baron was correct in stating to the jury, that under the provisions of this act it gave the plaintiff a right of action.

The argument at the bar principally rested upon this, that there had not been twenty years' enjoyment. That there had not been a year's interruption was clear from the facts stated upon the bill of exceptions; but the ground of the objection to the direction of the learned Judge was, that there had not been twenty years' enjoyment. Now, in point of fact, there is no doubt that there was not twenty years' enjoyment, according to the ordinary meaning and usage of that term, but whether there had or had not been twenty years' enjoyment within the meaning of the act, because [678] whatever term the act uses, if it explains the meaning of that term, it is quite immaterial whether the word may or may not be used in any other sense, where it is not explained what the meaning of the term is. Now, as I read these two sections, the meaning is, that there must be twenty years from the commencement of the right to enjoyment to the commencement of the suit, and no interruption shall be considered as an interruption within the meaning of the act,—that is to say, for the purpose of interfering with the twenty years,—unless that interruption shall have lasted one year. The act, therefore, explains what it means by enjoyment without an interruption of one year's duration. Twenty years must elapse, but no interruption shall be considered as preventing the twenty years from running unless that interruption has a duration of one year.

Now, I think it was hardly disputed (although when it was put to the learned counsel an attempt was made to show a distinction) that, within the terms of the act, if an interruption of any duration had taken place, and had ceased during the running of the twenty years, so that at the expiration of the twenty years there was no obstruction that would prevent the action being brought at the expiration of the twenty years, it must be so within the terms of the act, because the objection is, not that there is not twenty years' enjoyment, but that there is not twenty years' enjoyment without interruption, and whether that interruption be in the middle or be at the end of the term cannot, within the meaning of this clause, create any difference in the result.

[679] That would be the construction which, I should think, would be the obvious construction of these two clauses, if there had been no decision upon the subject. It does, however, so happen that in all the Courts at Westminster this question has arisen more or less directly.

In the case of Jones v. Price the real point decided was, that the twenty years must be pleaded as being next before the commencement of the suit. The right was there laid, not as next before the obstruction created, but next before the commencement of the suit. Now, if the right mode of pleading be next before the commencement of the suit, that of course implies that the plea would have been bad if it had been next before the injury complained of.

In Richards v. Fry, in 7 Adolphus and Ellis, page 704, it was held, that the laying the term of enjoyment before the act complained of was bad, and that it ought to have been next before the commencement of the suit. There is also the case of Wright v. Williams, and the case of Lawson v. Langley, in 4 Adolphus and Ellis, page 890; which cases prove this,—not only that it is good to lay the right twenty years before the commencement of the suit, but that it is bad if it is not so laid. It is bad if it is laid next before the injury complained of. Those cases decide that, according to the true construction of the act, the twenty years is to be reckoned from the date of the commencement of the right claimed until the commencement of the suit.

Then we have only to put a construction on the words of the act relating to the interruption. The words of the act are positive,—“that no interruption [680] for less than one year shall be reckoned for the purpose of this act,”—the purpose of the act being to give twenty years' enjoyment the effect of absolute right,—that no interruption of the enjoyment of that right for less than one year shall have effect for the purposes of the act.

Under these circumstances I think there cannot be a doubt that the construction put upon this act by the Court below was a correct construction, and I shall move your Lordships to affirm the judgment, with costs.

Lord Brougham.—I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend, that the learned Baron to whose direction the exception was taken, which was afterwards brought by writ of error to the Exchequer Chamber, and subsequently brought from the Exchequer Chamber before this House, was right. I cannot get over the words of the act in the fourth section, with respect to the commencement of the twenty years being next before the action brought, and the proviso with respect to an interruption for one year's duration. The arguments which were used to show, not merely the inconvenient consequences, but the absurd consequences, that might result, I do not think sufficient to countervail the plain and obvious meaning of the words. I cannot get rid of those words; and the absurdity imputed in the argument to that construction does not appear to me sufficient to warrant a departure from that plain construction. Then, as my noble and learned friend has remarked, though the precise case may not have arisen, yet, as far as the cases have approached to the present case, they are clearly in [681] favour of this construction. As to the doubt said to be thrown out with reference to one of those cases, namely, Wright v. Williams, I think it is not necessary to say more than to observe, that I, for one, certainly do not partake of that doubt. I agree, therefore, with my noble and learned friend, that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber must be affirmed.

Affirmed with costs.

FROM THE COURT OF CHANCERY.

JAMES KAY,—Appellant; JOHN MARSHALL the elder, JAMES GARTH MARSHALL, and HENRY COWPER MARSHALL,—Respondents [10th, 14th, 15th, and 18th June 1841].

A patent was taken out for new and improved machinery for spinning flax. The improvement consisted in spinning flax at a shorter reach than it had been hitherto spun, by fixing the rollers at two inches and a half distance from each other; but spinning machines having before been used for varying the distances between the rollers, according to the length of the staple or fibre to be spun, though flax had never been spun at so short a distance,—Held, that the patentee had failed in his claim to a new invention, and that his patent was void.

In 1835 a bill was filed by the appellant against the respondents, stating that in the year 1824 the appellant, having invented new and improved machinery for preparing and spinning flax, hemp, and other fibrous substances by power, obtained letters patent, dated the 26th July 1825, granting to him, his executors, administrators, and assigns, the sole and exclusive right and privilege of making, using, exercising, and vending his invention in Great Britain and Ireland for the period of fourteen years. That by a specification [683] under his hand and seal, dated the 26th January 1826, and duly enrolled, after describing the nature of his invention and its several parts, and in what manner the same was to be performed, he declared that what he claimed as his invention in respect of new machinery for preparing flax, hemp, and other fibrous substances were the macerating vessels marked (B) in the drawing annexed to the specification, and the trough of water marked (C) in such drawing; and that what he claimed as his invention in respect of improved machinery for spinning flax, hemp, and other fibrous substances was the wooden or other trough marked (D) in the drawing for holding the rovings when taken from the macerating vessels, and the placing of the retaining rollers (cc) and the drawing rollers (cc) nearer to each other than they had ever before been placed, say within two inches and a half of each other, for the purpose aforesaid.

The bill stated, that, in the process of spinning flax by power, the skein of flax commonly called a roving was drawn out or elongated, immediately before its being spun, by means of drawing and retaining rollers, the drawing rollers moving at a greater velocity than the retaining rollers; and that, in the machinery for spinning flax by power commonly in use prior to the appellant's said invention, the drawing and retaining rollers were placed at a distance of from twelve to twenty inches, or thereabouts, from each other, such distance being regulated by the length of the staple or fibre of the flax, and that such machinery was not adapted to the spinning of flax in a wet or macerated state, by reason that wet or macerated flax could not, when the rollers were placed at the distance of the [684] ordinary length of the staple, be drawn out or elongated to the requisite degree of fineness, without slipping or breaking; that the appellant, after many experiments, discovered that by a new combination of the drawing and retaining rollers, that is to say, by placing the drawing rollers at a distance of two inches and a half only from the retaining rollers, the skein of flax or roving might be drawn out and spun in a wet or macerated state, and that when drawn out and spun in such prepared state a thread of a much finer and stronger texture could be produced than could be produced from the skein or roving drawn and spun with the machinery and according to the method in use prior to the appellant's said invention.

The bill then stated, that subsequently to the date of the appellant's letters patent the process of macerating flax in the mode described in his specification had become altogether, or in a considerable degree, unnecessary, the skein or thread of flax being, by reason of the improved preparation thereof, rendered capable of being sufficiently wetted for drawing and spinning by being made merely to pass through a trough of water previously to being drawn out and spun, which prior to such improved mode of preparation was not the case.

The bill then stated, that the appellant's invention of machinery for spinning flax by means of placing the drawing rollers within the said short distance of the retaining rollers was a new invention, and one of great public utility, but that nevertheless the defendants had, in violation of his exclusive right to the benefit of his invention, caused great quantities of new and improved machinery for spinning flax to be constructed upon the principle of the appellant's invention, and had used and continued to use the same in their spinning mills at Leeds and elsewhere in the county of York, and also at Shrewsbury, and elsewhere in England.

The bill prayed that the defendants might be restrained from all further infringement of the appellant's patent, and that they might account for the profits derived from the use of the appellant's invention in the spinning of flax.

The respondents, after the time for demurring had expired, obtained leave of the Court to put in, and they accordingly put in, a general demurrer to the bill, which came on to be argued, on the 2d June 1835, before his Honour the Vice Chancellor, when it was ordered that the demurrer should stand over, with liberty to the appellant to bring such action as he might be advised, but which order was afterwards discharged by the Lord Chancellor, and the demurrer overruled.

The respondents, upon an application to the Master of the Rolls for leave to file two pleas to the bill, which was granted, put in two pleas to the bill, and an answer in support thereof, whereby the respondents pleaded,—

First, the appellant had not before and at the time of the making of the letters patent in the bill mentioned found out and invented any new and improved machinery, as in the bill and the letters patent and specification was alleged:

Secondly, the alleged invention of the appellant, as in the said bill and letters patent and specification mentioned and described, was not before and at the time of the making of the said letters patent of much or any public benefit and utility, as in the said bill and letters patent was alleged.

[686] On the 2d June 1836, on the hearing of the cause, the Master of the Rolls ordered that the parties should proceed to a trial at law, at the then next summer assizes for the county of York, upon the following issues:—

First, whether the appellant had before and at the time of the making of the letters patent in the bill mentioned found out and invented any new machinery, as in the said bill and letters patent and specification was alleged:

Second, whether the alleged invention of the appellant, as in the bill and letters patent and specification mentioned and described, was before and at the time of the making of the said letters patent of much or any public benefit and utility, as in the said bill and the said letters patent was alleged.

And the plaintiff and defendants there were to be respectively plaintiff and defendants at law, and the Judge who tried the issues was to be at liberty to indorse special matters on the postea, as he should think fit.

The issues accordingly came on to be tried at the summer assizes for the county of York in the year 1836, before Parke, B., and a verdict was found for the appellant on both issues, with the following indorsement on the postea:—"That, before the granting of the patent, flax, hemp, and other fibrous substances were spun with machines with slides, by which the reach was varied according to the length of the staple or fibre of the article to be spun, and that that has been a fundamental principle of dry-spinning known and used before the granting of the patent; the reach having varied in cotton-spinning between seven-eighths of an inch to one inch and a quarter; in flax or line spinning, from fourteen to thirty-six inches; tow [687] spinning from four to nine inches; worsted spinning from five to fourteen inches. But before the granting of the patent it was not known that flax could be spun by means of maceration, as having a short fibre, at a reach of two inches and a half, or about those limits. But before that time Horace Hall had taken out a patent for, etc., with a specification as annexed; and the machines manufactured according to that patent were constructed with the reach of four inches and three quarters, and before that time the application of moisture in spinning flax for the purpose of separating the fibres and reducing the length of the staple had been used under Hall's patent."

The Master of the Rolls, on a motion by the respondents, that a new trial might be directed of the issues, or in case he should not think fit to direct such new trial, then that a case might be directed to be made for the opinion of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, on the 31st January 1837, ordered, that a case be made for the opinion of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas.

The case stated the substance of the letters patent and specification, the order of the Master of the Rolls directing the issues, the issues so directed, the verdict found on those issues, and the indorsement on the postea to the effect above mentioned; that the letters patent mentioned in the said indorsement as having been granted to Horace Hall, with the specification thereto belonging, should be considered part of the case; and that the finding of the jury on the issues and the facts, as found and indorsed on the postea, were to be assumed to be true. The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the appellant's patent was valid in point of law?

[688] Upon this case the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas having certified that they were of opinion that the appellant's patent was not valid in point of law, the cause came on to be heard on further directions before the Master of the Rolls on the 27th May 1839; and on the 16th July 1839 it was ordered that the appellant's bill should stand dismissed out of Court, with costs both at law and in equity, except the costs of the issues, such costs to be taxed by the Master.

Since the institution of the suit the patent had been extended for a term of three years beyond the period for which it was originally granted, by order of Her Majesty in council, bearing date the 13th day of June 1839.

Against the said orders of the 31st January 1837 and the 16th July 1839 the appellant appealed.

Sir F. Pollock and Mr. Kindersley for the Appellant.—Upon the two issues, whether the appellant has invented new machinery, and whether the invention was of public utility, the jury has found for the appellant. Whether there was an insufficient specification, the ground upon which the Court of Common Pleas proceeded, was not involved in the issue between the parties. It is admitted that the macerating process is new; if any part of this process of spinning flax is new the plea is bad. The spinning of fine flax had never been brought to perfection before the appellant took out his patent, nor had flax ever before been spun at so short a reach. The appellant does not claim to spin flax alone, or to macerate it alone; his invention is, to moisten the flax, and spin it, by machinery. It is said that the machinery is [689] not new; but it has been applied in a new manner, and the inventor of a new application of old materials is entitled to claim a patent for a new invention.

Mr. Pemberton and Sir William Follett for the Respondents.—The plea denies, as it is alleged in the pleadings, that new machinery has been found out. What is claimed as new machinery is not new machinery. Any machinery means any machinery mentioned in the bill and specification. In what respect can it be said that there is new machinery? Is the placing the rollers nearer new machinery? In dry spinning the rollers have been placed nearer in cotton than the appellant has placed them in spinning flax. The rollers have always varied in distance according to the length of the fibre to be spun. Supposing a natural substance to be found out which could be spun at a distance of one to three inches, could not the rollers be varied to that distance without violating Kay's patent? But, granting that the macerating of flax is new, then the patent ought to have been taken out for macerating the flax, and not for two processes; the one for macerating the flax, and the other for spinning flax when so prepared. If part of the invention fails the whole is void. The appellant does not by his bill rely upon the macerating process, which he alleges is now become useless, but upon the improved machinery, which, not being new, cannot be the subject of a patent.

Sir Frederick Pollock in reply.—The jury has found that the machine is new, and it is not competent for the Court to say it is not new. Cotton cannot be spun by a flax machine. It is a new and improved machine for [690] preparing and spinning flax. The same machinery may be employed for any other purpose, except macerated flax.

Lord Chancellor (18th June).—In this case the plaintiff, Mr. Kay, complains of the defendants having invaded his patent; and the course taken below was certainly not of very ordinary occurrence, as your Lordships will see, when I call your attention to the mode in which the case was disposed of in the course of the proceedings. The bill sets forth the patent and the specification, which states that the invention was in respect of new machinery for preparing and spinning flax, hemp, and other fibrous substances; and then it states, that the first process, namely, for macerating the flax, had, to a considerable degree, become unnecessary. It then complains of what the defendants have done,—not as at all interfering with his, the plaintiff's, patent, as relative to the preparing flax for spinning, but as having invaded his patent, so far as it was an improved machinery for drawing and spinning flax,—stating, that that continued to be used, and was a mode very generally adopted.

That is the complaint made by the bill to which the defendants pleaded; and by the plea they raised two objections to the plaintiff's title. The first objection was, "That the plaintiff had not, before and at the time of making the letters patent in the bill mentioned, found out and invented any new and improved machinery, as in the said bill and the letters patent and specification was alleged." That objection, therefore, was, that the patent was bad, because the [691] invention contained in the letters patent and specification was not new,—that there was not any novelty in it,—alluding to the rule of law, that if any part of that which is claimed as an invention, and as new, was not in fact new, the patent would be bad. First of all, upon the construction of this plea, I cannot entertain a doubt but that the terms "any new and improved machinery, as in the said bill and the letters patent and specification was alleged," are to be construed as meaning any such machinery as is there alleged, and in respect of which the patent is claimed. But I apprehend that that does not now come before your Lordships for decision.

The two pleas having been set down for argument an issue was directed, which was afterwards tried. No judgment was pronounced upon the validity of the plea; the parties, though it is not expressed perhaps in terms in the order, thought it more expedient to proceed to the trial of the truth of the plea, not asking or obtaining the judgment of the Court as to the legality of the plea, and as to how far the plea raised the important fact. They proceeded accordingly to trial, and upon the trial the jury found in favour of the novelty, and in favour of the usefulness; but there was an indorsement upon the postea, which stated, that there had been, "before the granting of the patent, flax, hemp, and other fibrous substances spun with machines with slides, by which the reach was varied according to the length of the staple or fibre of the article to be spun, and that that has been a fundamental principle of dry spinning known and used before the granting of the patent; the reach having varied in cotton spinning between seven eighths of an [692] inch to one inch and a quarter; in flax or line spinning, from fourteen to thirty-six inches; tow spinning, from four to nine inches; worsted spinning, from five to fourteen inches. But before the granting of the patent it was not known that flax could be spun by means of maceration, as having a short fibre at a reach of two inches and a half, or about those limits. But before that time Horace Hall had taken out a patent for, etc., with a specification as annexed, and the machines manufactured according to that patent were constructed with the reach of four inches and three quarters."

Now that indorsement, which is to be taken as part of the information which the Court is to act upon, as ascertained before the jury, states the various distances at which the rollers were placed in the ordinary spinning machines, and states, as a fact, which cannot now be in dispute, "that, before the granting of the patent, flax, hemp, and other fibrous substances were spun with machines with slides, by which the reach was varied according to the length of the staple or fibre of the article to be spun." We have it, therefore, as a fact now to be assumed as true, that spinning machines were constructed with rollers the distances between which varied according to the substance to be spun.

Now all the variation which the plaintiff introduced into the ordinary spinning machine, which he claims as his invention, is fixing the rollers at two inches and a half distance from each other, and that he states is such an improvement to the ordinary spinning machine as entitles him to be protected from the rest of the world against their using spinning machines with the rollers [693] at that distance. It is not, as was argued at the bar, one invention, namely, the macerating of flax, and using flax so macerated, with a particular machine. The earlier part of the invention he not only does not claim as against the defendants, but does not claim of the defendants having used it, and in point of fact it is quite clear that he has not adopted that mode. Another mode has been adopted of macerating the flax, and the flax so macerated by another process has been used in a machine with the rollers at two inches and a half distance. If the patent be good, so far as the spinning machine is concerned, that is to say, if the plaintiff has a right to tell the defendants and all the rest of the world that they shall not use the common spinning machine with rollers at two inches and a half distance, then the existence of the patent deprives the defendants, and all the rest of the world, of the right of using the ordinary spinning machine in the form in which they had a right to use it before the patent was granted. Now that is not the object of the patent. If he has discovered any means of using the machine which the world had not known before, the benefit of that he has a right to secure to himself by means of a patent; but if this mode of using the spinning machine was known before (and the indorsement upon the postea states that it was known before) then the plaintiff cannot deprive them of having the benefit of that which they enjoyed before; the indorsement upon the postea stating, that the rollers had been used at a variety of distances, not precisely specifying two inches and a half, but stating that the distances had been made to vary according to the length of the fibre to be spun, appears [694] to me to establish a fact which, of itself, is conclusive against the plaintiff.

Some question was raised at the bar, as to whether the effect of this maceration was to shorten the fibre. There is no very distinct evidence upon the subject; but, upon referring to what has taken place in the Court below, it does not appear that any doubt existed as to that; that the effect of maceration was to detach one fibre from another,—the substance consisting of a variety of fibres of the length of two inches and a half each, when combined they constituted a compound fibre of considerable length, but when detached by means of maceration, by the application of moisture, then each individual fibre was reduced to the length of two inches and a half. It does not appear to me, however, that this case can depend upon that circumstance, because the real use of the spinning machine before this process of maceration was introduced was this,—a machine for spinning with rollers at any distance, at the option of the parties using it, or according to the nature of the substance to be spun,—and any substance might be spun that was capable of being so spun, with rollers of two inches and a half distance, because the fibre was of that length, or for any other reason; that is quite immaterial. The question is, whether it is an innovation the placing the rollers at two inches and a half distance from each other? But by the indorsement upon the postea we are told, that the distance between the rollers varied according to the length of the fibre of the article to be spun.

Under these circumstances, the case being now reduced simply to the question, whether the construction [695] proposed by the patent is an improvement of the spinning machine, it appears to me that the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas is well founded, and that such a patent is not valid in point of law.

Some objection was made as to the course which was adopted in granting the case; that is to say, the terms in which the case was sent. There is no question that the parties below were willing to adopt the terms proposed, in order to put an end to the litigation, and that the Court, therefore, sent a case embodying the rights of parties, namely, the validity of the patent, confined to the particular point raised. That of itself would be an answer to the objections now made to the terms in which the case was sent, because this House will not permit parties upon appeal to raise a question which they did not think proper to raise and upon which they did not obtain the judgment of the Court below.

But, even independently of that consideration, although the terms of the question for the Court of Common Law are the validity of the patent, you must take the whole case together; you have there the facts stated which raise the objections to the validity of the patent which are contained in the pleas, and these facts are confined to the question of novelty and the question of usefulness. In point of fact, therefore, although the terms in which the question is couched are larger than the plea, it is the very same question that was raised before the Master of the Rolls, and that was the question upon which the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas was pronounced; and it does nothing more than establish this proposition, that the objection taken to [696] the patent, as not being new, and nothing useful, is a good objection, and that the patentee has failed to show that that for which he has claimed a patent was a new invention.

Lord Brougham.—I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend.

Judgment affirmed with costs.

REPORTS OF CASES heard in the House of Lords, and decided during the Session 1847-48. By C. CLARK and W. FINNELLY, Barristers-at-Law. Vol. I.

JESSY STEWART DINGWALL FORDYCE, executrix of ARTHUR DINGWALL FORDYCE,—Appellant; Sir HENRY BRIDGES, executor of J. D. DINGWALL,—Respondent [February 23, 1847].

[Mews' Dig. i. 488; xiii. 1888; S.C. 11 Jur. 157. Adopted, on point as to construction of statute, in River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson, 1877, 2 A.C. 778. And see In re O'Loughlen, 1871, L.R. 6 Ch. 406. 4 and 5 Will. iv. c. 22 is superseded by the Apportionment Act, 1870, which also applies to Scotland.]

Apportionment of rent—Statute: Scotland.

The act 4 and 5 W. IV., c. 22, for the apportionment of rents, annuities, and other periodical payments, extends to Scotland.

The intention of the Legislature must be ascertained from the words of a statute, and not from any general inferences to be drawn from the nature of the objects dealt with by the statute.

This was a suit instituted under the act 4 and 5 W. IV., c. 22, by the respondent, as executor of J. Duff Dingwall, deceased, to obtain, on behalf of the estate which he represented, an apportionment of the rents and profits of certain lands in Brucklay, of which the deceased had died seised, all of which rents and profits had been claimed and taken by Mr. Arthur Dingwall Fordyce as heir of entail on the death of Mr. J. D. Dingwall. John Duff Dingwall was for several years heir of entail in possession of the lands of Brucklay, and died on the 26th October, 1840, and consequently during the currency of a half year. The respondent, as his executor, drew the rents for the half year, ending at Whit Sunday 1840, [2] being the term immediately preceding Mr. Dingwall's death. A. D. Fordyce drew the rents for the half year ending at Martinmas 1840, being the term during the currency of which the death had occurred. In April 1842 the respondent instituted this suit claiming under the statute an apportionment of the rents of that half year. He founded his claim on the provisions of the 4 and 5 W. IV., c. 22, by the second section of which it is enacted, that "all rent-service reserved on any lease by a tenant in fee, or for any life interest, or by any lease granted under any power, and which lease shall have been granted after the passing of this act, and all rents-charge, and other rents, annuities, pensions, dividends, moduses, compositions, and all other payments of every description in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, made payable or coming due at fixed periods," etc., shall be apportioned so and, in such manner, that on the death of any person interested in them, his or her executors, etc., shall be entitled to a proportion of them according to the time which shall have elapsed from the last period of the payment to the day of the death, etc. Mr. A. D. Fordyce put in several pleas; the first of which alleged, that "the act 4 and 5 W. IV., c. 22, did not extend to Scotland." On this plea, Lord Cuninghame, the Lord Ordinary, made an order for referring the case to the judges of the First Division of the Court of Session, but appended to his order a note, in which he discussed at full length the question raised by the plea, and expressed his opinion that the act did not extend to Scotland. The judges of the First Division having differed in their opinions, the case was remitted for the advice of the other judges. Of these, the Lord President (Boyle), Lord Moncrieff, and Lord Cuninghame were of opinion that the statute did not extend to Scotland; all the rest held that it did; and on the 7th March, 1844, a final decree was pronounced to that effect. This was the decree appealed against.

[3] Mr. Anderson (Sir F. Kelly was with him) for the appellant.—The judgment of the court below must be reversed. The statute cannot apply where the estate is Scotch, and where the owner of it is a domiciled Scotchman, and the law which governs its administration is the law of Scotland alone. That is the case here. The words of the act relate not to territory, but to the description of payments. There may be payments of annuities due to parties domiciled in England dying during the currency of a term, and leaving English executors or administrators, and to such cases, as the succession would then be governed by the law of England, the statute in question may be applied. But it does not apply to cases where the property and the domicile of the holder, being Scotch, the succession must be governed by the Scotch law.

The Lords intimated that the question of domicile, as affecting the law of succession, did not affect this case, which was purely a question on the construction of the words of the statute.

Mr. Anderson continued.—There is nothing in the statute, nor in the general rules relating to the construction of statutes, which will justify the application of this act to Scotland. Analogy is not in favour of such an application. It is said that certain general terms in this act warrant its application to Scotland, but the English Bankrupt Act contains terms quite as general, yet it has never been held that that act extended to Scotland. Again the act of 4 and 5 W. IV., is an act passed to amend the 11 Geo. II., c. 19. That was a purely English act, it treated of every thing English, and it applied English rules to English matters. It was called, "An Act for the more effectually Securing the Payment of Rent, and preventing Frauds by Tenants," and it was, therefore, perfectly clear that it was exclusively an English act; for the Scotch law did not recognize [4] "tenants" in the sense in which that word was employed in that statute. Besides which, the very provisions of that statute confined its operation to England. The Statute 4 and 5 W. IV., c. 22, is merely "An Act to amend an Act of the 11 Geo. II., etc." Its enactments must consequently be construed with those of the act it was passed to amend, and it must be confined to the purpose thus announced in its description. It may by possibility apply to rents which are payable in Scotland, but not unless they belong to or are regulated by the law of England. [Lord Brougham.—Perhaps there may be some ground for contending that this statute was not at first intended to apply to Scotland, but are there not words in it which directly make it applicable there?] The words are merely, "in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland," but this expression seems to have been casually introduced—it is not enforced by any other expression of the intention of the Legislature, and it is contradicted by the general nature of the statute and the objects with which it deals, all of which are exclusively English.

Mr. James Russell and Mr. Elmsley appeared for the respondent but were not called on.

Lord Brougham.—I have no doubt whatever upon this case, and I do not think that we ought to call on the other side. We must construe this statute by what appears to have been the intention of the legislature. But we must ascertain that intention from the words of the statute, and not from any general inferences to be drawn from the nature of the objects dealt with by the statute. The first part of the statute is general, but the things described in it may in some of them include matters that are the subjects of Scotch law, and then comes that extensive phrase, "in the United Kingdom of Great [5] Britain and Ireland." The words here used include, in terms and in spirit, England, Scotland, and Ireland. By those words we are bound, and I therefore move that the judgment of the court below be affirmed.

The Lord Chancellor.—I am not able to see that any doubt can exist in this case. Whatever may have been intended by the legislature, it has used words which in express terms declare that all payments, arising from lands in "Great Britain and Ireland," shall be subject to the apportionment decreed by this statute. Why is not Scotland included in these words? I cannot see any reason for saying that it is not included. On the contrary, it seems to me that, it is expressly and inevitably included within the very words of the act.

Judgment affirmed with costs.

[6] JOHN M'KENNA,—Plaintiff in error; GEORGE PAPE,—Defendant in error
[Feb. 8; March 11, 1847].

[Mews' Dig. viii. 409. S. 3 of 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 38, was repealed by 8 and 9 Vict., c. 64, s. 1.]

The Act 6 and 7 W. IV., c. 38, s. 3, extends to prevent a person who is already a publican from obtaining a licence to carry on the business of a grocer on the same premises, as absolutely as it does to prevent a person, licensed as a grocer, from carrying on in the same premises the business of a publican.

This was an action on the case. The first count of the declaration stated, that the plaintiff was a person duly licensed, pursuant to the statutes in that case made and provided, to exercise and carry on the trade and business of a retailer of spirits, to be consumed on his premises, in the county of the city of Dublin, and being so licensed, he became desirous to trade in and sell coffee, tea, cocoa, nuts, chocolate, and pepper, in a certain room situate in and belonging to his house then and there situate, within the Dublin excise district, and for that purpose he then and there duly made entry of the said room with the proper officer of excise, in whose survey the said room was situated, and was intended to be used, etc.; that the defendant was the collector of excise for the said district, and a person employed for the purpose of granting excise licenses authorised or required to be taken out by persons carrying on any trade or business subject to the laws of excise. And the plaintiff being so licensed, as aforesaid, to retail spirits, and having made the entry of the said room, and being otherwise entitled to receive such licence as hereinafter next mentioned, applied to the defendant, as such collector, for a licence to trade in and sell coffee, etc., in the said room whereof entry had been made, etc., and then and there paid to the defendant, as such collector, a certain sum of money, to wit, etc., being the amount of duty imposed upon such licence, and then and there demanded the same. And it thereupon became the duty of the defendant, as such collector, etc., so to grant and deliver such licence as aforesaid. Breach, that he refused, whereby plaintiff was hindered and prevented from engaging in the said trade, to plaintiff's damage, etc.

The second count was similar to the first; but instead of payment of the duty for the licence, alleged a tender of it.

General demurrer and joinder.

Judgment, without argument, was given pro forma for the defendant on this demurrer in the Court of Exchequer, in Dublin, which judgment was afterwards affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber (7 Ir. Law Rep. 98). This writ of error was then brought.

Mr. Napier and Mr. Peacock for the plaintiff in error.

The plaintiff contends, that the duty of the excise officer is merely of a ministerial nature, and that consequently he is bound to perform it whenever a party puts himself into a condition lawfully to call on him to do so. The case of Ferguson v. Kinnoull (9 Clark and Finnelly, 251) establishes that principle. Here the plaintiff had put himself into a condition lawfully to demand this licence. The refusal to grant it gave the plaintiff a right of action: he was not bound to aver malice. [Lord Brougham.—Misfeasance of a public officer in the discharge of his duty is sufficient to maintain an action of this sort. The malice is presumed from the illegality of the act. The question here does not turn on the pleadings, but on the construction of the excise statutes.*]

* The statute 6 and 7 W. IV., c. 38, s. 3, enacts, "That from and after the passing of this act, no person in Ireland, who shall be duly licensed, under any act or acts for granting excise licenses, to deal in or sell tea, coffee, cocoa, nuts, chocolate, or pepper, nor any person deemed a grocer within the meaning of the laws of the excise in force in Ireland, at or immediately before the passing of this act, shall be entitled to take out any licence to retail spirits in the house or on the premises of such retailer, or in any house or on any premises within one quarter of a mile of the house or premises of such retailer, other than a licence to retail spirits in quantities not less, at one time, than one pint, and to be consumed elsewhere than in the house, or on the premises of [8] The defendant rests his answer to this action on the construction of certain provisions in the excise acts. He does not deny the plaintiff's general right to the licence, but contends that, under the circumstances of this case, that right is taken away. This argument cannot be successfully maintained. An established right cannot be taken away by mere implication; and it is not pretended that the grant of the licence here is in terms forbidden by any statute. It is said that the two trades of grocer and publican cannot, by the provision of the Irish excise acts, be carried on at the same time by the same person, unless the houses in which they are carried on are at a certain distance from each other. But it is clearly settled, by the case of The Taylors of Ipswich (11 Co. Rep. fol. 53, a, Thomas and Fraser's ed. p. 101), that, by the common law, a man may carry on as many trades as he pleases; and this right cannot be taken away from him, except by positive prohibitory provisions in a statute. There are no such provisions here.

The error in this case has arisen from confounding the grocer's with the publican's licence. They are in reality distinct. The publican's licence must be applied for to the magistrates, who may grant or refuse it at their discretion; and who, after it has been granted, may withdraw or annul it. The holding of it places the party under the superintendence of the police. The grocer's licence is altogether different. A party is entitled to it on performing certain preliminary conditions; he need not go before the magistrates to ask for it; and they have no controul over him when he has obtained it. The holding of it does not subject him to the interference of the police. [Lord Brougham.—But may not the excise officers enter a grocer's premises, and see whether he is selling tobacco and coffee that have properly paid custom duty?] [The Attorney General.—He may.] But that matter does not affect this question; for the contention here is founded on the presumption that the two licences are the same in their nature, and subject a party to the same supervision, and that the fact of being a publican disqualifies a man from being a grocer. There are no words expressly declaring such a disqualification to be found in any of the statutes. The 45 Geo. III., c. 50, s. 19, declares what persons shall not have a spirit licence, and among these persons a jailer and a grocer are mentioned; and any licence issued to any such person is declared to be void. The 61st section of that act gave the magistrates the power of annulling a publican's licence when a grocer's licence has been granted to the same individual; so that, if a man first got a public-house licence, and afterwards become a grocer, his publican's licence could be avoided. But that act was repealed by the 46 Geo. III., c. 70, and a grocer then became capable of taking a retail spirit licence. The latter act was in its turn repealed by the 47 Geo. III., sess. 2, c. 12, and the first statute would consequently have revived, but that the matters to which it had related were, in this last statute itself, made the subject of special legislative provision. By the 14th section of the 47 Geo. III., the grocer was empowered, as a matter of right, to take out a licence to sell spirits, in not less than two quarts, and not to be [10] consumed on the premises. Then came the 53 Geo. III., c. 137, by the 4th section of which it was enacted, that when any such licence was required by a grocer, it should be lawful for the party desiring it to apply to the officers of excise, who "shall grant the same." The 55 Geo. III., c. 19, transferred the management of the duties from the Office of Stamps to that of the Excise; it consolidated all the previous acts, but it left the grocers as they were. The 39th section of this act stated what trades should not be allowed to obtain a publican's licence, and concluded with the words "other than a grocer capable by law of receiving such licence," so that by that act the grocer's right to receive such a licence was recognized. The 58 Geo. III., c. 57, recites the 45, 47, and 53 Geo. III., and repeals all that relates to grocers in those acts. The grocer is, by this act, restored to the privileges he had before the passing of any of them, and, as he may sell spirits by retail, and in any quantity less than two quarts, he obtains a new statutory privilege instead of that which he had under the 14th section of the 47 Geo. III. Two quarts were therefore the maximum but not the minimum of what he could sell. Then comes the 59 Geo. III., c. 106, which repeals the 39th section of the 55 Geo. III. and by the 6th section of which (after referring to the 33rd section of that statute), it is provided, that a person exercising certain trades shall not be capable of receiving such retailer; and any licence to retail spirits in any other manner, granted after the passing of this act to any such grocer, or person so licensed as aforesaid, shall be wholly null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever."

a spirit licence, and any licence issued to a person so declared not capable of receiving it, shall be void. That provides in express terms for the case where a man gets a licence and then enters into a forbidden trade; his licence is then to be void. That shows that it was necessary to have an express enactment in order to produce that result. There is no such enactment here.

The 6 Geo. IV., c. 81, an act of the United Kingdom, declares, that all persons licensed under that act to deal in coffee, shall be deemed grocers, and entitled to take out a licence to sell spirits in any quantity not exceeding two [11] quarts, to be consumed elsewhere than on the premises; but such person could not obtain an exercise licence to sell spirits to be consumed on the premises without first getting a magistrate's certificate for that purpose; and if he obtained a licence without such certificate, the licence was declared void, and the party was subjected to a penalty. Such a person was therefore in a different situation from a grocer who had a right to a licence to sell less than two quarts, though not to be consumed upon the premises. The legislature found that it was an evil for grocers to sell spirits in their shops in less quantities than a pint, which, under the terms of the previous acts, might be done, and the 6 and 7 Wm. IV. was passed to put an end to that evil. That was the whole object of that act; and its effect merely is to alter the nature of the licence, and to put the party under certain restrictions. The 6 G. IV., c. 81, shows clearly that it was not the intention of the legislature to prevent a publican from having a grocer's, or a grocer from having a publican's licence. That act, in its schedule of duties, imposes a duty of 11s. on every licence to sell coffee, tea, cocoa, nuts, or pepper. It then goes on to say, that "every retailer of spirits (except retailers of spirits in Ireland, after mentioned) shall" pay a certain duty; and "every retailer of spirits in Ireland, being duly licensed to trade in, vend, and sell coffee, tea, cocoa, nuts, chocolate, or pepper, and not selling spirits in any greater quantity at one time than two quarts, or any spirits to be consumed on the premises, "shall, at a rent of £25, pay a duty of £9 9s." That part of the act clearly contemplates the case of a grocer or person selling tea and coffee, likewise selling spirits to be consumed on his premises. Now, he can only sell spirits in that way by virtue of a public-house licence; and the act therefore contemplates the union of a publican's and a grocer's licence in the same individual. The act of 6 and 7 Wm. IV., c. 38, must be read in conjunction with that statute, and cannot be construed as having any other meaning than [12] that of merely altering the quantities previously allowed to be sold. By both these statutes the party is prevented from selling more than two quarts, or less than one pint, on the premises where he carries on the business of a dealer. This view of the statute is confirmed by the case of Dickson v. Pape (7 Ir. Law Rep. 107), where it was held, that the higher duty imposed on grocers taking out spirit licences, by the schedule to the 6th Geo. IV., c. 81, s. 2, is not the duty chargeable on the licence specified in the 6 and 7 Wm. IV., c. 38, s. 3. The two acts must be read together; and the result of them is, not that the two trades cannot be carried on together, but that the mode of dealing in one trade is altered. This view of the matter is confirmed by the 3 and 4 Wm. IV., c. 68, which, by the 13th section, describes the persons not capable of holding a licence to sell spirits by retail, but does not mention grocers. It is therefore clear, that a person holding such a licence may afterwards obtain a grocer's licence.

Should the House, however, be of a different opinion, then it is submitted, that, in the event of a man holding the two licences, the publican's and not the grocer's licence might be, by the grant of the grocer's licence, avoided; but the holding of a publican's licence will not authorise the refusal of the grant of a grocer's licence. That the avoiding the publican's licence might be the result of the grant of the grocer's licence can make no difference in the duty of the officer. If the party was, as it was submitted he was, entitled to demand the grocer's licence, the officer ought to have granted it without reference to the consequences. The refusal to grant it is a good cause of action, and this judgment must be reversed.

The Attorney-General (Sir J. Jervis) and Mr. James Wilde, for the defendant in error.—The single question here is, whether the plaintiff can hold the publican's and [13] the grocer's licence together. It is contended here, that it was the officer's duty to grant the grocer's licence, though the publican's licence might thereby become void. That assumes, that the party may receive the two together. But the form of the declaration disposes of that; for the declaration alleges, that the plaintiff was licensed to sell spirits by retail, and, being so licensed, he became and was desirous to sell tea and coffee, and for that purpose made an entry, etc. If the officer had granted him a licence under the circumstances here alleged, the licence would, so granted, have been void, and the party receiving it, and selling under it, would have been subjected to a penalty. Can it be said that it was the duty of the officer to do that, by the doing of which he would have subjected the party to a penalty. This statement, alone, puts an end to the pretence of a duty on the part of the officer to grant the licence; for the law will not allow a party to do indirectly what it directly forbids to be done; nor will it require him to do that which, under a liability to a penalty, is forbidden to be done. The law prevents a party from taking a grocer's licence and then getting a publican's licence, and yet the contention here is, that he may have a publican's licence and then have a right to demand the grant of a grocer's licence. This would be to effect indirectly, what the law will not allow him to do directly. The spirit of the prohibition equally extends to both cases.

There is no distinction between a publican's licence and an excise licence. The magistrates grant the one; and then they grant a certificate on which, and on which alone, the other can issue. The case of Dickson v. Pape [7 Ir. L.R. 107] is not in point. The question now before the House did not arise then. But, in The Queen on the prosecution of Boland v. The Commissioners of Excise (2 Jebb and Symes, 243), it did arise; and there the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland dis-[14]tinctly held, that the effect of the 6 and 7 Wm. IV., c. 38, s. 3, is that a licensed publican is not entitled to a grocer's licence for the sale of tea and coffee, upon the same premises.

A reference to the statutes passed on this subject, will show that the intention of the legislature was to prevent a grocer selling spirits in small quantities, to be consumed on the premises. The 31 Geo. III., c. 13, s. 3, enacts, "that no license shall be granted to any person for selling, by retail, any spirituous liquors in Dublin, except to such persons as shall keep victualling houses, inns, and use and exercise no other trade whatever; and any licence granted to any other person shall be null and void." The 32 Geo. III., c. 19, s. 3, contains the same provisions, with this addition, "that any licence which shall be granted to any person exercising the trade or business of a grocer, or in whose house the trade or business of a grocer shall be carried on, shall be null and void, and such person shall be subject to the penalties,"—penalties granted by that act against retailers of spirits without licence. The 36 Geo. III., c. 40, contains similar provisions, and gives a legislative definition of the term "retailer." These were all Irish acts. Those which were passed after the Union proceeded in the same spirit.

The 58 Geo. III., c. 57, permits a grocer to sell spirits in certain quantities only. It may be admitted that the 6 Geo. IV., c. 81, declares that certain persons shall have no licences whatever, but that does not show that, under the provisions of that statute, all the persons besides those who are thus totally excluded may have a licence; for the 26th section of that act provides that if any person shall deal in spirits by retail, or carry on any trade for which a licence is required by that act, without first obtaining such licence, he shall be liable to penalties. It is plain, on a review of all the statutes, that a grocer is not entitled to hold at the same time a publican's and a grocer's [15] licence; and the statute now particularly under consideration expressly says that a grocer shall not sell less than one pint, which shall not be consumed on the premises. It is impossible that such a person should ever be held entitled to a publican's licence.

The 6 Geo. IV., c. 81, imposes two different penalties, one on a person who retails spirits, and is not a grocer, and another on such a person being at the same time a grocer. The retail spirit licence is a two guinea licence; it has nothing to do with the restriction of the liquor being consumed on the premises, but it is subject to the restriction of not selling more than two gallons at a time. But the grocer's retail spirit licence costs nine guineas, and prevents the party from selling more than two quarts at a time. If both conveyed the same rights, it is impossible to suppose that any man would give nine guineas for what he might get with fewer restrictions at the price of two guineas. The 6 and 7 Wm. IV. is more than a mere alteration in the extent of the right of the sale. If there could be any doubt upon its construction, its general purpose, and the special words used in it ought to determine that point. The rule as to the construction of statutes to be followed here was stated in this house by Lord Chief Justice Tindal in the Sussex Peerage Case (11 Clark and Finnely, 143; see also Fordyce v. Bridges, ante [1 H.L.C.] 1). The intention of the legislature is to be the guide. The intention of the statute here was to prevent the two trades of grocer and publican from being exercised together, and the words of the act are sufficient to effect that purpose.

Mr. Napier in reply.—The case of The Queen on the prosecution of Boland v. The Commissioners of Excise [2 Jebb and Symes, 243], is not in point, for that was an application for a mandamus, which might be refused on many grounds besides that of the bare legal rights of the parties. The plaintiff [16] here is not effected by the 6 Geo. IV., c. 81, nor by the 6 and 7 W. IV., c. 38, for he is not a grocer seeking to obtain a publican's licence, and it is that circumstance alone which can bring him within the provisions of that statute. He is like any other individual seeking to obtain a grocer's licence, and he is entitled to have it on performing the requisitions of the statute. He has performed them, and the refusal to grant him the licence is a breach of duty for which the defendant is answerable in this action.

The Lord Chancellor (11th March).—This is a case which came from Ireland upon a writ of error, having been first decided in the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, then in the Court of Exchequer Chamber. The question is, whether the action which was brought can be maintained against a public officer for having refused to give the party a grocer's licence to sell tea and coffee, he having previously got a publican's licence.

This case turns entirely, in my view of it, upon one clause in the act of Parliament which provides. [His Lordship read the third section (see ante, p. 7).] So that the enactment is beyond all dispute, that a party being a grocer shall not obtain a licence to sell spirits, except a limited licence to sell spirits above a certain quantity, and a provision as to the place where they are to be consumed.

The plaintiff in error here is not a grocer applying for a spirit licence, but he is a publican with a spirit licence applying for a grocer's licence; and the argument comes to this, that if he obtains a grocer's licence first he cannot under the act afterwards obtain a publican's licence; but that if he obtains a publican's licence first, he may then become a grocer. Now that seems to be such an absurdity, upon the face of it, that it does not appear to me [17] to require more than the actual statement of it for its complete refutation. The question is, whether this part of the enactment does not make it impossible for any one person to hold the two licences together, except the limited licence, which is permitted by the act of Parliament? The plaintiff here, or any other person, could, if the argument is right, in case of his obtaining a grocer's licence first, hold both licences together, contrary to the express term of the enactment which I have referred to; and contrary, as it seems to me, to the obvious meaning of the legislature. I think that this cannot be done, and I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment of the Court below is right and ought to be affirmed.

Lord Brougham.—I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend. When this case was first brought before us in the argument at the bar here (and it was argued with great fulness and great acuteness), I thought there was a difficulty in it arising from the officer exercising a power which he had not, to refuse the licence; but it is clear what the object of the legislature was, and that object no doubt was, as I then threw out, revenue, namely, to get the price of the licence; but there is, indirectly also, another object, and a very important one, to check contraband dealings. I am clearly of opinion that the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed.

It is a great pity that this poor man was advised to carry the case so far, because really it was of no use to him to bring this writ of error. It would have been better to submit to the decision of the Court below.

The judgment of the Court below was affirmed, and the writ of error was dismissed with costs.

[18] CHARLES BARRETT and Another, on behalf of the Durham County Coal Company,—Appellants; THE STOCKTON AND DARLINGTON RAILWAY COMPANY,—Respondents [March 16, 18, 1847].

[Mews' Dig. xi. 741; S.C. 11 Cl. and F. 590, q.v.]

Railway Acts, Construction—Illegal Charges—Repayments with Interest—Costs.

A decree giving effect to allegations read from an answer, not proved nor admitted, is varied in that respect, and an inquiry on the subject is directed before the Master.

Monies paid for the use of a railway, under protest as overcharges, were afterwards paid into Court under an order made by consent, and vested in the public stocks, to abide final judgment in an action brought to try the legality of the charges, which the judgment declared to be illegal:—

Held, that the party who paid the monies was entitled to the stocks and dividends and accumulations thereof.

After the judgment at law finding payments, made to the railway company, to be overcharges, a bill filed, pending a writ of error on that judgment, to restrain the company from continuing the overcharges, and for an account, etc., is not improper nor premature, and the plaintiffs are entitled to the costs.

By the 62d section of the act 2 Geo. IV., c. 44, which incorporated "the Stockton and Darlington Railway Company," for making and maintaining a railway from the river Tees at Stockton, to Witton Park Colliery, with several branches therefrom, all in the county of Durham, the said company was empowered to demand, recover, and receive for the tonnage of all goods which should be carried upon the said railways, the tolls therein mentioned, viz., for all coal, such sum as the said company should from time to time appoint, not exceeding 4d. per ton per mile: for all the articles for which a tonnage was thereinbefore directed to [19] be paid, which should pass the inclined planes upon the said railways, such sum as the company should appoint, not exceeding 1s. per ton; and for all coal which should be shipped on board of any vessel in the port of Stockton-upon-Tees, for the purpose of exportation, such sum as the said company should appoint, not exceeding  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per ton per mile. The 66th section empowered the company to make regulations as to the mode in which the tolls should be paid, and authorized the persons appointed to receive the same, in default of payment, to seize the goods in respect whereof such tolls ought to have been paid, and the waggons or other carriages laden therewith, and to detain the same until such payment should be made, and if not redeemed within five days, the same were to be appraised and sold, as in cases of distress for rent, under the authority of this and additional acts of Parliament, subsequently passed, but which are not material to this appeal. The company, prior to the year 1826, constructed "the Stockton and Darlington Railway," and branches therefrom, and, among others, a branch to Middlesborough, in the port of Stockton-upon-Tees; and they also constructed, among other inclined planes, one called the Brusselton Inclined Plane.

In the year 1828, another company, called "the Clarence Railway Company," obtained an act (9 Geo. IV., c. 61), to enable them to make and maintain a railway from the river Tees, near Haverton Hill, to a place called Sim Pasture Farm, in the parish of Heighington, all in the county of Durham, with branches. The powers of this company were afterwards altered and enlarged by five acts, which are not material to the appeal. This company, under the authority of these acts, subsequently to the construction of "the Stockton and Darlington Railway," and prior to the year 1836, constructed the railway called "the Clarence Railway," which joins "the Stock-[20]-ton and Darlington Railway," at Sim Pasture, and extends thence to Haverton Hill, and thence, by a branch, to a place called Port Clarence, on the north bank of the river Tees, within the port of Stockton-upon-Tees, and nearly opposite Middlesborough.

In May 1836, the appellants formed "the Durham County Coal Company," for the purpose of purchasing or taking collieries and coal mines, and working the same, and selling the produce. This company commenced business the 1st of July, 1836, and had an office at Darlington, where the business was conducted.

During the month of July 1836, the coal company sent from their collieries, for the purpose of being shipped, several waggons of coal, which were carried along the Stockton and Darlington Railway to and over the Brusselton Inclined Plane, and thence along the same railway to its junction with the Clarence Railway at Sim Pasture, and thence along the Clarence Railway and its branches to Port Clarence, where such coal was shipped on board of vessels lying there, within the port of Stockton-upon-Tees, for the port of London, for consumption there. In the same month the coal company also sent from the same collieries, for the purpose of being shipped, other waggons of coal, which were carried along the Stockton and Darlington Railway to and over the Brusselton Inclined Plane, and thence along the Stockton and Darlington Railway, and the Middlesborough branch thereof, to Middlesborough, where such coal was shipped on board vessels lying there, for the port of London, for consumption there. During this period the Stockton and Darlington Railway Company had a toll-house on their railway, near its junction with the Clarence Railway at Sim Pasture, and the several waggons of coal sent by the coal company, were weighed at this toll-house by an agent of the railway company, and the servant of the coal [21] company, who had the charge of the coal waggons, delivered to the said agent tickets, setting forth the numbers of the waggons, the weight and description of coal in each, and its destination; and these tickets stated, as to the waggon loads of coal which were sent along the Clarence Railway, that they were intended for export.

In August 1836, the Stockton and Darlington Railway Company, according to their practice, caused to be delivered at the coal company's office an account of the charges of the railway company, for tolls, tonnage, and other dues in respect of the several waggon loads of coal, sent by the coal company, during the previous month, to Port Clarence and Middlesborough respectively. Those charges amounted to the sum of £532 13s. 11d., from which deduction of £59 11s. 3d. was made by the railway company for discount and allowances, thereby reducing the demand to £473 2s. 8d. The account contained a charge of 2½d. per ton per mile upon all the coal sent during the said month, by the coal company, to Port Clarence, and there shipped for London; and a charge of 6d. per ton for the passage over the Brusselton Inclined Plane, of all the last mentioned coal, and also of all the coal sent, during the same month, by the coal company to Middlesborough, and there shipped for London. The coal company were dissatisfied with this account, conceiving that the railway company were not entitled to charge more than the export rate of ½d. per ton per mile on the coal sent to Port Clarence, and there shipped for London, that being, moreover, the tonnage rate charged by the railway company on the coal sent to Middlesborough, and shipped there for London; conceiving also that the railway company were not entitled to charge any rate at all for passing over the Brusselton Inclined Plane, upon the coal shipped for London, either at Middlesborough or at Port Clarence. The coal company [22] claimed, in respect of these two charges, deductions of £161 10s. 6d. for the first, and of £116 12s. for the second, to be made from the said sum of £473 2s. 8d. Communications on the subject between the agents of the respective companies, resulted in an agreement, that the coal company should pay the said account, and all future accounts containing charges after the same rates, without prejudice to their right to recover back from the railway company such sums as should appear to have been overpaid beyond the amount authorized by their acts of Parliament, until the decision of a Court of law could be obtained on the construction of the Acts, in an action to be brought by the appellant Barrett against the railway company, for the purpose of trying their right to make the charges complained of.

The coal company continued to send coal for exportation along the Stockton and Darlington Railway to Sim Pasture, and thence along the Clarence Railway to Port Clarence, where it was shipped for London and other ports; and the Stockton and Darlington Railway Company continued to send in their monthly accounts to the coal company, charging them up to the end of December 1840, with a tonnage rate of 2½d. per ton per mile; and from that time with a tonnage rate of 1½d. per ton per mile, upon all the coal so shipped at Port Clarence, and the coal company paid the full amount of such accounts, under protest, in accordance with the said agreement.

The proposed action was brought in 1837, in the Court of Common Pleas, to recover back the overcharges made by the railway company, and paid by the coal company, upon coal sent by the Clarence Railway, from the 1st of July to the 1st of November, 1836; and on a special verdict returned by the jury two questions were raised—viz., 1st, whether the coals carried along the Stockton and Darlington Railway to Sim Pasture, and thence [23] along the Clarence Railway to Port Clarence, and thence shipped for London, were liable to the higher duty per ton per mile, as claimed by the railway company, or only to the duty of  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per ton per mile: 2dly, admitting that the said coals were shipped for the purpose of exportation, within the meaning of the Stockton and Darlington Railway Acts, whether such coals were liable to pay the inclined plane duty of 6d. per ton for carriage over the Brusselton Inclined Plane, in addition to the other railway dues.

The Court of Common Pleas, after hearing those questions argued in November 1840, held that, according to the just construction of the 62d section of the act 2 Gen. IV., c. 44, the coals in question must be considered as shipped for exportation, and as liable to the lower duty (of  $\frac{1}{2}$ d.); but that all coals, including coals intended for exportation, were liable to pay duty for passing over the inclined plane, and that for any excess of duties taken by the defendants, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment (2 Manning and Gr. 134).

Judgment was accordingly entered up for Barrett, for £705 8s. 4d., in respect of over payments made by the coal company to the railway company, from the 1st of July to 1st of November, 1836. That judgment was affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber upon writ of error, brought there by the railway company, and also affirmed by this House, in 1844, upon a like writ (11 Clark and Fin. 590).

In 1841, pending the proceedings on the writ of error in the Exchequer Chamber, the bill in this cause was filed, and, after stating the matters hereinbefore mentioned, it charged, among other things, that the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas was a final judgment within the meaning of the agreement entered into between the parties; that the defendants pretended that the mileage rates of  $2\frac{1}{2}$ d. and  $1\frac{3}{4}$ d. per ton, which had been charged by them in their monthly accounts with the coal company since the [24] 1st of November, 1836, included some charge for haulage, and was not entirely a tonnage rate; that the railway company were not authorized by any of their Acts to make any charge for haulage, or for anything in the nature of haulage, save the inclined plane rate for the use of the stationary engines; that they were only entitled to charge for haulage as a matter of private contract, in cases where haulage had been contracted for, and had been performed, and that they had never done any haulage for the coal company since the 1st of November, 1836. The bill prayed for an account of all sums of money, which, since the last mentioned date, had been received by the railway company or their agents, from the Coal Company or their agents, in respect of the excess of the aforesaid rates of  $2\frac{1}{2}$ d. and  $1\frac{3}{4}$ d. per ton per mile, charged by the railway company, upon coal which, since the said date, had been sent by the coal company along the said railway to Port Clarence, for the purpose of being shipped there, and exported to the port of London, or elsewhere, above the export tonnage rate of  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per mile; and that the railway company might be ordered to pay to the coal company what, upon taking such account, should appear to be the amount of such over payments, with interest thereon, after the rate of £4 per cent. per annum; or that the railway company should pay such amount and interest into Court, to be invested in £3 per cent. Bank Annuities until the writ of error in an action should be decided. The bill also prayed for an injunction to restrain the railway company from exacting a higher rate than  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per ton per mile on coal sent to Port Clarence for exportation, or that a receiver of the excess of the charges made above that rate might be appointed, and the same be paid into Court and invested in the said stock.

The respondents in their answer to the bill, admitted that they had charged and had been paid by the coal company, under protest, the rate of  $2\frac{1}{2}$ d. per ton per mile [25] from the 1st of November, 1836, to the end of December 1840, and the rate of  $1\frac{3}{4}$ d. from the latter date, upon the coal stated in the bill to have been shipped at Port Clarence for exportation; but they alleged that the 2½d. was not exclusively a tonnage rate, but that it included a charge of ½d. per ton per mile for services rendered by the railway company in the transit of the coal, which was matter of private arrangement between the railway company and the coal owners, and that the actual tonnage rate, during the period that 2½d. had been charged, was only 1½d. per ton per mile, and that after the end of December 1840, the charge for haulage and other conveniences was made a distinct charge. And the respondents in their answer submitted to the judgment of the Court, "whether it is or is not the fact, that the said railway company are not authorized by any of their Acts to make any charge for hauling, save the said inclined plane rate for the use of the stationary engines; or whether it is or is not the fact, that they are only entitled to charge for haulage as a matter of private contract, and in cases when haulage has been contracted for and performed by the railway company." They also insisted that a final decision upon the construction of their acts of Parliament had not been obtained, and stated their intention of appealing to this House in case the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in the action should be affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber.

In March 1842, after the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in the action was affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber, upon a renewed motion before the Vice Chancellor of England, for an injunction as prayed for by the bill, an order was made by consent, and without prejudice to any question in the cause, that a sum of £141 Os. 9d., then standing in the Darlington District Bank, in the names of two persons, on behalf of the appellants and respondents respectively, should, with the interest of £1 2s. 6d. allowed thereon, be paid into Court to the credit of the cause; [26] and that the respondents should pay into Court the sum of £4000 on account of the overpayments made by the appellants, according to the judgment in the action, without prejudice to the amount of the over payments. The two sums of £142 3s. 3d. and £4000 were, in pursuance of the said order, paid into Court in April 1842, and were laid out in the purchase of £4539 7s. 1d., three per cent. Bank Annuities.

The cause was part-heard by the Vice Chancellor in December 1842, when his Honour (by consent) ordered the respondents to pay a further sum of £3597 16s. into Court to the credit of the cause, on account of overpayments made to them by the coal company, according to the judgment in the action, without prejudice, etc.; such sum when paid in to be invested in the purchase of £3 per cent. Bank Annuities; and the Court continued the order of March 1842, by which the railway company were directed to deliver their usual monthly accounts of mileage rates and inclined plane rates to the coal company; and the coal company to pay into the Darlington district bank, in the names of trustees, the amount of the difference between the sum charged in such accounts for mileage rate, and the sum chargeable for mileage rate after the rate of ½d. per ton per mile, for all coal which should be sent by the coal company along the railway, or the branches thereof, for the purpose of being shipped at and exported from Port Clarence or elsewhere, within the port of Stockton-upon-Tees, to the port of London, or elsewhere. And the coal company were ordered to pay the balance of such account to the Stockton and Darlington Railway Company, who, while such payments should be continued, were ordered to give to the coal company the use of their railway and inclined plane, and the steam engine thereat, for the carriage of such coals; and the sums so ordered to be paid into Court to the credit of the cause were ordered to be invested in the usual manner.

In November 1844, after the judgment in the action [27] was affirmed in this House, the appellants presented a petition to the Lord Chancellor in the cause in equity, stating, among other matters, that there was then standing in the name of the Accountant General, in trust and to the credit of the cause, £8525 19s. 11d., three per cent. Bank Annuities, and £124 3s. 3d. cash, which had arisen from the investment of the sums of money paid into Court and the dividends thereof, and submitting that the said sums of £141 Os. 9d., and £4000 and £3597 16s., paid in as aforesaid, ought in the taking of the accounts of over-payments between the coal company and the railway company, to be treated and allowed to the railway company as payments at the times when the same were respectively paid into Court towards repayment to the coal company of the amount of tolls, which, according to the judgment in the action, had been overpaid to the railway company; and that the coal company were entitled to the stock which had arisen from the investment of the said sums, and to all the accumulations and dividends thereof. The petition then prayed that the said sums of £8525 19s. 11d., three per cent. Bank Annuities, and £124 3s. 3d. cash, might be ordered to be paid to persons named as trustees of the coal company, on behalf of the coal company; and that in taking the accounts of the over-payments made by the coal company, the railway company might be credited with the said sums of £141 0s. 9d. cash, £4000 cash, and £3597 16s. paid by them into Court, as payments on account, at the respective times when the same were so paid.

The cause and the petition came on to be heard together before the Vice Chancellor, who made a decree therein, dated January 1845, whereby it was declared, that in respect of all coals which, since the 1st of November, 1836, had been sent by the coal company along the Stockton and Darlington Railway to Sim Pasture, and thence along the Clarence Railway to Port Clarence, for the purpose of [28] being shipped at, and exported from, and which had been shipped at and exported from, Port Clarence or elsewhere within the port of Stockton-upon-Tees, the coal company were entitled to receive back from the railway company the amount of 1½d. per ton per mile out of the rate of 2½d. per ton per mile, paid by the coal company to the railway company, from the 1st of November, 1836, up to the 31st of December, 1840, inclusive; and the amount of ½d. and ¾ths of a penny per ton per mile out of 1½d. per ton per mile paid by the coal company to the railway company, from the 31st of December, 1840, up to the 1st of July, 1841; from which day the said rate of ½d. and ¾ths of a penny had been paid into the Darlington District Bank: And that the coal company were also entitled to receive back the sum of £141 0s. 9d., the amount paid into said Bank in respect of the said rate of ½d. and ¾ths of a penny per ton per mile, and paid into Court in April 1842: And it was referred to the Taxing Master to tax the defendants their costs of the suit and of the petition, to be paid by the plaintiffs: And the plaintiffs and defendants by their counsel agreeing that the sum of £7532 13s. 7d. was the amount to be received back by the coal company in respect of their over-payments, upon the footing of the aforesaid declaration, including the £141 0s. 9d., it was ordered that the amount of the costs of the defendants when taxed should be set off against the said sum; and that the £8525 19s. 11d. three per cent. Bank Annuities, standing in the name of the Accountant General, should be sold, and out of the proceeds, and the sum of £372 9s. 9d. cash in the Bank to the credit of the cause, it was ordered that the balance of the said sum of £7532 13s. 7d., after deducting therefrom the taxed costs of the defendants, should be paid to the trustees of the coal company: And it was ordered that the residue of the proceeds of said sale and of said cash, after such payments as aforesaid, should be paid to the treasurer of the railway company.

[29] Barret and Stokes, plaintiffs in the cause, representing the coal company, appealed against that decree.

Mr. Stuart and Mr. Faber for the appellants.

The first objection to the decree is, that it assumes that the respondents are entitled to charge the appellants on coals sent for export, not only ½d. per ton per mile, which has been thrice decided to be the legal parliamentary rate, but also ½d. per ton per mile for haulage, the right to which, as a charge authorized by the acts of Parliament, has never been admitted by the appellants, but was expressly disputed in the cause. The decree declares that the appellants are entitled to receive back no more than the amount of 1½d. per ton per mile, out of the rate of 2½d. paid by them; whereas it ought to have been declared that they are entitled to receive back 1½d. per ton per mile, out of the said rate of 2½d. The acts of Parliament do not sanction the charge for haulage, and this suit being instituted for repayment of all monies illegally exacted under authority of the Acts, from the 1st of November, 1836, the appellants are entitled to repayment of all sums exacted from them beyond the legal rate of ½d. per ton per mile. If the Court had considered that the respondents had any claim in respect of haulage or other services, it ought to have declared the appellants entitled to receive back the whole amount of the excess above that which has been decided to be the legal parliamentary charge, after deducting such sums, if any, as might appear to be justly chargeable against them for haulage; and in that case an account ought to have been directed to be taken of what haulage or other services, if any, had been rendered by the railway company to the coal company, and what sums were properly payable by the coal company in respect thereof.

Secondly, as the decree established the right of the appellants to recover back sums illegally exacted, they ought to have been allowed interest upon the several sums so exacted, from the times when such over-payments were [30] respectively made. They recovered interest at law on the amount of over-payments made during the period to which the judgment at law applied, and to allow the respondents the benefit of the interest on the monies which were subsequently extorted—illegally as has been now decided—is contrary to the plain principles of equity. The order ought to be that, in ascertaining the amount ordered to be repaid to the appellants, the several sums of £141 Os. 9d., £4000, and £3597 16s., paid by the respondents into Court to the credit of the cause, should be taken as repayments on account to the appellants, at the several times when the same were respectively paid into Court. The result of the cause being, that those monies were the appellants' monies, they ought to have been declared to be entitled to the whole of the stock purchased with them, and to the dividends and accumulations thereof. These being over-payments, which ought never to have been made, and being now declared to be the monies of the appellants, they are entitled to all the benefit that accrued from the investment of them.

The last objection to the decree is, that it fixes the appellants with the costs of the suit, in which they have succeeded, the Vice Chancellor thinking the suit was unnecessary or premature. But the suit being occasioned by the threat of the respondents to distrain on the appellants for the exaction of illegal rates, the decree, instead of visiting the costs on the appellants, whose rights were established, ought to have ordered the whole costs to be paid by the respondents. The appellants were entitled to the benefit of the final judgment in the action from the date of that judgment (November 1840); and their right to maintain a suit in Equity, founded on their legal title, accrued from that date, and not from the date of the decision of this House, by which the respondents writ of error was dismissed. It was, therefore, a mistake to hold that the bill in this cause was filed too soon, or that it was inconsistent with the agreement made in August 1836.

[31] The legality of the charges for the inclined plane having been established by the decision in the action, the appellants have submitted to that decision, and raised no question on that point in this cause.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Smythe for the respondents.

As to the objection to the decree for having given the respondents their costs, the Vice Chancellor could not do otherwise. The bill was not only premature but quite unnecessary, as the action at law would have put a true construction on the Railway Act, and disposed of all the matters in dispute; they were all, except the costs, actually settled out of court before the bill was filed. The appeal has been brought for costs only.

The real question in the cause was, whether the railway company was entitled, up to the 31st of December, 1840, to charge 1d. or  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. for the transit of coals on the railway for export. The passages read from the respondents' answer to the bill on the hearing of the cause, put the appellants out of Court on the merits of that question, for it showed that the  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per ton per mile for the haulage was never disputed. That  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. formed part of the original charge of 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. It has been decided in the action at law that the legal charge for the transit of the coal by the railway was only  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per ton per mile, so that if that charge be added to the charge of  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. for haulage, and other services of that nature, not denied to have been rendered by the respondents, and if both charges, amounting to 1d., be deducted from the rate of 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., which was actually charged, the appellants will be entitled to repayment of the difference. The passage of the answer which was read at the hearing of the cause, distinctly claimed the charge for haulage, and there is no room left for alleging that it is a shift and pretence now set up for the first time. But it also appears, by the special verdict in the action, that the only difference between the parties [32] was, whether 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. or  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. was the legal charge for the transit of the coals. The bill contained an error on this point, which was corrected in the answer.

[The Lord Chancellor.—The bill denies that any haulage, or other service in the nature of haulage, was done for the plaintiffs by the railway company, and denies that the company had any right to charge for it. There is no evidence that any such services were done. Unless there is some evidence of that sort, then it is clear the respondents put the appellants under duress to pay what they had not shown any right to.]

Not only the special verdict and the answer to the bill, but also the evidence in the action, showed that the dispute between the parties was limited to the charge for transit, the charge of  $\frac{1}{4}$ d. for haulage having never been disputed.

As to the objection that the decree did not give the appellants the interest on the monies invested, it appears that the monies were paid by agreement, and the respondents were to hold them until the decision of the Court could be obtained in the action. That agreement was renewed at the trial, and extended till final judgment in the action, as stated in the answer to the bill. The monies were subsequently paid into Court, by orders in this cause, made by consent, for security only, and without any intention of making them productive to either party under the circumstances. Regard being had to that agreement, the appellants could not be entitled even to the principal monies at the time of filing their bill, there being then no final decision in the action. The question of interest depends on the rights of the parties at the date of filing the bill, which professed to be founded on a final decision in the action, which, however, was not given until 1844.

[The Lord Chancellor.—It appears that one of the orders for paying the monies into Court and vesting [33] them, was obtained on the application of the appellants, although with consent of all the parties. The decree orders the monies so paid in, to be repaid, without the interest.]

All the embarrassment in the case arose from the filing of the bill unnecessarily, or, at all events, prematurely: the Vice Chancellor would have done right if he had dismissed it altogether.

Mr. Stuart, in reply.—The main question is, how much we are to recover back; the decree recognizes our right to recover in respect of over-payments, and therefore leaves no ground for any argument for dismissing the bill.

The Lord Chancellor.—It appears to me—but I do not know whether the noble Lords who are present concur with me—that as the Court has pronounced a decree for the repayment of sums of money, and as the parties against whom that decree was made have not appealed, we cannot now take any notice of the argument that the Court ought to have dismissed the bill.

Lord Brougham and Lord Campbell assented.

Mr. Stuart.—That relieves me from the consideration of all questions except this,—whether or not we have got back as much as we are entitled to? Now, how can it be said, taking the case upon the bill and answer, that we have got back all that was justly due to us? The difficulty has arisen from the statement in the answer with respect to haulage or other services. That statement admits that the monthly accounts, up to the end of December 1840, were made out without any separate charge for haulage, or any services whatever. There was no separation in the accounts between the charge for haulage or other services, and the charge for the export tonnage rate. They were mixed up together all the time, from the 1st of November, 1836, till the end of December 1840. [34] We charge in our bill that no haulage or other services were performed, and, therefore, there was no right to make any charge for them during that period. How do the defendants meet that charge in their answer? Is it in evidence that, during the period from the 1st of November, 1836, to the end of December 1840, any haulage or other services were performed? Certainly not. But this is admitted, that whatever haulage or other services were performed, were to be paid for under a special agreement, and not to be levied under the authority of the acts of Parliament; and, moreover, that there never has been any dispute between the parties upon that subject. Now, what is stated in the answer, but which has not been proved in evidence, cannot be assumed to be true, though it may be the subject of inquiry. What is stated in the answer is that passage, the substance of which is, that they allege that they did perform haulages up to August 1837. That is their allegation, which they have not proved, and which, therefore, could only be made the subject of inquiry.

The Lord Chancellor.—They substitute other services in lieu of it after 1837.

Mr. Stuart.—Do they say here that we have agreed to pay for these other services?

The Lord Chancellor.—I do not think you need trouble yourself upon that. There is no doubt that the  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. was charged from November 1836, up to the end of 1840, for something. They say it was in respect of haulage. Then the answer states that the haulage was discontinued in August 1837, but they then performed other services which entitled them to the  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per ton per mile, and so it stands upon the answer, and there is no evidence on either side; I think, therefore, there ought to be an inquiry whether the railway company are entitled to the  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per ton per mile from November 1836 to December 1840, with respect to haulage or any other services, —whether they are entitled to it in any way.

[35] Mr. Stuart.—We are perfectly satisfied with that inquiry; it will bring out the justice of the case.

The Lord Chancellor.—If you fail in that inquiry, you will of course have to pay the costs of it.

Mr. Stuart.—That is the main alteration in the decree which I ask; but I ask also that we may have the costs. We have been made to pay the costs; although it is admitted by the decree that we have made over-payments.

Lord Brougham.—Then you mean to say that the alteration which is now suggested in the decree, giving you an inquiry, would relieve you from paying the costs which you have been made to pay.

Mr. Stuart.—On the decree as it stands, we ought to have had the costs.

The Lord Chancellor.—The way in which the facts are established now, is, that the railway company did make an excessive demand. An action was brought to try their right to make that demand, in which the railway company failed. That concluded the question up to November 1836. After final judgment in that action, the railway company continued to make the demand, and to exact from the coal company the payment of these excessive sums: the bill then was filed for the purpose of securing the money over paid, not to leave it in the hands of the railway company, but to get it secured in Court; and also for an injunction to restrain them from going on making these illegal demands, as they ultimately turned out to be. Supposing that the Court had jurisdiction—which is not now in dispute—I cannot say that that was a bill improperly filed, because they were going on charging money against which there was final judgment at law. When they got the judgment of this House, it only showed that they were wrong from the beginning; the parties clearly had the right to file the bill. The result must be, according to the view I take of it, that the plaintiffs ought to have the costs up to the hearing.

[36] Mr. Stuart.—It is the common case of a plaintiff succeeding in his demand.

The Lord Chancellor.—He is justified in filing the bill, and he has succeeded in his demand.

Lord Brougham.—What takes place afterwards must depend upon the result of the inquiry. Not only you may not have your costs quoad ultra, but you may have to pay their costs.

Mr. Stuart.—The subsequent costs I ask to be reserved; that is just: there is a dispute not yet determined, but referred for inquiry.

There still remains the question of interest on the money invested in stock—the question of our having the stock upon the footing of the payment having been made into Court at our risk. I ask your Lordships to give us either the interest or the benefit of the investment in the stocks. There is some difficulty about the terms of the orders being made by consent; but what I say about our right to have the stock, and the fruits of the investment of these sums—which ought never to have been taken from us—is, that it was our application to the Court which produced the investment; and whether they consented to it or not, even if the investment was made by their consent, being made on our application, no consent of theirs could relieve us from the consequences of having applied to the Court to invest. The investment was made on our application, and, according to my view, it would be open to them, if it turned out that we had been wrong instead of right, and if they became entitled to the money in dispute, to say “It was you who applied to the Court to invest it; you have been raising a dispute in which you have failed; the result of your failure is, that the bill is dismissed, and we are put in the same position that we were in before; we are now entitled to that money in dispute between us, and if we had it, we should have had interest; now you fail in your suit, and your investment in the funds has turned [37] out badly, and we are to be paid for the result of those two bad speculations." I think the result in that case would be, that the railway company would be entitled to get back their money with interest, and also the costs of the suit. Why should the same justice not be measured out to the appellants?

The Lord Chancellor.—Assuming that the application was on your behalf, you do not ask to have the stock and the dividends upon it, but you ask for the original naked sum: that is the order you have got. If you meant to say that the money invested and the stock purchased with it was yours in the result, that it was invested on your risk, you ought to have asked for the stock and not for the money. I am now looking at the order of the 16th of March, 1842. The order merely directs the payment of the £4000 into Court, and to invest it; that is consistent, and so is the order of December 1842. Then the decree gives you the original sums. Now, does your appeal apply to that? There is no question about interest, properly speaking. What you are now claiming is the fruit of the investment; and do you raise that question in your appeal?

Mr. Stuart.—We do distinctly in our third reason; and in our petition in the cause—which was adjudicated upon by the Vice Chancellor at the same time with the cause, and the order on it is incorporated in the decree,—we say that these sums, on account of over-payments, were to be treated and allowed as payments at the time when they were paid into Court, and that the petitioners, the coal company, are entitled to the stock which has arisen from the investment of the said sums, and to all the accumulations and dividends thereof. Now, that is treating it in a very fair manner, because we say they were payments on account when these sums of money were paid into Court, in consequence of our filing this bill, in which we turn out to be right. We take them as [38] payments on our account. Up to that time we charge interest on the money, because it was in the pocket of these parties.

The Lord Chancellor.—That is not in question now; you are only asking for the dividends upon the investments.

Mr. Stuart.—I ask to take the stock purchased with those sums of money paid into Court, as repayments pro tanto of the overcharges.

The Lord Chancellor.—The difficulty arises from its being done by consent.

Mr. Stuart.—As to the consent, I trust your Lordships will be of opinion, that if, upon our application, this is done, and they consent to our entering upon this speculation—

The Lord Chancellor.—The worst of it is, that it does not appear that it was part of your application. You apply for an injunction, and then, by some arrangement, it was settled that the money should be paid into Court. I cannot understand those words in any other sense. "By consent, and without prejudice to any question in the cause;" the money was deposited in medio to abide the result of the question of right, and it was to become the property of whichever party should succeed on the question of right.

Mr. Bethell.—Those sums have not been ascertained to be due at all. They are general sums of money paid in on account, not like the specific sums paid originally into the Darlington Bank; but these other sums are paid in merely as security.

The Lord Chancellor.—We can only judge by the order what was the intention of the parties. The order was, that the defendants, the railway company, do, within six weeks from the date thereof, pay the sum of £4000, on account of the over-payments made by the plaintiffs to the defendants, according to the judgment of the Court of Common [39] Pleas, without prejudice to the amount of over-payments into the bank, with privity of the Accountant General, etc. That they agreed to pay, because they admitted there had been a decision against them, and that that £4000, therefore, was due from them to the coal company. They might as well have paid it to the coal company at once, except on account of this, that there had not at that time been judgment in this House on the writ of error. They say that there being a judgment, and it now being ascertained that the contract between the parties was final judgment in the action, and not in this House, no doubt that £4000 was payable by the railway company to the coal company. Instead of paying it over to the latter, the money was paid into Court and invested. The parties agreed to lay it out. What could they agree to lay it out for but that the money, the investment, should abide the result of the question of right and go to the party who succeeded? There was a subsequent order to pay in £3597. There was altogether £7500 and odd, viz.: £4000, £3597 and odd, paid in upon the two orders, besides that which was paid into the Darlington Bank; that was a small sum of £141, but it comes to rather more than what is subsequently found to be due, and, no doubt, the railway company are entitled to have the difference repaid, that is to say, to have so much of that money as was not due from them.

Mr. Stuart.—That is a mere question of apportionment, about which there can be no difficulty. Here you are dealing with this investment in respect of over-payments charged upon us, now decided to have been overpayments, and pending the time that we were obliged to consume in litigation with this party, an accumulation of the dividends takes place—

The Lord Chancellor.—I do not think we need trouble you; you are entitled to have restored so much of the stock as represents the money which you are found entitled to. [40] I proceed on this ground, which does not interfere with any rule of the Court, that the parties paying in the money, which afterwards turns out to be the property of the coal company, have by consent agreed that that should be invested. That consent is repeated in the last order.

Mr. Stuart.—Then I have nothing to trouble your Lordships with; that sets the decree right as to the amount of over-payments; the enquiry that your Lordships suggested will bring out the truth on the other question; subsequent costs will be reserved. We shall be entitled to costs of the suit up to the hearing, and to have the stock, or so much of it as is now ascertained to have been purchased with our money—to have the stock and the accumulations transferred to us.

The Lord Chancellor.—You must have a reference upon some of those matters.

Mr. Stuart.—Yes, of course. There will be no difficulty in working them out in detail.

The order and judgment of the House was to this effect:—

“That so much of the said decree, complained of in the appeal, as directs it to be referred to the Taxing Master of the Court of Chancery, to tax the defendants (respondents) their costs of the suit and the said petition, and as orders that such costs when taxed should be paid by the plaintiffs (the appellants), by being set off as therein-after mentioned, be and the same is hereby reversed; and it is declared that the Durham County Coal Company were entitled to so much of the stock and cash standing to the credit of the cause at the date of the decree as represents £141 0s. 9d., with £1 2s. 6d. interest thereon, making together the sum of £142 3s. 3d.; the sum of £4000—which were respectively paid into Court and invested under order of the 16th of March, 1842—and the sum of £3391 12s. 10d., part of the sum of £3597 16s. cash, which was also paid into Court, and invested under order of the 5th of December, 1842, it being admitted that the said sums of £141 0s. 9d., £4000, and [41] £3391 12s. 10d., making together the sum of £7532 13s. 7d., is the amount in the decree mentioned agreed to be received back by the Durham County Coal Company.

“And it is further ordered, that it be referred to the Master of the said Court to ascertain the portion of the said stock and cash which belonged to the said coal company, having regard to the aforesaid declaration; and also to inquire and state how much of the £8535 19s. 11d. bank three per cent annuities, and £372 9s. 9d. cash, standing in the bank in the name of the Accountant General, to the credit of this cause at the date of the said decree, was sold and applied in payment of the sum paid by the said Accountant General, under the said decree, to F. Scott Stokes and Geo. Townsend Andrews, as trustees of the said coal company, and what is the amount of the difference between the portion of the said £8535 19s. 11d. bank annuities, and £372 9s. 9d. cash, sold and applied for the purpose of the last mentioned payment, and the portion of the said £8535 19s. 11d. bank annuities, and £372 9s. 9d. cash, which he shall find to have belonged to the said coal company. And it is further ordered, that the said Master do ascertain the value in cash, according to the price of stock at the time of the last mentioned sale, of the excess (if any) of the stock and cash so belonging to the said coal company, over the stock and cash sold and applied in making the aforesaid payment to the said F. S. Stokes and G. T. Andrews, as trustees of the said company. And that what the Master shall find to be the amount of the value in cash of such excess at the time aforesaid, be paid by the defendants, the Stockton and Darlington Railway Company, to the said trustees of the said coal company.

"And, it is further ordered, that it be referred to the Taxing Master of the said Court to tax the plaintiffs' their costs of this suit and of the said petition, up to and including the costs of the hearing of this cause in January 1845, before His Honour the Vice Chancellor of England; and that such costs, when taxed, be paid by the defendants, the railway company, to the said trustees of the said coal company.

"And it is further ordered, that it be referred to the said Master in rotation to inquire and state to the Court whether the said railway company were entitled to a charge of  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per ton per mile, or any or what other charge upon any and what quantities of coals sent or carried by the said coal company, along the Stockton and Darlington Railway, in any [42] part thereof to Sim Pasture, between the 1st of November, 1836, and the 31st of December, 1840, in respect of haulage or any other services done or rendered to or for the said coal company by the said railway company during the last mentioned period, or any or what part or parts thereof, and if he shall find that the railway company were entitled to make such charge, that he do also ascertain what is the amount of the several sums of money which were charged by the said railway company to the said coal company during the last mentioned period, in respect of the last mentioned rate of  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per ton per mile, and what is the amount which the railway company were entitled to charge as aforesaid.

"And it is further ordered, that all further directions and subsequent costs be reserved until after the said Master shall have made his report; and that the said cause be remitted back to the Court of Chancery to do what may be just and consistent with this judgment and declaration."—Lords' Journals, 18th of March, 1847.

Settlement—Portions.

The trusts of a term in a post-nuptial settlement of real estates were: "After the decease of the husband and wife (the settlors), to raise £1000 for the portion of every daughter and younger son, to be paid to sons at the age of twenty-one, and to daughters at that age or marriage, if such ages should be attained or marriages had after the decease of the survivor of the settlors, and not sooner: And if any younger son died, or became an eldest or only son before twenty-one, or any daughter died before that age unmarried, or before his or her portion became vested, the portions provided for such son or daughter, so dying, etc., before his or her portion became payable as aforesaid, should survive and accrue to the survivors of such daughters and younger sons, to be equally divided between them, and paid when their original portions should become payable."

Then followed a proviso for the issue of a younger son or daughter dying in the lifetime of the settlors, or after their death before his or her portion became due and payable: And a trust, after the death of the settlors, for maintenance of such sons and daughters, or their issue, entitled to portions as aforesaid, until his or her portion became payable: With cesser of the term, on payment of the portions, or in case there should not be any younger children or issue of them living at the death of the survivor of the settlors.

The settlors had seven children (besides an eldest son), four of whom died in the lifetime of their parents, under the age of twenty-one, and unmarried.

Held, by the Lords, reversing a decree in Chancery, that the three survivors were entitled to have the portions of the four deceased children raised for them, in addition to their own.

The question in this appeal was, whether a sum of £7000 or £3000 was raiseable under the trusts of a term comprised in a post-nuptial settlement, made, in 1794, by and between Charles Evans and Mary Caroline his wife, of the first part, and three sets of trustees of the second, third, and fourth parts, respectively.

[44] By that settlement, real estates (which had been devised to the lady by her father) were limited to the use of trustees for 99 years, upon trusts long since determined, and subject thereto to the use of the said Charles Evans, for his life; with remainder to the use of the said Mary Caroline Evans, for her life; with remainder to the use of trustees to preserve contingent remainders; with remainder to the use of John Niblett and Thomas Brockhurst, their executors, administrators, and assigns, for a term of 500 years, to commence from the day of the decease of the survivor of them, the said Charles Evans and Mary Caroline his wife; with remainder to the use of Charles Barrow Evans (then the only son and heir apparent of the said Charles Evans by the said Mary Caroline his wife, but since deceased), and his assigns for his life; with remainder to the use of trustees during his life to preserve contingent remainders; with remainder to the use of the heirs male of the body of the said Charles Barrow Evans, with other remainders not necessary to be mentioned.

The deed then proceeded to declare, that the term of 500 years was limited upon this special trust, and for the intent and purpose that they (the above named trustees)

“Do and shall, after the decease of the survivor of them, the said Charles Evans, and of the said Mary Caroline his wife, by sale, mortgage, or demise of all or any part of the premises herein comprised, or by and out of the rents, issues, and profits thereof, as to them (the trustees) shall seem meet, levy and raise the sum of £1000 for the portion of each and every of the daughter and daughters, younger son and sons of the said Charles Evans by the said Mary Caroline his wife, to be paid, etc., that is, the portion or portions of such of them as shall be a younger son or sons to be paid unto him or them at his or their age or ages of twenty-one years, and the portion or portions of such of the said children as shall be a daughter or [45] daughters, to be paid to her or them at her or their age or respective ages of twenty-one years, or day or days of marriage, which shall first happen, if such respective ages shall be attained or marriages had after the decease of the survivor of them, the said Charles Evans and Mary Caroline his wife, and not sooner.”

“And in case any of the younger son or sons of the said Charles Evans, by the said Mary Caroline his wife, shall happen to die before he or they shall have attained his or their age or respective ages of twenty-one years, or shall happen to become an eldest or only son before he shall attain his age of twenty-one years, or if any of the daughters of the said Charles Evans by the said Mary Caroline his wife, shall happen to die before she or they shall have attained her or their age or respective ages of twenty-one years or have been married, or before his, her, or their portion or portions shall become vested, then and in such case the portion or portions hereinbefore provided for all and every such younger son or sons so dying, or becoming an eldest or only son, and for all and every such daughter and daughters so dying and unmarried, before his, her, or their said portion or portions shall become payable as aforesaid, shall go, survive, and accrue to the survivors and survivor of such daughters and younger sons, equally to be divided between them, and to be paid and payable at the same time and times as his, her, or their original portion or portions is or are hereinbefore directed to be raised and paid, or shall become payable as aforesaid: And if any other of the children, being a son, shall die or become an eldest or only son before the times or ages aforesaid, or, being a daughter or daughters, shall die unmarried before the said age or ages, then such surviving or accruing portion or portions shall, from time to time, be again subject and liable to the same or the like right, chance, or condition of accruer or survivorship to and amongst the remaining child and children, as herein-[46]-before is expressed, touching his, her, or their original portion or portions.”

“Provided always, that in case any or either of such younger sons or daughters shall happen to die in the lifetime of the said Charles Evans and Mary Caroline his wife, or after the decease of the survivor of them, before his, her, or their portion or portions so provided and intended as aforesaid shall become due and payable, leaving issue, then such child or children to be entitled to have, receive, and take the share or shares, portion or portions, as his, her, or their parent or parents would have been entitled unto if living, in equal shares and proportions, if more than one, and if but one, then he or she to have, receive and take the whole thereof, subject to the like clauses of survivorship or right of accruer."

"And upon further trust, that they (the said trustees) do and shall in the meantime and from and after the decease of the survivor of them the said Charles Evans and Mary Caroline his wife, by and out of the yearly issues and profits of the said premises comprised in the said term of 500 years, raise and pay unto, for or towards the maintenance and education of all and every of the said younger son and sons, daughter and daughters of the body of the said Charles Evans by the said Mary Caroline his wife, entitled to such portion or portions as aforesaid, or the issue of such son or sons, daughter or daughters, who shall then be entitled thereto as aforesaid, interest for their respective portions at and after the rate of £5 for every £100 by the year, until his, her, or their original portion or portions shall become payable by virtue of these presents; and upon this further trust to permit and suffer the said Charles Barrow Evans, or the person or persons who shall, by virtue of the limitations hereinbefore contained, be then entitled to the reversion and inheritance of the said premises comprised in the said term of 500 years, to receive and take the residue of the rents, issues, and profits [47] of the said premises to and for his or their own use and benefit."

"Provided also, and it is hereby declared, that from and immediately after the raising and paying the said respective portions hereinbefore provided for the said younger son and sons, daughter and daughters of the said Charles Evans, by the said Mary Caroline his wife; or in case the said portion or portions shall be paid by the said Charles Barrow Evans, or the person or persons who shall or may be entitled to the reversion and inheritance of the said premises expectant on the determination of the said term of 500 years; or in case there shall not happen to be any younger children, or the issue of any of them living at the time of the decease of the survivor of them the said Charles Evans and Mary Caroline his wife, then and in either of those cases, the said term of 500 years shall cease, determine, and become absolutely void."

The deed contained, among other powers and provisos, a power to raise £10,000 for such purposes as the said Charles Evans and wife might appoint; and a power to raise £10,000 for the advancement and benefit of the younger children. in addition to the provisions made for them under the said term of 500 years.

There was issue of the marriage between Charles Evans and Mary Caroline his wife, nine children, three born before the date of the settlement, and six afterwards, viz.: Charles Barrow Evans, the eldest son (father of the respondent, C. B. Evans), Thomas Barrow Evans, born in 1791; Mary Caroline, born in 1792; Maria Augusta, born in 1794; Henry Barrow, born in 1796; Mary Ann, born in 1797; Lucia Maria, born in 1799; Edmund Barrow, born in 1800; and Catherine Sophia Evans, born in 1802. T. B. Evans, the second son, died previously to the date of the settlement; four of the other younger children, viz.: the said Mary Caroline, Mary Ann, Lucy Maria, and Catherine Sophia Evans, died in [48] the lifetime of their parents, under the age of twenty-one years, and unmarried. Their father died in 1819, leaving his said wife and the other four children surviving.

In 1820, certain deeds, to some extent resettling the estates, but still subject to the trusts of the term of 500 years, were executed by Mrs. Evans and C. B. Evans, the eldest son, and others therein named; and, in pursuance of these deeds, a sum of £10,000, in lieu of the £10,000 provided for by the settlement of 1794, was raised for the three younger surviving children.

Mary Caroline Evans, the widow, died in 1837, leaving the said eldest and two younger sons and a daughter surviving, and thereupon C. B. Evans, the eldest son, became tenant for life in possession of the estates comprised in the settlement. He died in 1841, leaving the respondent, C. B. Evans, his eldest son, who thereupon became the first tenant in tail of the said estates, subject to the charges affecting them under the said indentures.

In 1844, a bill was filed in Chancery, in the name of the respondent C. B. Evans, infant tenant in tail, by his next friend, against the respondent R. A. Scott, assignee of the term of 500 years, and against the appellants H. B. Evans, Edmund B. Evans, and Maria Augusta Evans, the surviving younger children of Charles Evans and Mary Caroline his wife.

By this bill, and the answers of the defendants thereto, the question was raised whether the sum of £7000, that is, £1000 for each child of Charles and Mary Caroline Evans, except the eldest son, living at the date of the settlement of 1794, or born afterwards, was raiseable out of the settled estates, under the trusts thereof, or only £3000, that is, £1000 for each of the three younger children who lived to attain the age of twenty-one years, and survived both parents.

The cause was heard before Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, who, by his decree thereon, declared that in the [49] events which happened the principal sum of £3000 only became, and was raiseable for the portions of the surviving daughter and younger sons of Charles Evans and Mary Caroline his wife, under the indenture of February, 1794, in the pleadings mentioned, and that the same became so raiseable from the death of the said Mary Caroline Evans, with interest thereon from that time, at the rate of £4 per cent per annum.*

* The following extract is made from a short-hand writer's notes, which were furnished to the Lords, and admitted by the counsel on both sides to be correct:—

Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce.—“The good sense of the dispute involved in this case, if such an expression may be used, seems to be rather on the side of the plaintiff than on that of the defendants; but, of course, the question being one of mere law, must be decided on legal principles merely. The settlement to be construed—which is inartificially and inaccurately worded, and, as to the interpretation of which, it was scarcely possible to expect that differences should not arise—may, perhaps, be conjectured to have been prepared with the aid, if that is a proper term, of some precedent or form inapplicable to the case, either alone or together with some other precedent, which by itself might have been serviceable. However it may have been, it is not clear that a part of its provisions does not transgress the rules of law. That particular point, however, does not arise on the present occasion. The facts, with reference to which the Court has to interpret the deed, are these:—Mr. and Mrs. Evans, the settlors, are dead; there were nine children of their marriage; four only of them, three sons and one daughter, survived their parents, and they included the son, who, when the settlement was made, was the only son. The other five died in their father's lifetime, minors, without having been married. One of the five died before the date of the settlement. In this state of circumstances, the defendants contend, that the amount of portions raiseable under the term of 500 years, for the daughter and younger sons who survived the parents, is £7000, the plaintiff, that it is only £3000.

“The first question is, what are the meaning and effect of these words, ‘do and shall, after the decease of the survivor of them, the said Charles Evans,’ etc. [His Honour read the clause of the deed of settlement for raising £1000 for the portion of each of the younger children, as above, p. 44, and proceeded.] “What, I say, are the meaning and effect of these words, considered as standing alone, as not controlled or affected by any part of the context? Thus considered, I am of opinion, certainly, that they must be read as not showing an intention that any child should take more than £1000, and as not extending to any daughter or younger son who should die in the parents' lifetime a minor, without having been married; that is, as not providing a portion for any child so circumstanced. To hold otherwise would be to contradict the most clearly binding authority. The case is one of portions charged on real estate by deed. What, however, is the effect of the context? I am not sure that its effect is not so to restrict the words I have quoted, as to prevent them from extending to any child, who, at whatsoever age, should, whether married or unmarried, die in the lifetime of Mr. and Mrs. Evans, without leaving issue. This particular point, however, I think it not necessary to decide, and I leave it undecided. A question necessary, however, to be determined is, whether the second clause, that I mean immediately following the words that I have read, comprises or extends to younger children who should, in the lifetime of Mr. and Mrs. Evans, die minors, without

The surviving younger sons and daughter appealed against the decree.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Wigram (with whom was Mr. G. M. Giffard) for the appellants (December 20, 1844).

According to the true construction of the trusts of the settlement, the appellants are entitled to have £7000 [50] raised for them, with interest from the date of their mother's death. It is no objection to their claim that they thought for some time after their title accrued, that a sum of £3000 only, that is, £1000 for each, was raiseable, [51] and they were content to receive the interest of that sum; but, in 1841, they were advised that they were entitled to £7000. Upon due consideration of the clauses and provisions of the settlement, the meaning to be collected from [52] them is, that a portion of £1000 was to be raised in respect of each and every child, except the eldest son, and the portions of such of them as, being sons, should die under the age of twenty-one, or, being daughters, should die under that age, and without being married, were to survive to the others. There is no claim now made in respect of the child who died before the date of the settlement, but every child then in case (except the eldest son), and born afterwards, was entitled to an expectant interest in £1000, payable at the age of twenty-one, or on marriage, and after the decease of the parents. Four of the children having died before any of these events occurred, the portions that were chargeable for them became, by virtue of the clause of accruer, raiseable for those who survived, and who fulfilled all the having been married, because if it does, it may be thought to defeat the plaintiff's case, or give weight to that of the defendants.

"That clause is expressed, 'and in case any of the younger son or sons of the said Charles Evans,' etc. [His Honour read the proviso for accruer, as above, p. 45.] "Whatever may be thought of the words 'survivors and survivor,' the words 'his, her, or their portion or portions,' and the words 'hereinbefore provided,' in this clause, seem to me not immaterial, in my judgment, combined with other parts of the deed, and particularly with the language of the provisions relating to maintenance and education, and interest, where the words are 'for and towards the maintenance and education of all and every the said younger son,' etc. [He read the trust to raise maintenance, as above, p. 46.] "They have the effect of showing that the second clause (the accruer) was not intended to comprise or extend to any younger child, who in the parents' lifetime should die a minor without having been married. Consistently with the first clause quoted, considered as standing alone, such a child could not be a child for whom a portion was intended, nor, of course, could such a child be within the provision as to maintenance, education, and interest occurring later in the deed to which I have already referred; but younger children who, after their parents' death, should die minors, without having been married, must, in every possible view of the settlement, be considered as children for whom portions were provided, although not become entitled to receive the capital, or to a vested right in the capital; for the interest is made a fund for their maintenance.

"On the whole, after reading this deed more than once, and attending to the arguments that have been addressed to me, and especially by Mr. Hodgson, upon the words, 'or before his, her, or their portion or portions should become vested,' and upon the mode in which the word 'payable' is used, I find myself unable to come to the conclusion that the context renders it necessary or fit to interpret the clause which I first read, as extending to any daughter or younger son who should die in the parents' lifetime a minor without having been married; that is, as providing a portion for any child so circumstanced; and looking at every part of the instrument,—but not saying whether, if either of the children who died in the parents' lifetime had so died after attaining majority, or had, after the deaths of Mr. and Mrs. Evans, died in minority without having been married, the amount raiseable for portions under the term would or would not, in my opinion, have been more than £3000,—I think that, in the events which have happened, I am rightly construing the deed before me, and acting in conformity with the spirit of such decided cases as can be considered of authority on this subject, in holding, that the whole amount of principal raiseable for portions under the term of 500 years, is £3000; and I do so declare. The directions consequential on this declaration will be much of course."

conditions. The raising of the portions were postponed by the settlement until after the death of both parents, but that did not prevent them being charges on the estates in the events that happened. The Vice Chancellor, in his construction, relied too confidently on the terms of the clause for maintenance and education, which, of course, must be held applicable to children who survive their parents, those who die before not requiring maintenance. That clause is quite independent, and should not be held to govern the construction of the other clauses. The material clauses are the first, for raising the portions, and the clause of [53] accruer and survivor, which, taken together, will not bear the Vice Chancellor's construction. The principle of construction applicable to them, is that which is found in the case of Emperor v. Rolfe (1 Ves., sen. 208).

There is no question as to the vesting of the portions in the present case; nor is there any doubt that the appellants fulfil the conditions upon which the settlement directed the portions to be raised, and to go over under the clause of accruer. The question is, has that clause come into operation? Let us take the case of only one of the deceased children, Mary Caroline, for instance, who died in 1812, under the age of twenty-one, and without having been married, it is clear that, in that event, the portion of £1000; raiseable for her, passed by the clause of accruer to the survivors who lived to fulfil the required conditions; upon the events mentioned happening, the clause came into operation.

Mr. Russell and Mr. Hodgson (with whom was Mr. J. B. Parry) for the respondents.

Courts of equity have gone far in struggling against and controlling the meaning of words contained in settlements for raising portions for younger children. It is admitted, on the part of the appellants, that the motive for this settlement, construed as they suggest, was to effect an extraordinary purpose. Their construction would lead to this, that only one younger child attaining twenty-one, and surviving the parents, would take all the portions, to the impoverishment of the eldest son. Disregarding the main scope of the settlement, they resort to the two first clauses for the purpose of giving a construction to the whole deed. Upon the true construction of the whole of this settlement, it is clear it was not the intention of the settlors that any portion should be raised for a [54] daughter or younger son who should die in the lifetime of the parents or the surviving parent, or at least for a younger son who should die in the lifetime of such parent under twenty-one, or for a daughter who should die in the lifetime of the surviving parent under twenty-one, and without having been married. The clauses of accruer and survivorship were not intended to apply to or as between children, who neither survived both parents, nor, being sons, attained the age of twenty-one, or, being daughters, attained that age, or married: And as to raising portions out of real estate, it has been the settled law ever since Poulet v. Poulet (1 Vern. 204, 321), that if a child dies before his portion becomes vested, that portion is not to be raised.

It is evident, upon the face of this settlement, that some mistake happened in drawing it, and putting together clauses which are inconsistent with each other and with the general purposes of the settlement. It was a conveyance to trustees to uses; there is no fault in the limitations of the freehold, but the confusion is in the clauses declaring the trusts of this term of 500 years, by which a sum of £1000 was to be raised—not for each and every child attaining twenty-one, or marriage—not a fixed sum of £7000 or £10,000 to be appointed or divided between such children in the usual way—but £1000 for each and every child born, except the eldest son, with clauses of accruer and survivorship carrying over the portions of such of the children as should die under twenty-one unmarried. Such a settlement is not known in practice. The case of Poulet v. Poulet, in which the Court refused to order the raising of a portion which was not wanted, has governed the construction of many settlements. As in Hinchinbroke v. Seymour (1 Bro. C. C. 395), Lord Thurlow said, "The meaning of a charge for children is, that it shall take place when it shall be wanted; it is [55] contrary to the nature of such a charge to have it raised before that time." And Sir A. Hart, adverting to that case in Edgeworth v. Edgeworth (1 Beatty, 328), says, "It has been said that Lord Eldon, in M'Queen v. Farquhar (11 Ves. 467), has impugned that authority by intimating that there was a circumstance of fraud, etc.; but I cannot think that Lord Thurlow would have been silent as to the fraud, if it had constituted the ground of his judgment. I imply from his language that he decided the case upon a principle applicable to every power of that nature, and intended to lay down the law of the rule generally, and not to make that case an exception to a rule. Lord Thurlow's opinion is justified by the doctrines of preceding Judges in other cases." Sir A. Hart cites those other cases, as Bruen v. Bruen (2 Vern. 439), King v. Withers (Forrester, 121), and Lord Teynham v. Webb (2 Ves., sen. 198), in which last case Lord Hardwicke said, "the head of portions for younger children admits of a greater variety of determinations, and of judgment on circumstances, than perhaps any other head." The principle of construction of such provisions is to adjust the burdens on the estate between the eldest and younger children. The wording of the settlements must be struggled with, and so interpreted as to prevent their operating contrary to the intention of the parties. The reasonable interpretation of the clauses in this settlement is to hold that the £1000 was to be raised for such children as should live to want it. The provisions are of an anomalous kind; the dispositive part of the trust does not agree with the creative part; if the portions were payable at twenty-one, or marriages, there would be no doubt. Suppose there were twenty or more younger children born, to raise £1000 for each would leave the eldest no interest in these estates. The only construction that gives effect to all the clauses of the settlement, and [56] reconciles the authorities, is that which directs portions to be raised for those who live to the age of twenty-one—

[The Lord Chancellor.—Cholmondley v. Meyrick (1 Eden 77), is opposed to that construction. If the attaining the age of twenty-one be the contingency to entitle to portions, then if any child died under twenty-one, leaving children, they would be destitute.]

Not so: that event is expressly provided for, and the words "share and shares" in that proviso show the inaccuracy and inaptness of the settlement. To attain the age of twenty-one, or marriage, was not enough to entitle a child to a portion, but also to survive the parents, "if such ages shall be attained, or marriages had, after the decease of the survivor of" the parents, upon which event also, in the accruer clause, the portions were to become vested. The cesser clause also was most material to be considered, it being thereby declared that the term should cease after payment of the portions, "or in case there shall not happen to be any younger children, or the issue of any of them living at the time of the decease of the survivor of the said C. Evans and Mary Caroline his wife." The proviso for cesser has been the governing matter in those cases; Powis v. Burdett (9 Ves. 428). In Howgrave v. Cartier (3 Ves. and B. 79; Coop. 66), Sir W. Grant says, "If the settlement clearly and unequivocally makes the right of the child to a provision depend upon its surviving both or either of the parents, a court of equity has no authority to control that disposition. If the settlement is incorrectly or ambiguously expressed, if it contains conflicting and contradictory clauses, so as to leave in a degree uncertain the period at which, or the contingency upon which the shares are to vest, the Court leans strongly towards the construction which gives a vested interest to the child, when that child stands in need of a provision, usually as to sons at the age of twenty-one, and as to daughters at that age or marriage."

[57] [The Lord Chancellor.—But to reconcile the clauses in the present case with your construction, you must introduce some words, such as "after the death of the parents." Now, what words would you introduce? Lords Brougham and Campbell put the like question.]

None at all. We would only give their legal effect to the words that are found in the clause. [The learned counsel commented on some of the cases before referred to, and particularly on Hope v. Lord Clifden (6 Ves. 499), which has also been cited for the appellants.]

Mr. Turner replied.

The Lord Chancellor (March 30).—My Lords; it is a well established rule as to portions or legacies payable out of lands, that if made payable at a certain age, a marriage, or other event personal to the party to be benefited, and such party die before that time arrive, the portion or legacy is not to be raised out of the land; but if the payment be postponed until the happening of an event not referable to the person of the party to be benefited, but to the circumstances of the estate out of which the portion or legacy is to be paid, such as the death of a tenant for life, then it will be raiseable after the death of the tenant for life, although the term out of which it was to be raised had not arisen in consequence of the party to be benefited not having been in esse at the time of the death of the tenant for life, as in Emperor v. Rolfe (1 Ves., sen. 208), Cholmondley v. Meyrick (1 Eden. 77; id. 85), and many other cases.

The portions in question were provided for children who died infants and unmarried, and would not, therefore, according to this rule, be raiseable for the benefit of such children, but the question is, whether the settlement has not in that event provided that the portions intended for such children, so failing as to them, should be raised for [58] the benefit of other surviving children; and in examining the settlement for the purpose of discovering the intention of the parties in this respect, it must be borne in mind that the vesting of the portions did not, according to the above rule, depend in any respect upon the portioners surviving the tenant for life, and, therefore, that the children whose portions were in question, would have been entitled to their portions if they had attained twenty-one years, or the other events specified had happened, although they had afterwards died in the lifetime of the tenant for life. The settlement providing for the event of children not becoming entitled to their portions in case of death under twenty-one, or the other events personal to themselves, after directing payment to those children who should attain that age after the death of the tenant for life, and not sooner, declared, "And in case any of the younger son or sons of the said Charles Evans, by the said Mary Caroline his wife, shall happen to die before he or they shall have attained his or their age or respective ages of twenty-one years, or shall happen to become an eldest or only son before he shall attain his age of twenty-one years, or if any of the daughters of the said Charles Evans, by the said Mary Caroline his wife, shall happen to die before she or they shall have attained her or their age or respective ages of twenty-one years, or have been married, or before his, her, or their portion or portions shall become vested, then and in such case the portion or portions hereinbefore provided for all and every such younger son or sons so dying, or becoming an eldest or only son, and for all and every such daughter and daughters so dying and unmarried before his, her, or their said portion or portions shall become payable as aforesaid, shall go, survive, and accrue to the survivors and survivor of such daughters and younger sons, equally to be divided between them, and to be paid and payable at the same time and times as his, her, or their original portion or portions is or [59] are hereinbefore directed to be raised and paid, or shall become payable as aforesaid."

This provision is clear and unambiguous. The portions were payable, that is, became vested in each child at twenty-one, or the happening of the other events specified. But the children in question died before any of those events, and upon such death, according to the plain words of the settlement, the portions to which they would have been entitled, had they lived until such event had happened, survived to the other younger children, and from that moment such surviving children became entitled to the accrued share as much as they were to the original shares, unless there could be found in the settlement, something to show that such was not the intention of the parties, notwithstanding those plain expressions.

After providing for the further accruer of accrued shares, we find a proviso which appears to me to be of some importance; for it provides for the death of a child, leaving children, before its portion became payable, and gives to such children the portion of such deceased child. Now, as the judgment is founded upon the supposition that as survivorship or accruer was intended upon the death of a child in the lifetime of the tenant for life, it is material to observe that, in this provision, the event of the death of a child in the lifetime of the tenant for life, is in terms provided for, and if this provision be considered as a limitation or restriction upon the generality of the survivorship before given, the allusion to the death of the child in the lifetime of the tenant for life, with reference to such survivorship, is strong to show that the survivorship was not intended to be confined to a death after the death of the tenant for life.

I am aware of a difficulty which might arise upon the construction of this provision if a child had died in the lifetime of the tenant for life, after the happening of the event upon which the portion was made payable, but as [60] this proviso must,

I think, have reference to the clause of survivorship interposing the child of a child before its brothers and sisters, the reference to the death of a child in the lifetime of the tenant for life, tends strongly to show that the survivorship was to take place upon the happening of such an event. It was argued that the reference to that event in this clause tended to show that it was not contemplated in the clause of survivorship, as there was no such reference in that clause. But the answer to that is, that the provision as to survivorship was complete without it.

The observations made upon the provision for maintenance and for the cesser of the 500 years' term, do not appear to me to be of sufficient weight to justify a construction contrary to the obvious meaning of the previous provision. Those, indeed, relating to the term would have been very strong and difficult to be answered, had not the case of Emperor v. Rolfe [1 Ves. sen. 208], and other cases, established, that they ought not to prevail against the intention of the parties as assumed in those cases.

Much stress was laid in the argument upon the circumstance that this provision was not as usual a trust to raise a certain sum, to be divided amongst the younger children, but a particular sum for each child, so that the burden upon the estate was to depend upon the number of younger children. This may not be so provident a provision as the other, but I do not see how that affects the argument, as it is clear that there was to be a survivorship with respect to those particular sums. In the ordinary case, the sum to be raised is generally made to vary with the number of children, and in this the provision is for so many thousand pounds as there should be younger children; and although that provision would be more burdensome than the other, if there should be an extraordinary number of younger children, it would probably be less so if the number should be less than the average.

The decree assumes, that all the provisions for survivor-[61]-ship apply only to deaths of children after the determination of the estate for life, but it cannot be disputed that the portions would vest in children attaining twenty-one, or the happening of the other events specified, although the tenant for life should then be living, and the survivorship is to take place upon the death of any child before attaining twenty-one, or such other events happening, without reference to the tenancy for life, whether it is continuing or not; but if the construction assumed by the decree should be adopted, no such survivorship would take place upon the death of any child in the lifetime of the tenant for life, which would be contrary to the expressed terms of the gift.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the decree is in this respect wrong, and that the survivorship includes the shares of every child born, who, if it had lived to attain twenty-one, or till the happening of the other events specified, would have been entitled to a portion. If your Lordships should agree in the opinion which I have now expressed, I apprehend the course to be taken would be to declare that, and then refer it to the Master to make the necessary inquiries.

Lord Brougham.—I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend in the principle which, in the outset of his argument, he stated to be the rule to govern such cases as this, and also in the opinion at which he has arrived, and at which I arrived in the course of the argument; that the decree cannot in this respect be supported, for that the survivorship applies to the children who should die, whether before or after the determination of the life estate. I do not find in the argument of the very learned and able Judge, from whose decision this appeal is brought, any sufficient reason to countervail the arguments, which appear to me, both upon principle and the true construction of the settlement, and also upon the [62] authority of the cases, to be entitled to govern the decision in this case. I do not find that the learned Judge has argued this case—if we are furnished with a correct note of what fell from his Honour—in such a manner as to convince me, that a judgment proceeding upon the reasons which he is said to have given, can be supported.

It is very material to consider, as my noble and learned friend has already remarked, that there is in this settlement, in express terms, a provision made for survivorship between children before the determination of the life estate. That is most material, for it shows that that was, at least in one part of the arrangement, in the contemplation—and expressed so to be—of the parties to this settlement, and that provision was accordingly made for that event happening.

I should observe, that the only ground upon which it is possible, in my opinion, to sustain this decision, and to hold that by survivorship you are here to mean only survivorship between children in being after the determination of the life estate—the only ground upon which it appears to me that this decree can be supported—is that which was most ably taken by the learned counsel for the respondent (I particularly allude to the able argument of Mr. Hodgson), that you have to consider the creation of the term as provided for at the beginning of the settlement, and that then the clause of accruer only disposes of that which had been called into existence by what may be termed the creative part of the settlement. But I have yet to learn that there is any such rule as this to govern the construction of such instruments; that if terms are created, you have then only to consider that what follows is to dispose of the term so created, and that you have no right to import into the first part—what I may term the creative part of the instrument or settlement—any argument derived from the dispositive part of that settlement. I have yet to learn that there is any such rule of law as [63] that. There clearly is not. I must take the whole together, and where it might remain doubtful, or even more than doubtful; where there might be an inclination against the construction which might afterwards arise from the dispositive part more clearly showing the meaning and intention of the parties; where an inclination might arise which might qualify the term created, it is perfectly clear that you might import into the first part, for the purpose of clearing a matter of doubt, or even of modifying the construction of that part, the clear meaning of the parties, by reflection and operation, as it were, backwards upon it, derived from the language which they have used in disposing of the term so previously created.

In this case I hold it to be clear, that, taking the clause of accruer together with the former, you gather the meaning of the parties to the settlement. When it is said that the case of Emperor v. Rolfe [1 Ves. Sen. 208] is one of the few cases which countenance this latitude of interpretation, I cannot go along with that remark at all. In the first place, I think that Emperor v. Rolfe is a considerably stronger case than this. It is a stronger case than this, because there the term was only to be created after the mother's death. The term was only by the force of the settlement to come into existence and be created after the mother's death. That was therefore, properly speaking, not a term created; and Lord Hardwicke, though he appears to have felt that there was some difficulty in the case at first, said it would be a very harsh construction to hold the contrary, and he gave the decision which was afterwards followed in the case of Hope v. Lord Clifden (6 Ves. 499). Lord Eldon there refers to Emperor v. Rolfe, and says it looks very like a new decision. It is a very ingenious, a somewhat elaborate and abundantly characteristic judgment which Lord Eldon gives. He does not decide the case the first day, [64] but in breaking it he goes very much at length into its merits, and he very much applies himself to Emperor v. Rolfe. He comments upon that case, and upon Woodcock v. The Duke of Dorset (3 Bro. C. C., 569), decided by Lord Thurlow; and he goes into the arguments of Lord Thurlow, and applies them to the case then before him. Lord Thurlow says, these words are very strong; their natural meaning is strong and difficult to manage. So Lord Eldon says that he felt the words before him in Hope v. Lord Clifden to be strong and difficult to manage; but nevertheless, considering that he is dealing with the case of parent and child, he must reckon a good deal upon the force of the natural feeling which it was likely to give rise to, and then referring to the words of Lord Hardwicke in Emperor v. Rolfe [1 Ves. Sen. 208], he says he thinks it would be a harsh construction to take an opposite view in the case then before him. Having gone much at large into the case, he says he should wish it might be afterwards again spoken to by the parties. He was frequently unwilling to decide in cases where he had little or no doubt, and, therefore, this wishing to have it spoken to again indicates, to those who knew that learned judge, nothing of doubt upon his mind, for he generally held by his first opinion very strongly, but it only indicates that he had a hesitation in giving out his opinion. It does not follow, to those who knew Lord Eldon and the character of his mind, that he had any doubt in following the cases of Emperor v. Rolfe and Woodcock v. The Duke of Dorset, but that he went entirely along with those cases, and that his mind was clearly made up from the beginning that he had put the right consideration on the settlement in the case of Hope v. Lord Clifden.

The authorities therefore, so far from not bearing out this view, or so far from supporting the decision of the [65] Court below in this case, or from not bearing out the reversal of it, appear to me to bear fully as strong, and even stronger, on this case than on the case of Emperor v. Rolfe. Having weighed, therefore, with the deference due to it, the decision of the learned Judge in the Court below, and having looked also to the plain meaning of the parties, and having regard to this, that there is no rule of law which prevents us from taking the accruer clause—or the dispositive clause, as it was called in the argument—together with the creative clause; having regard also to the leases, and to the arguments and comments used by the learned Judges in disposing of them, I have come to a very clear, and, I must say, a very unhesitating opinion, that the judgment of the Court below cannot be supported, and that it must now be altered in the manner which has been suggested.

Lord Campbell.—I likewise agree that this alteration should take place, which has been suggested, in the decree of his Honour the Vice Chancellor. I acknowledge that I feel regret that I come to that conclusion, because I should be inclined to say with his Honour, that the good sense of the dispute seems to be with the plaintiff in the cause, that is to say, that it would probably be a more desirable arrangement of the affairs of the family, that the sum of £3000 only should be raised instead of the sum of £7000, and I regret exceedingly that I should differ from any Judge whose judgment I have to review, particularly that I should differ in opinion from a Judge for whose learning and ability I have such profound and sincere respect as I have for those of his Honour the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce. But, after having repeatedly read this settlement, and referred to the cases, I must say, that I come to the clear conclusion that the decree is, in this respect, erroneous.

It has been said truly, that Courts of Equity take con-[66]-siderable liberty in construing settlements with regard to the portions of younger children, but that is only in carrying into effect the probable intention of the settlor. A Court of Equity does not make a new settlement; it construes the settlement which has been made. Where it appears that the construction is at all doubtful, and that by putting one construction upon it, what must be supposed to have been the intention of the settlor will be defeated, and by putting another construction, although some violence may be done to the words, the probable intention of the settlor will be carried into effect, you will prefer the latter construction to the former. But where you cannot necessarily come to the conclusion that you defeat the intention of the settlor by putting their natural and grammatical construction upon the words, I know not that a Court of equity, any more than a Court of law, would consider itself justified in not doing so.

Now, looking at the two clauses of the settlement, which must be read together—you must read together what has been called the creating or charging clause, and the dispositive clause—I do not see that we are at all justified in wresting the natural meaning of the words, which is, that if any children shall die, whether in minority or after they have reached majority, their portion shall accrue for the benefit of the surviving children. That is clearly the natural and grammatical construction of the words. Then how are we justified in interpolating any words? The words you must interpose are, “if any of them die after reaching the age of twenty-one.” How are we justified in introducing those words into the settlement? I know that this may be considered a fantastical arrangement on the part of this settlor; it may or may not be that he might so intend; there is nothing absurd in it; there is no gross injustice that can be inflicted upon the eldest son, if it was the intention that he should have exactly the same portion, whether all the [67] children, all his brothers and sisters, that came into esse should reach twenty-one, or whether some of them should have died before reaching twenty-one. It is allowed that, if they reached twenty-one, however numerous the children might be, their portions would all be charged, and would accrue to the surviving children, if they died after twenty-one. Then, if that is so, how can I say that I am justified in interpolating the words which you must necessarily interpolate, namely, “if they shall happen to die in the lifetime of the said Charles Evans and Mary Caroline.”

Now, with the most profound respect for that learned Judge, I could have wished that, in his judgment, if we have an accurate note of it, he had given us a little more at length the reasons which influenced his mind, which I am sure would have been regarded by all the members of this House with the deepest attention. But he seems to have considered it as rather doubtful, whether the portions of these children that reached twenty-one, and died in the lifetime of the parents, could accrue; but the case of Emperor v. Rolfe [1 Ves. Sen. 208], and that class of cases, appear entirely to dispose of that argument, and to shew quite clearly that the portions of the children who reached twenty-one, and died in the lifetime of the parents, must be considered as charged upon the estate, and must be raised for the benefit of the surviving children. If that be so, how am I to draw a distinction between the children that die in the lifetime of the parents having reached twenty-one, and those who die in the lifetime of the parents not having reached twenty-one? It seems to me to be a very arbitrary distinction, and I asked Mr. Hodgson, who argued this case with his usual ability, just to frame the settlement in the words which he, in his great skill, would introduce, so as to carry into effect the construction he put upon them; but he rather discreetly, I think, avoided doing that, because it would have thrown a considerable [68] difficulty even upon him. He would have been obliged to introduce words applicable to children that reached twenty-one, dying in the lifetime of their parents, and other words to apply to those that died under twenty-one in the lifetime of their parents. But is not this making a new clause altogether, and not construing the clause which we find in the settlement?

Upon the whole, I come to the conclusion that, in this case, we are not justified in departing from the natural and grammatical sense of the words; and that there is no authority calling upon us to do so, because those cases to which reference has been made do not go at all beyond establishing this, that to effectuate what must be understood to be the purpose of the settlor, you will put rather a different construction upon the words than their natural meaning. But there is no case which says that you can venture to do so, unless you are sure that you are thereby effectuating what must be supposed to be the intention of the settlor. In this case, I do not at all know that the settlor did not mean what he has said, namely, that with regard to all children that came into esse, and died in minority, or whether they died after reaching majority, either in the lifetime of their parent, or after their parents died, their portions should accrue to the benefit of the surviving children. It seems to me that the view taken of it by my noble and learned friend is correct, and that the decree ought to be reversed.

Lord Brougham.—I ought to have observed that there is one thing which has been too much taken for granted: the right of stretching the construction in a court of equity upon this ground, that provided we can suppose that it might have been the intention of the parties to mean a thing such as living at the death or surviving A. B.; provided it is possible the parties might have meant that, we have a right to say that they meant it. That is a most arbitrary view to take.

[69] Mr. Turner.—Your Lordships' declaration, I presume, will be that a sum of £1000 was to be raised for each of the younger children living at the date of the settlement, and each of the younger children born afterwards, and that that sum of £1000 is to be distributed among the surviving children; and that it be referred to the Master to enquire what younger children were living at the date of the settlement, and what born afterwards.

The Lord Chancellor.—And which of them have died, if any of them have died, and at what age they died, and whether married or not.

Mr. Russell.—Will your Lordships permit me to mention a circumstance which affects only the respondent, C. B. Evans, and which arises out of your Lordships' judgment? He filed the bill as an infant entitled to the inheritance of the estate, subject to this term, and the suit was instituted with the approbation of the Court, and with the sanction of the Master, and an amount of £8000 has been charged upon the estate. Now he may die in infancy, and he has no other property. What I should submit therefore to your Lordships is this, that your Lordships will add to your declaration, that his costs of this appeal will be a charge upon the term.

The Lord Chancellor.—He is a tenant in tail.

Mr. Russell.—Yes, subject to the term. He is defending the inheritance, with the sanction of the Master, and the approbation of the Court.

The Lord Chancellor.—We are not sure that the term will do more than raise the portions for the younger children.

Mr. Russell.—Let it be subject to raising the portions.

Lord Brougham.—That is if there is any surplus.

Mr. Russell.—There is no doubt an ample surplus.

The Lord Chancellor.—Is he of age?

Mr. Russell.—No ; if he was of age it would be immaterial. He is an infant about seven years of age.

[76] The Lord Chancellor.—Then I think it seems reasonable.

IT WAS ORDERED, etc., “that the decree complained of be varied in respect to the declaration therein contained ; that in the events which happened, the principal sum of £3000 only became and was raiseable for the portions of the daughters and younger sons of Charles Evans and Mary Caroline his wife, under the indenture of the 8th of February, 1794,” etc.

“And it is hereby declared, that under the said indenture a portion of £1000 was to be raised in respect of each and every younger child living at or born after the date of the said settlement, and that the portions of such of them as, being sons, died under the age of twenty-one years, or, being daughters, died under that age and unmarried, survived to the others or other of them.”

“And it is further ordered, that it be referred to the Master of the Court of Chancery, etc., to enquire and certify to the said Court what daughters and younger sons of the marriage between the said Charles Evans and Mary Caroline his wife, were living at the date of the said settlement, and what daughters and younger sons were born afterwards, and which of them have died, if any of them have died, and whether married or not.”

“And it is further ordered, that the costs of the appeal incurred by Charles Barrow Evans, the infant tenant in tail, entitled to the inheritance of the said estates, subject to the term of 500 years, created by the said indenture of 8th of February, 1794, be charged on the said inheritance and secured under the said term, subject to the payment of the said portions and the costs of the trustees of the said term, and any other costs that are or may become payable in respect of the said portions to any trustees or trustee, or person or persons, interested therein.”

“And it is further ordered, that the said cause be remitted back to the Court of Chancery, to do therein as shall be consistent with the judgment hereby pronounced, and that on the said Master making his report to the said Court of Chancery, and on the same being duly confirmed, etc., the said Court do make such order or decree on further directions, and as to subsequent costs of the suit, as to the said Court, consistent as aforesaid, may seem meet.”—Lords’ Journals, 30th March, 1847.

[71] JAMES ANDERSON BERRY,—Appellant; GEORGE MORSE and Others,—Respondents [March 22, 1847].

[Mews’ Dig. vii. 1416.]

Guarantie—Costs.

A., by a trust settlement, gave to his son “a like sum of £5000 sterling, payable, etc., after my decease, from which provision shall be deducted any sum that I have already advanced, or may still advance for him, to enable him to carry on his business.” A. entered into a guarantie for £2000 for the firm of which his son was a partner. A. was compelled to pay that sum, and the firm afterwards becoming bankrupt, he obtained from its assets a small dividend.

Held, that this was an advance to the son, which came within the description of money advanced to the son to enable him to carry on his business, and that the son could only claim the balance of the £5000, after deducting the sum thus advanced.

The practice of allowing the costs in such a case to be paid out of the estate, was disregarded.

Dr. Berry, who formerly belonged to the medical establishment at Madras, and on his retirement went to live in Edinburgh, had one son (the appellant) and three daughters. In 1825 he executed a trust disposition and deed of settlement, by which he conveyed his whole estate, heritable and movable, to the respondents, as trustees on trust, to pay each of his children the sum of £5000. The bequest in favour of the appellant was in the following terms:—"And my said trustees are hereby appointed to make payment to my said son, James A. Berry, now residing at Bahia, of the like sum of £5000 sterling, which shall be payable at the first Whitsuntide or Martinmas after my decease; from which provision shall be deducted any sum that I have already advanced, or may still advance for him, to enable him to carry on [72] his business." Dr. Berry did subsequently advance the sum of £1500 to the appellant; and in November 1826, he wrote a memorandum in the following terms:—"The sum of £1500 has been paid to my son James Anderson Berry, in part payment of the £5000 bequeathed to him in this second article of this trust deed." The appellant was a partner in the house of M'Farquhar, Hamilton, and Co., of Liverpool and of Bahia. At the solicitation of the appellant, Dr. Berry, in the year 1827, gave a guarantie in favour of that house to the amount of £2000. This guarantie was only executed for one year. Before the expiration of that period, Dr. Berry, at the request of one of the partners, renewed the guarantie. It appeared that the appellant, who was at that time at Bahia, afterwards expressed his assent to this renewal. M'Farquhar and Co. became bankrupts in 1829, and Dr. Berry was called on to pay the sum for which he had become responsible under the guarantie. He did pay it, and then claimed on the estate of the partnership, from which he received a dividend of 3s. 4d. in the pound, amounting to £338 6s. 8d. Dr. Berry died in August 1833, and among his papers was found a memorandum, dated January 1833, giving a summary of his assets. The amount paid to his son, £1500, was there stated, as were also the sums paid to his daughters in part or in full discharge of their shares as settled in the will; and there was indorsed on this paper a statement of "money lost," which set forth the sums lost, and the persons through whom they had been lost; but in this memorandum Dr. Berry took no notice whatever of the £2000 he had paid on the guarantie. The appellant, after his father's death, claimed payment of £3500 under the trust deed or will, relying on the paper last mentioned, as showing that his father did not intend that the money paid under the guarantie should be treated as "money advanced" to the son, and therefore to be deducted from the £5000 given [73] by the will. The trustees, on the other hand, insisted that the £2000 paid upon the guarantie, fell within the description in the will as "money advanced" for the son, "to enable him to carry on his business." The son instituted a suit in the Court of Session to have his claim declared valid; and the case came before Lord Cuninghame, as Lord Ordinary, who was of opinion that a cautionary engagement for a mercantile house in which the son was a partner, did not amount to an ademption of the legacy given in the will.

In a note appended to his judgment, the Lord Ordinary said, "I do not think that, according to any proper or sound construction of this clause, a cautionary engagement for a mercantile house, in which the son was a partner, can fall within it. Such an advance cannot be viewed as made peculiarly for the son, as he neither got the interest of it, nor any increased share of the profits in respect of the obligation, which he must have got had the sum been advanced peculiarly for his own behoof. Although it is probable that the circumstance of the son being a member of the company induced his father to give up the guarantie, it truly operated as much for the behoof of the other partners as of the son." This interlocutor was carried before the Lords of the First Division of the Court of Session, who reversed it. The appeal was against the reversal.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Anderson for the appellant.—The money paid under the guarantie was not advanced to the son to enable him to carry on his business, and therefore does not fall within the words of the will. Nor was it intended by the testator to be so treated. This is shewn by several facts. In the first place the testator treated himself as a debtor of the house, and took from its general assets such satisfaction for his claim as he could get. He treated the whole affair, therefore, as one [74] of ordinary business with third parties, and not as one of personal favour to his son. In the next place, the renewal of the guarantie was actually made when the son knew nothing of it; and when, therefore, the whole dealing was between the testator and a house of business in this country, without any personal interference by the son.

The principle of construction applied in Scotland to this kind of declaration of trust is very strict, and is in favour of the objects to the testator's bounty. Watson v. Blair (13 Shaw and D. 12). White v. White (3 Dunl. B. and M. 468) is a strong case to shew how that rule of strictness of construction is carried out. There a father in his will made a provision for his eldest and two other sons. He declared that they should all have the same advancement; and that what any one of them owed him at the time of his decease should be imputed to satisfaction of the bequest. He afterwards purchased some heritable property, and made these sons voters; and it was held that the value of what he had so purchased was to be taken as a donation to the sons in the lifetime of the father, and was not to be imputed in payment of their shares in the succession under their father's will.

It cannot be said that this was an advance, but merely that it was a contract which resulted in debt, and not in bounty. It was a contract carried out in the usual way of business, and on which Dr. Berry received full legal satisfaction in his lifetime. It was not therefore an open matter at his death, and the trustees have consequently no right now to examine into it.

It does not appear what was the interest of the son under his guarantie, or whether he was in the least degree benefited by it. Nor can it be said that it was in the terms of the will "an advance to the son to enable him to carry on his business." It was a liability incurred for a [75] partnership, but there is nothing to show to what extent, if any, the son received benefit from it.

Then as to the costs. The decree gives costs against the appellant. This is erroneous. In a case like the present, the costs ought to have come out of the estate. Morrison v. Cavin's Trustees (7 Sh. and Dunl. 810), and The Earl of Strathmore v. Paul (1 W. and S. 199; and on appeal, 1 Rob. Ap. Cas. 189-223). The practice as established by the latter case was, that the costs should come out of the estate, notwithstanding the attempt to set aside a deed by which that estate had been disposed of, was unsuccessful. This practice was there spoken of as clearly established by the law of Scotland (but the practice was there expressly recommended by Lord Brougham to be reconsidered; and the Lord Chancellor intimated his opinion to be unfavourable to the practice).

Mr. Gordon, who appeared for the respondents, was not called upon to address the House.

The Lord Chancellor.—The question is now reduced to a very narrow compass. It depends on the construction we are to give to the words of the deed, considered with reference to the evidence we possess of the nature of the original transaction. The question is, whether the sum paid by the father under this guarantie, is to be considered as a sum advanced by him to enable the son to carry on his business. It has been argued, that this is not to be considered as an advance to the son at all; that it was for the house of which the son was a partner; but that it did not bear the character intended by the father when he spoke of an advance to enable the son to carry on his business. Now what are the facts of the case? The father entered into a guarantie nominally [76] for the house, and for the benefit of the house; but as between the other partners and the son, the money thus advanced for the house was as much the son's money as if he had procured it from any other quarter. The father never contemplated the loss of the money. The time fixed at first in the guarantie elapsed before the money became payable. The father renewed the guarantie; he entered into no new contract, but prolonged the original contract for a year. That was for the advantage of the house, as the original guarantie had been given for the advantage of the house. The son was informed of this proceeding, and on the 18th November, 1828, before he received the information, he wrote to say, "In the event of my remaining here, would you remain guaranty for £1000 or £2000?" That shows that he was well disposed for his father to continue the guarantie for the house, that in fact he consented to the advance to him being made in that form. In the result, the house became insolvent, and the father was obliged to pay the money. Then was not this money advanced to the son to enable him to carry on his business? I am of opinion that it was. It is the money of the father lost in the business of the son. What would be the difference between this and money advanced in the ordinary way I do not know. The money was advanced; the father actually paid it, and paid it in order to further the object he had in view in advancing the money which was to enable the son to carry on his business. Though I do not found my opinion upon the correspondence, yet that correspondence shows that the interests of the son were considered in this advance.

Lord Brougham.—I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend. I am surprised to find some of the Judges in the Court below speaking of this as a question of difficulty. I cannot say that I have entertained any doubt [77] at all about it. I cannot agree with those who look upon this as a transaction which was intended for the benefit of the other partners alone. As between them and the son it cancelled a debt due from the son to the other partners. It was, therefore, an advance directly for the benefit of the son. Was it not money advanced to James for the purpose of helping him to carry on his business? No doubt it was, and no doubt it did help him to do so. In what proportion did it help him? In that in which he was liable to contribute to the general funds of the partnership. In settling the accounts between the son and the partners he would be credited with this amount. I do not found my opinion on matters dehors the instrument, but on the instrument itself, and my knowledge of the facts as to the advance of the money. I am entitled to know these facts, and bound to take them into consideration. The renewal of the guarantie was an act adopted by the son, and there can be no doubt that he thought that renewal would be for his benefit.

Lord Campbell.—I am entirely of the same opinion. We have simply to see in the case what was the intention of the parties. James was to receive £5000 of his father's property, and no more. From that gross amount was to be deducted any sum of money which the testator had advanced to him to enable him to carry on his business. Has this money been advanced with that view? Though actually paid under the second or prolonged guarantie, it is the same sum of money which was secured, with the son's full concurrence, under the first guarantie, and though the son did not at the moment know of the second guarantie, yet when he came to know of it he recognised and adopted it. Then here is a guarantie given by the father, at the request of the son, for the benefit of the son. The son would have the benefit of this money in settling the partnership accounts, and the money may, therefore, be [78] truly said to have been advanced to enable the son to carry on his business. The intention of the settlor would be grievously disappointed by any other construction, for by it the son would get £7000, though by the terms of the will the benefit secured to him is expressly limited to £5000. I cannot doubt as to the intention of the testator, and as to the construction to be put upon his will; and I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court below must be affirmed.

The Lord Chancellor.—As to costs being claimed out of the estate, I am of opinion that that practice is erroneous. The appellant sets up a claim to obtain from the funds of the estate more than it appears he is entitled to. I think he cannot ask to have the costs of making that claim allowed him.

The Lords concurred.

Judgment of the Court below affirmed with costs.

[79] IN THE MATTER OF MARTIN'S DIVORCE BILL.

[March 9, 30, 1847].

[Mews' Dig. vii. 952. In addition to cases cited, 1 H.L.C. 80, n., see Brooks' Divorce Bill, 1 H.L.C. 159.]

Action dispensed with—Lapse of Time.

A petitioner for a divorce bill held excused for not having brought an action for damages against the adulterer, upon the statement of his witnesses, that they did not find him until three years after the discovery of the adultery, and the petitioner was not able to pay the expenses of an action.

A lapse of sixteen years from the adultery not made an objection to the application for divorce at the end of that time.

The order of the day of the second reading of the bill, intituled, "An Act to dissolve the Marriage of Robert Montgomery Martin, Esq., with Jane Avis Frances Martin, his wife," etc., having been read, Mr. Austin, of counsel for the petitioner, opened the allegations of the bill, and said a copy of the proceedings for a divorce à mensa et thoro in the Ecclesiastical Court, was duly laid before their Lordships; but there was no proceeding at law, as no action was brought for the reasons which the witnesses would state. A witness having proved service of copies of the bill, and of the order of the House for the second reading of it, on Mrs. Martin, who was then known as Mrs. Sheridan, Miss Keith, the next witness, said she was sister to Mrs. Martin, and the marriage between her and Mr. Martin was had in Sidney, New South Wales, in 1826, according to the rites of the Church of England. They lived in that colony for about a year and then went to India. They had no child. Witness came to London in 1833, and found Mrs. Martin residing in Pimlico with Dr. Sheridan and bearing his name. They had one child, and a second was born soon afterwards. Witness did not see Mr. Martin from the time of his [80] leaving Sidney until the year 1839, when he returned from Canada. She did not know at what time Mr. Martin became acquainted with the elopement of his wife. Dr. Sheridan was not in good circumstances. He had since then been confined on account of derangement.

Two other witnesses proved that Mr. and Mrs. Martin came to England in 1830, and lived together in London for about a year. Dr. Sheridan was then a frequent visitor to them; but there appeared nothing to excite Mr. Martin's suspicions. After the elopement he was half distracted. From 1832 to 1836, Dr. Sheridan was in embarrassed circumstances, and so was Mr. Martin; he went to Hong-Kong after that, and had but lately returned. These witnesses proved that they had for some months after the elopement, which was in 1831, searched for Dr. Sheridan, by the desire of Mr. Martin, but did not see him till 1834; he was residing in Ebury Street, Pimlico.

Mr. Barron, the solicitor for the bill, said he became acquainted with Mr. Martin in 1839, and was professionally concerned for him in an action brought against him in 1840; and it becoming necessary to pay into Court £200 to abide a reference, which Mr. Martin was not able to pay, witness advanced that sum, which, with other sums, was still due to him. The reference went against Mr. Martin. He went to China in 1844, and returned in 1845. His circumstances were so bad from 1839, that he could not have paid the expenses of an action.

The bill was read a second time on the 30th of March, and passed this House on the 16th of April.

[81] JAMES GERAHTY, Esq.,—Appellant; JOHN ROBERT MALONE and Others,—Respondents [April 19, 20, and 22, 1847].

[Mews' Dig. ix. 1824; S.C., below, 3 Dr. and War. 239; 5 Ir. Eq. R. 549.]

Evicted Lease—Equitable Mortgagee's Right to redeem—Parties—Costs.

A lessee having been evicted for non-payment of rent under the ejectment statutes in Ireland, an equitable mortgagee of his interest filed a bill for redemption against the landlord:—

Held, 1st, that the mortgagee was entitled, under the earliest of these statutes (11 Anne, c. 2), to redeem the evicted premises; and, 2ndly, that trustees of a settlement, to whom the lease had been assigned, were not necessary parties to the suit.

Although the general rule is to make the party seeking a redemption pay the costs of the suit, the Court has jurisdiction to look to the landlord's conduct, and to throw the costs on him according to its discretion.

Two fields near Dublin, containing about ten acres, held by Mary Lyster from the Archbishop of Dublin, were demised by her, by lease dated in 1811, to Michael Frayne, for twenty years, at a rent of £56, with the usual toties quoties covenant for renewal. This lease was made the subject of a settlement by M. Frayne in February 1823, upon the marriage of his son John Frayne with Catherine Nowlan, and the premises were thereby assigned to trustees upon trust, after Michael Frayne's death, to permit John Frayne to receive an annuity of £60 for his life, and after his death, to permit the said Catherine and the children of the marriage, to receive the said annuity, share and share alike.

In December 1823 James Gerahty (the appellant), in whom Mary Lyster's interest in the premises became vested, granted a renewal of the lease to M. Frayne for twenty years more, upon payment of a fine of £235; and the renewed lease also contained a toties quoties covenant of renewal on the part of Gerahty.

[82] Michael Frayne died in 1830, having made a will naming an executor, who renounced, whereupon his daughter, the wife of James Gogarty, obtained administration with the will annexed.

John Frayne received the annuity from his father's death, and died in 1834, leaving the said Catherine his widow, and three children by her, entitled to the annuity. She (the widow) married Charles Duignan in 1837.

A year's rent having become due in March 1838 to Mr. Gerahty, he brought ejectment, and having recovered judgment, was put into possession of the premises. In 1839 John Robert Malone (the respondent), upon application from Michael Frayne, jun., one of the trustees of the settlement of December 1823 (and who was a son of the said Michael Frayne, deceased), paid Mr. Gerahty £85 ls. 6d. for rent and costs, in redemption of the premises, and obtained from the said trustees a deposit of the leases of 1811 and 1823, as security for repayment of the said sum. The rent having been afterwards allowed to fall a year in arrear, the appellant again brought ejectment, and got judgment, and executed his habere in May 1840. Malone again proposed to redeem, and he made a tender of £120 for the full rent and costs. The appellant declined to accept the money unless the consent of Mrs. Duignan (widow of John Frayne) was obtained, which being then obtained, the appellant required also to have a written declaration from Malone and her, with the consent of Charles Duignan, her husband, that the redemption was for the benefit of her and her children by J. Frayne. Some further negotiation took place between the parties, but without any result.

Under these circumstances, a bill for redemption was filed in the Court of Chancery, in Ireland, by Malone, as equitable mortgagee, and by Mrs. Duignan and her children by John Frayne, infants, by Malone, as their [83] next friend, against the appellant. Charles Duignan and Mrs. Gogarty and her husband were made defendants. The trustees of the settlement of 1823 were not made parties. Malone paid £130 into Court to answer the redemption money and costs.

The cause was heard and reheard, in 1843, by Sir Edward Sugden, Lord Chancellor of Ireland, who, after full consideration of all the circumstances, decreed for redemption, and ordered the appellant (the landlord) to pay the costs of the suit. (The case is fully reported in 3 Dru. and War. 239; and also in 5 Ir. Eq. Rep. 549).

The landlord appealed against that decree.

Mr. Gerahty, the appellant, and Mr. Edward Gerahty (both of the Irish bar), were heard for two days and part of a third, in support of the appeal. Their arguments were to this effect:—

The decree is contrary to the express provisions of the Irish Act, 8 Geo. I., c. 2, and to the uniform course of proceedings in Ireland regarding mortgages of leasehold interests, their liability to ejectment for non-payment of rent, and the corresponding rights of redemption. The bill sought to create a charge by mere deposit of the lease, which was previously conveyed by the marriage settlement of 1823, whereby the whole beneficial and legal interest in the then unexpired residue of the term was vested in the trustees to the uses of the marriage, and no conveyance from them to the respondent Malone ever existed, nor was any privity or connection with the term alleged by him. His case was a mere parol transaction with Frayne, jun., one of the trustees, at whose request, and for whose personal advantage, and not for the advantage of the widow and children of John Frayne, the respondent advanced the money. The set-[84]-tlement being deposited with the respondent, he was informed by it of the extent of the term, of the trustees to whom, and of the uses for which, it was assigned; and yet, with such knowledge, he, a stranger to the term, filed his bill to redeem against the reversioner, who was re-possessed of the lands, by force of the ejectment under the statutes. The respondent's case was not to be compared to those of Moores v. Choat (8 Sim. 508), and Robinson v. Rosher (1 Younge and Col. C. C. 9), cited in the Court below; for in them the contracts of deposit were in writing, but in this case there was no writing, and no dealing at all with the parties who had power to encumber the term. The respondent was not even an equitable mortgagee of the term, nor had he any interest in the term, nor possession for a moment under any title. The Act 11 Anne, c. 2, expressly exempted from proceedings in ejectment all mortgagees of leases, not in possession. The first decision establishing a mortgage by deposit of deeds, made by Lord Thurlow in 1785, as stated by Lord Eldon in Ex parte Mountfort (14 Ves. 606), was a surprise on the profession and a departure from the statute. The fourth section of the Act 11 Anne, c. 2, "that in case said lessee or assignee, or other person claiming any right, title, or interest in law or in equity, of, in, or to the said lease, should, within the time aforesaid, file a bill for relief in equity, such person should not have or continue any injunction against the proceeding in such ejectment, unless within forty days after a full answer by lessor, he should bring into Court such sum of money as the lessor should set forth in his answer to be due," was, in this case, entirely misapprehended; it applied to the previously existing inconvenience of filing bills after ejectment brought and before judgment, and obtaining injunctions on pretence of equity to prevent the lessor from [85] recovering possession. The fourth section was a restraining and not an enabling clause, and, at all events, it had no bearing on a state of things after judgment and execution thereon, as in the present case. The right to file a bill to redeem after judgment, was annexed to the class of persons previously enumerated—persons who were ejected and had the right to redeem; and that enumeration did not comprise any person in the position of the respondent, nor was he in the least aided by the amending and explaining acts of 4 Geo. I., c. 5, and 8 Geo. I., c. 2 (Irish), which last act, by the fourth section, expressly empowers mortgagees and assignees of leases to redeem in the circumstances there mentioned. But the sixth section requires all mortgages and assignments of leases to be registered within six months. The mortgage alleged in this case by deposit of deeds only, was incapable of registration, and does not therefore fall within the provisions of the act, whose positive enactments, however, have, since 1721, regulated all mortgages of leases in Ireland in respect to ejectments for non-payment of rent. This and the two preceding statutes on the subject were fully considered and applied by this House in the case of O'Reilly v. Featherstone (2 Dow and Clark, 39).

The Lord Chancellor of Ireland seems himself to have apprehended that, in his judgment in this case, he was running counter to the statutes, for he laboured to establish a jurisdiction in the Court wholly independent of the statutes (see 3 Dru. and W., p. 264). But the statutes passed in Ireland, viz., 11 Anne, c. 2; 4 Geo. I., c. 5; 8 Geo. I., c. 2; 5 Geo. II., c. 4; 25 Geo. II., c. 13; and 17 Geo. III., c. 27, relating to ejectments for non-payment of rent, with successive amendments for pursuing and improving the ejectment remedy, being all in pari materia, are to be considered as one code, or different clauses of one law, in exclusion of all original anterior jurisdiction. The constitution of these [86] connected acts, therefore, contains every rule to be observed on the subject; and there is not a case reported, where several statutes on the same subject and of mutual dependence, all introductory of new legislation, however varying from prior usages, have been brought under the consideration of the Court, in which such combination of legislative acts has not been taken to shut out the common law and all prior rules, and to furnish the Judges with exclusive rules and principles for their administration. The express connection of these Irish statutes, and their remedial character, have been uniformly recognised in every case which has occurred since their enactment; and it has been an universally accepted conclusion, from this series of statutes, that they did not contemplate the continuance of any former jurisdiction. In the case of a single statute, from shortness and imperfection in its construction, there may be ground afterwards to resort to anterior rights and usages as still allowed to prevail, either as not being recognized, or not expressly taken away by such statute; but no such inference appears ever to have been assumed where the subject has been regulated by several acts of Parliament. And even a single act introducing new legislation has been generally considered as an entire substitution for all ancient rules and usages. All the argument used in this case, in search of a jurisdiction, beyond the acts of Parliament, is taken, not from any decision on the statute of Anne, but from supposed decisions on the subsequent statute of 8 Geo. I., which leaves no room for doubt or argument; and it is extraordinary that in so referring to decisions on this statute, and dilating upon them, the statute itself was passed by, in the cause in hand, and no case, report, entry, pleading, or record of any kind, was referred to, to support this mode of dealing with the statute. The uniform rule on these statutes since their commencement, has never brought into doubt, that the right to file a bill for [87] redemption, within six months from the eviction of the lease by ejectment, belongs exclusively to the class of persons enumerated in the statute of 11 Anne, c. 2, as liable to eviction in the ejectment suit. Before the present suit, it was never known in Ireland that a person who never had possession, and never was ejected—who never was tenant, and could not be ejected, a perfect stranger to the landlord—ever made such claim; and since the enacting of these statutes in Ireland, and of the 4 Geo. II. in England, no case has occurred in either country of relief having been administered to any suitor from proceedings in ejectment for non-payment of rent, but under the express enactments of the statutes themselves, and in execution of their provisions: and it is alleged in the bill in this case, that the tender made to the appellant in 1840, was “to redeem the premises according to the provisions of the acts of Parliament in force in Ireland relating to ejectments for non-payment of rent.”

The respondent had been acting in concert with the trustee, Frayne, to exclude the widow and children of John Frayne from all benefit in the lease, and it was by his having obtained an improper influence over them that they consented to his being their next friend in the suit:—

[The Lord Chancellor.—That question cannot be raised now, between co-plaintiffs.]

There certainly was a misjoinder of parties and a conflict of interests. On the very statement in the bill, Malone had an interest entirely adverse to the other plaintiffs: he sought to establish a demand which would have priority over the annuity payable under the settlement, and without the sanction of the trustees; and moreover, when the notices, proved in the cause to have been served on Malone, offered him redemption on the terms of his declaring in writing a trust for the uses of the marriage settlement, he refused to comply with such requisition. There was plainly an opposition of inte[88]-rests and misjoinder of plaintiffs in this suit; and it was also to be observed, that Malone assumed to be next friend to the married woman, Mrs. Duignan, who had no distinct interest, whose husband was made a defendant, as being entitled during the coverture to the annuity provided for her by the settlement. It appears from the deposition of the witness Campion, that it was by his urgency that Malone was induced to make the advance of money; that he had no acquaintance with the widow and children of John Frayne; that his assuming to be their next friend was a mere pretence. When the insolvency of M. Frayne, the trustee, rendered it hopeless that he should repay Malone, then this suit was resorted to by Campion, who became the solicitor and witness for Malone under the pretence that Malone was a mortgagee by deposit of deeds, although without any one incident to such transaction; and, by these means, to seek repayment at the landlord's expense. This was the whole object of the suit. M. Frayne, the insolvent, was the only person who appeared to defend the ejectment.

But, supposing Malone was a mortgagee, and that the suit instituted by him for redemption was free from the objections before taken, it was still to be observed that there was a defect of parties, because the trustees of the settlement of 1823, to whom the term and its beneficial interest were conveyed for the uses of the marriage—although the interest so vested in them was to be charged with this supposed demand of Malone's—were not before the Court; that M. Frayne (who was one of them), as the person for whose use the money was stated to have been advanced, and who could give some account of the transaction, being alleged to have been the mortgagor, was not made a party, neither as mortgagor in that alleged dealing, nor as the person who had the actual possession of the premises when the writ of habere was executed, and therefore entitled to be restored in case of redemption.

[89] It appeared from the notices served on the respondent that the term had expired in 1843, before the final judgment. The plaintiff below took no steps in the cause until the appellant applied by motion for leave to appeal:—

[The Lord Chancellor,—being informed by Mr. Humphry (of counsel for the respondents), that the documents just referred to were not noticed in the decree,—said they could not, therefore, be referred to. This House had to see whether the decree was right, but not whether the cause was properly managed. Any document or evidence that was before the Court below might be properly brought before the notice of the House, but no others.]

It was in evidence below that redemption was offered to all the parties that were entitled to redeem, but they all declined the offer because they had no interest worth redeeming, the lease having expired.

Under any circumstances the decree was erroneous in throwing the costs of the plaintiffs and of the defendant, Mrs. Gogarty, on the appellant. By the special provisions of the acts of Parliament before referred to, the appellant, as landlord, was entitled to his costs on redemption. The facts of the case did not justify the Lord Chancellor in overlooking the fixed rule of the Court, and depriving the appellant of his right to costs.

Mr. Humphry, for the respondents, was not called on.

The Lord Chancellor.—During the time this case has been in hearing—not entirely three days—we have had the opportunity of considering the judgment of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and the arguments and authorities; and I have not been able, either from the arguments or otherwise, to entertain the least doubt of the propriety of the judgment. The plaintiffs were John Robert Malone and Catherine Duignan, and her children by her former husband, Frayne. She was entitled to sue as interested in an annuity of £60; which gives her an interest in the lands [90] entitling her to relief. The title of Malone, as mortgagee, is clear, so far as it is necessary for maintaining this suit. The original lessee remained, under the settlement, seized of the lease to use his best endeavours to obtain a renewal, to give effect to the settlement; and it being afterwards necessary to renew, a renewal was applied for and granted to him by the appellant. The rent not being paid, the appellant, the landlord, seized and obtained possession. Malone then advanced the necessary money to pay the landlord, and received the title deeds, creating an equitable interest, as a security for repayment of the money advanced. There is an exhibit showing that the transaction was recognized by the widow as well as her trustee, and containing an undertaking to execute a mortgage. Such execution was not necessary, for there was a deposit of title deeds. Malone is therefore in the situation of a party having an equitable interest. The act of 11 Anne expressly provides for this; it provides for legal and equitable interests. The right to redeem given by that act has never been taken away by any subsequent statute. It was, therefore, quite right to associate Malone in a suit, the object of which was to obtain the benefit of the lease from the landlord. If he was not plaintiff, he must have been made defendant, for he was interested in the lease. The title, therefore, of the plaintiffs to sue is clear. The Lord Chancellor did not at first entertain any doubt, but he seemed to be pressed by the counsel at the bar upon the supposed difference between the practice in Ireland and in this country. He, therefore, very properly, delayed giving judgment, and took time to consider it. On rehearing the case he gave the matter great attention, and came to the same conclusion as on the former hearing. The statute of 11 Anne, c. 2, s. 4, clearly gives a right of redemption to an equitable mortgagee, the words of that section giving the right “to any person claiming any right, title, or interest in law or in equity, of, in, or to the said lease.” These plaintiffs [91] have an interest in the lease as against the landlord, and are entitled to redeem on paying the rent and costs up to the date of the tender of them to the appellant.

It is said that it was contrary to the rules of the court to give costs of the suit for redemption against the landlord, and that it was from a sense of that injustice that the petition of rehearing was dismissed without costs. It cannot be contended that whatever course the landlord may pursue, he is not to be made to pay costs. There is no rule of practice to justify this. The tenant was right, and all the expense had been occasioned by the landlord. Under these circumstances I cannot doubt that the Court below was right in giving the costs against the landlord.

There was also an objection taken on the ground of the absence of the trustees of the settlement, but they were not trustees of the legal estate, and the Court had before it all parties who were necessary.

There was likewise an objection taken to the course of the hearing below, but that too was without foundation. The judgment must therefore be affirmed.

Lord Brougham.—This case was very carefully considered by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, not that he entertained any doubt, but being pressed by the argument that the practice in Ireland was different from that of this country, he properly used more circumspection where a legal title was affected. Thus, at the first hearing, and when the case was before him for the second time, when he was able to consider it further, he said he would not part with the case until a subsequent period; but at the same time, when the case was on rehearing, he stated his reasons, and all he subsequently said was to refer to these as his judgment, unless he should afterwards find any reason to differ from them. He, therefore, at the final consideration of the case, only stated shortly that there was no precedent found after a search which he directed, [92] and, consequently, that his former judgment, with the reasons, was to stand. Both with the reasons and the judgment I am well satisfied. Several arguments were urged below which were not urged here, and which could not be maintained at all.

His Lordship referred to the acts requiring registration of deeds in Ireland, and said the requirement of registration applied only to those matters which were capable of registry. The statute of 11 Anne, c. 2, had not been repealed by the subsequent acts on the same subject, it had only been extended. The statute of Anne contemplated equitable interests; it was as strong as words could be. (His Lordship read part of the fourth section.)

As to the matter of costs; an act of Parliament certainly might throw costs on any body, though a stranger, but to establish this it would be necessary to show it was clearly so intended. Such a case would be a little stronger than this contended for at the bar. The legislature might do an act like this, but unless it can be shown clearly that the legislature has so done, common justice, and common charity to the legislature, oblige us to assume that the legislature has not done so.

I am clearly of opinion that the judgment below is quite right on all the points, and so thinking I suggested to the Lord Chancellor that it was superfluous to hear the other side. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. Gerahty.—The term is gone, the lease having expired:—

The Lord Chancellor.—That is immaterial.

Mr. Gerahty.—There is a fund in Court as to the costs.

The Lord Chancellor.—Any application arising out of the judgment must be made to the Court below. We are only trying the propriety of the decree.

The decree was then affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

[93] ANNE WILLOX and Another,—Appellants; ISABELLA FARRELL,—Respondent [May 6, 20, 31, 1847].

Evidence—Interest of witness.

To render a person incompetent in the Scotch courts to be a witness, he must have a direct and immediate interest in the result of the suit in which he is called to give evidence, or he must be able to give the verdict in that suit in evidence in his own favour in another proceeding.

An interest in the result of a suit, which is to render a person incompetent to be a witness, must be an interest of a substantial nature, and it must be the direct and necessary result of the suit.

The law was the same in England and Scotland upon this point previous to the passing of the 6 and 7 Vict., c. 85.

This was an appeal against an interlocutor of the Lords of the First Division of the Court of Session, by which they disallowed a bill of exceptions, presented by the appellants against a decision of Lord Robertson, pronounced by him in the course of a jury trial.

Alexander Wood, of Woodburnden in Kincardineshire, died, in September 1844, intestate. The respondent claimed to be nearest lawful heir to the intestate, as being a grand-daughter of a sister of James Wood, his father, and she caused herself to be served heir accordingly. To this service there was a regular retour, declaring her, in the usual manner, to be the nearest lawful heir to the intestate. The appellants instituted a suit to reduce this service and retour, and claimed to be nearest heirs to the intestate, as being the grand-daughters of George Wood, a brother of the said James Wood. A record was made up to try the question of pedigree thus raised, and the issue framed was, whether the appellants' ancestor, George [94] Wood, was or was not the brother of the said James Wood. If that question should be answered in the affirmative, then the appellants were, as descended from an uncle of the deceased, next heirs, and would be, as to his real estates, preferred to the respondent, who was descended from his aunt. In the course of the trial the appellants tendered as a witness Elizabeth Wood, their own paternal aunt. The respondent objected to the admissibility of this witness, on the ground that she had an interest in the issue of the cause, for if her evidence should establish the appellants' pedigree, she would thereby prove herself entitled to a share in the personal succession to the deceased. The Lord Ordinary refused to receive the evidence of the proposed witness. The objection was not made on the old ground of relationship, the law on that subject having been altered by the 3 and 4 Vict., c. 59, but upon the ground of interest, and was thus set forth in the bill of exceptions. The counsel for the respondent "objected to the admissibility of the said Elizabeth Wood, on the ground of interest, in respect that, if the appellants succeed in proving themselves heirs, the witness is one of the next of kin, and has an interest in the succession. The counsel for the appellants did not deny that in this view she would be one of the next of kin, but they denied that the proposed witness had interest in the issue in this cause, and, therefore, insisted that she ought to be received." This exception having been brought under the consideration of the Judges of the First Division of the Court of Session, the decision of the Lord Ordinary was confirmed by a majority of the Judges, consisting of the Lord Justice General, and Lords Mackenzie and Fullerton. Lord Jeffrey dissented. The case was then brought up, by appeal, to this house.

Mr. Wortley for the appellants:

The proposed witness was improperly rejected. This [95] was not a proceeding which concerned her interest, nor could she be directly benefited by the result. It was a proceeding to impeach the validity of a service of heir, and the truth of the retour to that service; Mrs. Elizabeth Wood could not claim as heir, and was neither benefited nor injured by the return to the service, which set up the title of heir in the respondent. She had, therefore, no interest in the suit, and was consequently admissible as a witness.

The judgment in the suit could not be given in evidence in her favour, or against her, for the suit related to the real estate of the deceased, to which it was not pretended that she had or could have any title.

The interest alleged on the other side, as affecting her admissibility, is too remote to be the ground of a legal decision. It merely amounts to this, that in a possible suit, to be instituted by her for the recovery of a share of the personal estate of the deceased, the fact that the issue in which she was called as a witness had been decided unfavourably for the respondent, and favourably for the appellants, to whom she was related as aunt, might operate to her advantage. This interest is not direct and immediate, which it ought to be, in order to disqualify this person as a witness (Tait's Evidence, p. 349, edit. 1834; Stair, bk. iv. tit. 43, s. 7; Bell's Principles, ss. 2245, 2248). The same rule existed before the late statute, both in England and in Scotland; Ralston v. Rowatt (1 Clark and Fin. 424). That rule is, that the objection must be founded on an interest, not merely in the question under discussion, but in the event of the suit itself; Bent v. Baker (3 Term Rep. 27). The rule there laid down, has been acted on from that day to the present, Starkie (1 Stark. on Evidence, 19. Edit. 1842) and Phillips (Vol. i. p. 19). Here the witness could not be benefited by the [96] result of the cause; could not give the verdict and judgment in evidence in her favour upon another occasion; and had nothing more than a contingent interest in the question, and that, too, of a doubtful kind. Her testimony in this suit was therefore admissible, and the judgment of the Court below must be reversed.

Sir F. Kelley and Mr. Robertson (Mr. James Anderson was with them) for the respondent.

The object of the rules of evidence has, up to a very recent period, been directed to secure true testimony, by excluding witnesses who have a direct and personal bias operating on their minds. Generally speaking, it may be true that the rules of evidence are alike in England and in Scotland, but that proposition is not universally true, and was not so at the time when it was supposed to be so laid down in this House, for at that very moment the law of Scotland excluded from the witness box persons in a certain degree of propinquity to either of the parties in the suit, an exclusion wholly unknown to the law of England. Besides which, there is this distinction between the two cases—that in Ralston v. Rowatt [1 Cl. and F. 424], the proposed witness was called in a suit which, whatever might be its decision, was opposed to his interests, and must be got rid of before his claim could be enforced. Admitting, therefore, most fully the authority of that case, it may be contended that it does not govern the present.

The proposed witness had a direct interest in this case. If she could get rid of the heirship of the respondent, by which the respondent was to get the real estate of the deceased, she would, by the very same evidence, remove a bar to her own claim of relationship as one of his next of kin, and thereby sustain her own claim to a share of the personalty. So long as the retour, finding the respondent to be the heir to the deceased, was allowed to stand, there was an insuperable bar to the witness obtaining any part [97] of the personalty, and she had, therefore, a very strong interest to induce her to give evidence that would have the effect of annulling the service and the retour. She may, therefore, be said to have had an interest in the event of the very suit in which she was called as a witness. It was her interest to get rid of the service and retour; when they were out of the way, and not till then, she might hope to put in her claim. This is a sufficient interest to exclude her testimony—

[Lord Brougham.—That is but a contingent interest; must it not be a direct interest in the event of the suit itself? A man who had executed a deed might have an interest in getting rid of a witness who had attested it, but would that prevent such a man from giving evidence on an indictment for felony preferred against that attesting witness?]

The case supposed is hardly a test for the present. Here the interest of the witness is not to get rid of one of the means by which a possible liability may be enforced against her, but to get rid of an obstacle to her own claims, and at the same time to give a great degree of force, if not absolute conclusiveness, to those claims themselves.

The verdict on this issue might afterwards be given in evidence in favour of the person on whose evidence it was obtained. Suppose she had instituted a suit for her share of the personal assets of the deceased, the service and retour might be set up as obstacles to the success of her claim; these she would dispose of by showing the judgment which had declared them erroneous, and set them aside. She would then only have to prove her relationship to the person deceased, a proof which she had already given when called as a witness for the appellants, and in this way she would, by her own evidence, make out her own title to a share of the personalty.

Considerations such as these influenced the Court of Session in a case decided not long since, and which, it is submitted, is a direct authority in favour of the present [98] decision. That is the case of Watson v. Watson (15 Dunl. and B's, Cases in the Court of Session, 753; 12 Fac. Coll. 719; 9 Scottish Jurist, 357). There a person tendered as a witness on an issue of propinquity, was objected to on the ground that she would thereby prove herself next of kin to the deceased, and so show herself entitled to her share of the personal estate. The same answer was made there as here, namely, that the verdict in that issue could not be used by the proposed witness in her own favour in any future proceeding, but that she must make out her title by other means. The Lord Ordinary held the person tendered to be incompetent as a witness, and the Court of Session, on bill of exceptions to this direction, confirmed it. The law in Scotland is, therefore, clear on this point. And when it is considered that in Scotland it is a presumption of law, that where a verdict is in accordance with the evidence of a witness, such verdict must be considered to have passed on that evidence, there can be no doubt that the decision in Watson v. Watson was correct. It is submitted that the Scotch law alone must be consulted on this case, and that the English decisions are not of authority upon it, and consequently that, in accordance with the decision just quoted, the judgment of the Court below must be affirmed.

Mr. Wortley, in reply, contended that the rule of law had been authoritatively laid down by this House in Ralston v. Rowatt [1 Cl. and F. 424], and that the case of Watson v. Watson being inconsistent with that decision, it was erroneous, and could not form any justification for the judgment now the subject of appeal.

The Lord Chancellor (May 31), after stating the circumstances of the case, said,—The question now is, whether the witness stood in such a situation as to make her incompetent to be examined upon the issue which had been directed.

[99] If the Scotch law upon this subject was the same as the law of England, the point would not require much argument, because it is quite clear that the result of the trial of the issue could not directly affect the interests of the witness, the issue to be tried being, whether the pursuers were the nearest heirs of the deceased. The only way in which the witness can be connected with the property is, that in the event of a certain pedigree being established, she will be entitled to a share of the personal property.

We had several cases referred to, and there is one to which I am particularly anxious to call your Lordships' attention, because it seems to me that, even if it is not directly applicable in point of fact, it clearly establishes the principle upon which this case ought to be disposed of. I mean the case of Ralston v. Rowatt (1 Clark and Finnelly, 424), which came to this House from the Court of Session. There the suit was instituted for the purpose of reducing a deed of settlement on the ground of deathbed by persons claiming to be heirs. A witness was called, who stated that the pursuer was not heir, but that he, the witness, was heir, upon which the objection was taken, that he could not be examined, and that objection prevailed in the Court of Session, but the judgment of that Court was reversed when the case came to this House.

When the case came here, the opinion of this House assumed that, upon a subject of this sort, there was no distinction between the law of Scotland and the law of England. It would, indeed, be very strange if there could be any such distinction, for the rules of evidence are not mere matters of local practice, but are rules adopted for the purpose of better ascertaining the truth upon subjects under investigation in courts of law, and I see that in the opinions of the learned Judges in the Court of Session, both in that case and the present, they, in arguing upon [100] the law, refer to English authorities, and that all of them, whichever view they take, recognise the principle that the same rule of evidence is operative, and ought to prevail in the two countries, I mean so far as regards the question under discussion, how far a witness is incompetent on the ground of interest. If that is so, it would lead to the clear conclusion that there certainly can be no objection to the admissibility of this witness upon the ground of interest, for no such objection would exist against her in this country. I am not now speaking of the late act of Parliament, but of the law as it stood anterior to that act, the act itself not being applicable to Scotland.

In order to see how far this question of interest applies to this witness, we must consider what the course of proceeding was in which the witness was called. The suit being a suit to reduce the service of the party claiming as heir, as a preliminary step; not for the purpose of deciding the question, but for the purpose of ascertaining whether the appellants were in a situation to raise the question at all, an issue was directed to inquire whether the appellants are, or are not heirs, that is to say, whether they were in a situation to entitle them to challenge the service obtained by the respondent. I have before said, that the result of that trial could not by possibility be used for or against this witness, she having nothing to do with the heirship, though she might ultimately appear entitled to claim a share in the personalty of the intestate, on account of the pedigree on which the appellants sue in this action being the same as that which would entitle the witness to set up that claim. It is not attempted in argument to show that the result of the trial of that issue, in which the witness was proposed to be examined, could be used directly for or against her, but the argument stands thus: although the result of that trial could not be used directly for or against the witness, it would lead probably, and perhaps certainly, to this result in the suit itself, it would [101] reduce the service of the respondent, and though that would not at once operate for or against the witness, it might come circuitously into operation for the witness in this way; if, after the service had been reduced, the witness should institute a suit under a different jurisdiction for the purpose of establishing her kin to the deceased, so as to entitle her to a portion of the personalty, that would raise a question as to the pedigree under which she claimed being the same as that under which the appellants in this issue claimed. Then, it is said, if she sought to establish her title, it is clear that though this would not be direct evidence for her in proof of her own case, yet, should the service and retour, obtained by the respondent be produced as evidence to rebut the pedigree under which she claimed, she might, in order to get rid of the effect of that retour, produce the judgment obtained in the suit in which the issue had been directed. So that the result is that the effect of the verdict which might be obtained, if it should be obtained by means of the evidence tendered, or, at least, which the evidence tendered would contribute to obtain, would be ultimately and circuitously to make the testimony of this person a piece of evidence available for her own benefit, which, when the original service stood, it could not by possibility be. It is quite clear that that is not a species of interest which would prevent this person from being a competent witness. But then we are referred to the case of Watson v. Watson (15 Dunl. and B.'s, Cas. in the Court of Session, 753; 12 Fac. Coll. 719; 9 Scottish Jurist, 357), which, it is said, raises very much the same question. I do not enter into that case; it is a very recent decision of the Court of Session, and if the Court of Session has in this instance come to an erroneous conclusion in one case, there is not much wonder that it should have come to a similar conclusion in a case which occurred but a very few years [102] antecedently. In fact the conclusion to which the Judges in the Court of Session came in Watson v. Watson has probably led to the very error into which they have fallen in the judgment upon which we have now to pronounce our opinion. The case of Watson v. Watson is not a case of sufficient standing to show that the law of Scotland upon this subject is different from the law of England. But with respect to the other case, that of Ralston v. Rowatt (1 Clark and Finnelly, 424), I think that we are bound by the principles laid down there, from which I have no disposition to depart, and which places the law of Scotland on the same footing as the law of England in a matter of this sort as to incompetency of witnesses upon the ground of interest. If there was any balance between the two cases, the decision in the case of Ralston v. Rowatt, being a decision of this House, reversing a decision of the Court of Session, which involved the same objection as the present, would settle the question; and, therefore, I cannot think that the case of Watson v. Watson, which was relied upon by the Court of Session, ought to induce your Lordships to depart from the principle laid down in Ralston v. Rowatt, which establishes the principle necessary to decide this case, and declares that the law which prevails in this country upon the subject is also applicable to Scotland.

I therefore move your Lordships, that the judgment of the Court of Session be reversed, and that a new trial be directed.

Lord Brougham.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the Judges in the Court below have been misled, partly by the case of Watson v. Watson, and partly by their Lordships not having formed a perfectly clear and accurate notion of the objection of interest in the question, as distinguished from interest in the [103] result, which ought to exclude, and in England would have excluded, a witness prior to Lord Denman's late Act (6 and 7 Vict., c. 85), and which in Scotland is still an objection to the competency of a witness.

When I say that the Judges did not seem to me to have formed a perfectly clear notion of the objection raised, I go upon this, that the three learned Lords who chiefly refer to the case of Watson v. Watson, and even Lord Jeffrey (though he differed from the judgment of the rest), all consider, that, but for that case, it would have been a question of difficulty. I see no difficulty in it whatever. When I use that expression, my meaning is this:—The interest must be not only in the result, in the event of the trial of what their Lordships call the issue of the cause (and not simply an interest in the question), but it must be a direct and immediate interest; and it will not do to say that it removes out of the way, in another case which may probably arise, or may not, a difficulty at that time in the way of the party. That is not an interest which disqualifies a witness. It must be such a direct and immediate interest, that he may be said to be swearing for himself, or swearing against an adversary to himself, in any evidence which he gives.

The case which I put to the learned counsel in the course of the argument, I do not think was got rid of by observation at all. The argument here is, that the propinquity of the party giving the evidence might come in question in another suit, possibly in another Court, touching the personality, and, therefore, if the witness objected to, and upon whose evidence the question arose, gave evidence one way, namely, against the service, the result would be, that the service could no longer be given in evidence against her claim in the other suit; consequently, it was said that she had an interest in giving evidence against the service, inasmuch as she was removing, by her testimony, a possible obstacle out of her way in a possible [104] suit which she might maintain elsewhere, or in another Court, and alio intuitu, this being a suit respecting heirship, that being one respecting personal estate.

Nothing can be more clear than that a party may have an interest in getting rid of a witness, as well as in getting rid of documentary evidence, or a legal proceeding, such as a service and retour. If I am the obligor in a bond, and A. B. is the attesting witness to that bond, and there is no other witness, and it is a bond under twenty years old, and consequently must be proved by the testimony of a living witness, nothing can be more clear than that I should have an interest in disqualifying A. B. as a witness. Now, before the late act of Lord Denman, which is an excellent remedial act, and which removes the objection to the competency of a witness arising from a conviction for felony, nothing can be more clear than that, prior to that act, if A. B. had been convicted of felony, he could not be examined as a witness to prove any thing, even the execution of the bond. Suppose I had been called as a witness upon the indictment of A. B. for felony; can any body suppose that I could not have been examined as a witness, because the bond was produced in order to prove that he was an attesting witness, and that, therefore, I had a direct interest in removing him out of the way? "No," the Court would have answered; "this is an indictment for felony, and that question is a totally different one; it is a question respecting the possible interest which you may have in removing out of your way an instrument which is capable of being given in evidence against you. No such remote, possible, or contingent interest can be allowed to satisfy the demand of the law, which requires a direct, immediate, and certain interest in the party sought to be disqualified thereby."

The case of Watson v. Watson occurred in the year 1837, and their Lordships in the Court below seem to have been very much moved by that case. In the Court [105] below they seem to have considered themselves bound by it, but coming before us, we are not bound by it. Besides which, there is the other case of Ralston v. Rowatt [1 Cl. and F. 424], which is much stronger in favour of receiving the evidence, and against the conclusion at which their Lordships have arrived, than that of Watson v. Watson [15 Dunlop, 753] was for rejecting the evidence, and in support of their conclusion. The two cases cannot stand together. Ralston v. Rowatt is material, as showing not only what the English law would be upon this subject, but it is most material to show that there was no difference between the two systems of jurisprudence in this respect, because the English law principles were recognized in that case fully and conclusively.

But there is also another ground, besides the argument stated by my noble and learned friend—it is not a matter of positive law, but it arises from the old and long established rules as to the reception or rejection of evidence which governed in this country—there is another reason for saying that the Scotch law is very much the same as the English law in this respect. When we look to old authorities in both systems of law—to Stair and to Bracton—we find that they adopt, almost in terms, the rule which in modern times is so clearly stated in that very well known case of Bent v. Baker (3 Term. Rep. 27), and which distinguishes interest in the event from interest in the question. That case had ever since been held to be the governing rule upon the subject, until objections, on the grounds of interest in the event and interest in the question, were all abolished by the salutary and remedial act of Lord Denman. One can hardly conceive a more direct interest, as far as bias upon a man's mind goes, than that was which existed in the case of Bent v. Baker. It was thus: the witness was called to prove circumstances tending to show that the underwriters to a policy, which he had pro-[106]-cured to be signed, were not liable to pay the loss upon it. He had himself, after getting the policy underwritten by others, subscribed his own name to it for a sum of £200, and on that subscription an action had been brought against him. He expressly stated that he expected to contribute to the expense of resisting the claim, and that he had, together with the other underwriters on the same policy, filed a bill of discovery against the assured. Yet he was held to be a good witness. Every one knows that where there is no consolidation rule, when there is a question between one underwriter and the assured, or between one party upon a policy and the assured, the evidence of another underwriter, or another party to the policy is admissible, upon the principle that, in such a case, there is only a bias arising from an interest in the question, and not in the event. If there had been a consolidation rule, it would have been different, for the proposed witness would have been, under that rule, a party in the cause, and the objection would then have assumed a very different and much stronger shape.

The Scotch law lays down the rule in words which are rather remarkable; it uses the expression, that it is not enough that the parties “fovent consimilem causam” (that is the expression of the old lawyers), but they must have an interest in the event itself, and so far, therefore, the principle of the Scotch law is precisely the same with the doctrine in the case of Bent v. Baker [3 T. R. 27]. I am, therefore, of opinion that, viewing this case both upon principle and upon precedent, there is no difficulty in it. I differ from their Lordships in the Court below, who think that there would have been a difficulty but for the case of Watson v. Watson [15 Dunlop, 753], which, in my mind, occasions none at all. If any case was cited such as Watson's is supposed to have been, on the one side, there is the case of Ralston v. Rowatt, which is a very strong and decisive case, on the other. By that we must be guided.

[107] Lord Campbell.—I am of the same opinion. I think that this person was a competent witness for the appellants upon the trial of this issue. With respect to the question of incompetency on the ground of interest, I apprehend that the law of England and the law of Scotland are exactly the same as the law of England was before Lord Denman's Act. It appears from the authorities in the institutional writers, to which my noble and learned friend has referred, that they very distinctly anticipate the rule laid down in Bent v. Baker, they show that interest in the question is not enough to disqualify, but that there must be an interest in the event of the suit.

When a witness is objected to on the score of interest, it must be on one of two grounds, either that the verdict, in accordance with the evidence which he gives, may afterwards be produced in evidence for the witness, or that the witness will, from the result of the suit, directly obtain a benefit, if the verdict shall be according to his evidence. Both of those grounds of objection have been made in this case, but it seems to me that neither of them is supported.

With regard to the objection that the verdict which may be pronounced for the appellants might be given in evidence in favour of the witness, I take it to be quite clear that that is untenable. Independently of any legal objection to the reception of such evidence, nay, even assuming that the verdict on the issue given on the testimony of this witness might be evidence in another case, the single circumstance of it being shown to have been obtained upon her evidence, would be enough to prevent any weight being given to it; that, however, is not the ground upon which I rely. For it is quite clear to me that that verdict could not be given in evidence by Elizabeth Wood. In the first place, the verdict, per se, clearly could not be given in evidence, because the verdict would be merely upon the issue, "whether [108] the pursuers were cousins, and nearest lawful heirs portioners of Alexander Wood, the deceased," which, it is quite clear, could not be evidence to prove the title of the witness.

Then what could be given in evidence? The judgment? No. Supposing that the service is set aside upon the verdict pronounced upon the issue, what would be the consequence? The consequence would be that the service of the retour would be annulled, would be cassé, would be annihilated, and would be as if it had never had an existence. There would be no occasion to resort to the circuitous process of allowing the retour to be given in evidence, and then to give the judgment in evidence, whereby it had been cassé and destroyed. I take it that no professional man would venture to give the service in evidence with a knowledge of the fact, that it had been set aside by the solemn judgment of a Court. In no point of view then can the objection be maintained that the verdict, or the judgment upon the verdict, might be given in evidence in favour of the witness, if she should afterwards bring an action or institute some proceeding for the purpose of recovering a share of the personality of Alexander Wood.

The question then is reduced to this—whether Elizabeth Wood has any direct interest in the result of this suit; and it is stated in this way, that the result of this suit will be, that the service and the retour, which are a bar in her way, if she should set up her claim to a share in the personality, would be destroyed by the evidence which she gives. But let me suppose the necessary consequence of this verdict upon that issue to be that the service shall be set aside (I am not clear that that follows, but I suppose it to follow), what will be the consequence? It is merely that she, by her evidence, will get rid of a piece of evi-[109]-dence which would stand in her way if she should seek to recover a share of the personality. That is the strongest manner in which it can be put, that she is to get rid of a piece of evidence against her which would not be at all an insuperable objection to her claim, but which would simply stand in her way, and might be given in evidence if she should institute a process for the purpose of recovering a share of the personality. It would be very strange if that could disqualify the witness; because, supposing that the service is evidence upon a proceeding brought by her in respect of the personality (which the Judges below have not said), but supposing it was evidence, it would not weigh a feather, because these services, though they are receivable, are utterly immaterial; but, supposing that it could be treated as substantial evidence, it is only a piece of evidence, and is not conclusive proof. Although the service should be set up, she may yet be able to make out her claim to the personality, and, on the other hand, though the service should be set aside, she still may not succeed; therefore, the service, standing or being set aside, does not necessarily lead either one way or the other to her recovering or not a share of the personality. She merely gets rid of a piece of evidence which perhaps might otherwise, in addition to other more important evidence, turn the scale against her. That is the whole.

There is no case in England in which a Court has held that such an interest will disqualify a witness. The interest in the result of the suit must be an interest in the nature of something substantial—something in the shape of lands, or goods, or money—which shall come to the witness, or shall be lost by the witness, as the direct and necessary result of the suit upon the trial of which the person is called as a witness.

I think that the objection is untenable on either ground, [110] and that the judgment of the Court below ought therefore to be reversed. With regard to the case of Watson v. Watson [15 Dunlop, 753], I do not think it at all necessary to consider whether it differs or not from the present case, because even if it was on all fours with it, there are other cases laying down the opposite rule, which are equally in point, one of which, that of Ralston v. Rowatt [1 Cl. and F. 424], was decided by this House.

I am therefore of opinion that the decision of the Court below must be reversed. The interlocutor was then reversed, and a new trial directed.

[111] THE TAFF VALE RAILWAY COMPANY,—Appellants; WILLIAM NIXON and Others,—Respondents [May 3, 6, 1847].

[Mews' Dig. i. 48; xv. 1806, affirming 7 Hare 136. Considered in South-Eastern Ry. Co. v. Martin, 1848, 5 Rail. Cas. 478, 484; Dabbs v. Nugent, 1865, 13 L.T. 397.]

Railway Contracts and Works—Complicated Accounts—Bill or Action.

N. and S. contracted with a railway company, jointly and severally, to execute railway works, according to specifications and prices contained in a former contract between N. and the company. S. was to advance the money necessary for the execution of the works, and to receive from the company all monies accruing due from them in respect of the works, and apply them in discharge of N.'s liabilities under his contracts. S. became a bankrupt at the completion of the works, and the company, after paying him and his assignees part of the monies due from them, refused to account with N. for the balance, whereupon he filed a bill for an account against them and S.'s assignees:—

Held, that although the case against the company consisted of matters cognizable at law, yet as there were complicated accounts between them and the other parties respectively, a court of equity was more competent to take them, and to dispose of the whole case, than a court of law, and the bill was sustained accordingly.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Vice Chancellor of England, directing certain accounts to be taken, as hereinafter mentioned; and the question in substance was, whether an action at law was not a more appropriate course of proceeding than a bill in equity.

The appellants were a railway company, incorporated by act of Parliament. The respondent Nixon was a railway contractor, and by an indenture dated the 6th of April, 1838, and made between him and the appellants, being a railway contract in the ordinary form, he contracted to do certain works mentioned in the specification annexed thereto, for the sum of £7395 15s., subject to deduction or increase as in the contract [112] stated, and with a provision for payment for extra works, at prices particularly specified. Nixon having to some extent proceeded with the execution of the works, was under the necessity of procuring advances of money, and for that purpose applied to David Storm, who was also a railway contractor, to advance him sufficient money to complete the works, which Storm agreed to do, and accordingly an agreement was entered into,* and a power of attorney, dated 8th December, 1838, was given by Nixon, which, after reciting the said contract and application to Storm for the advance of money, constituted him the lawful attorney of Nixon, to direct and carry on, in his name, the works comprised in the contract, and to demand, sue for, and receive from the company all sums of money which from time to time might become due from them to Nixon under the contract, and to give them discharges, and to compromise or refer to arbitration all disputes that might arise respecting the performance of the works, and also to pay for Nixon, out of the monies to be received from the company, all debts and just demands which might accrue to Storm or others, against Nixon during the progress, and until the completion, of the said works, and generally to do and perform all acts which Storm should judge necessary in and about the premises, and to retain to himself, out of the monies to be received from the company, £5 per cent. for interest on all his advances and £300 at the completion of the contract, for his care and attention in directing and carrying on the works.

Notice of the agreement and power of attorney was sent to the appellants, together with a letter from Nixon, re-[113]-questing them to pay to Storm all monies becoming due to Nixon on account of the contract.

In March 1839, an arrangement was come to by Nixon and Storm and the appel-

* The agreement was a separate memorandum, explanatory and restrictive of the power of attorney, viz., that the same should not be acted on as regarded the managing and conducting of the works by Storm without Nixon's consent.

lants, by which a new contract between the appellants and them, as joint contractors, was substituted for the first contract with Nixon, and he and Storm, by the new contract, jointly and severally covenanted for the performance of the contract; and the appellants covenanted to pay them as well for the works then done and not paid for, as also for the works to be done by them jointly.

The works were proceeded with under this contract, Nixon having the management of the working part, but the appellants transacting all money matters connected with the contract with Storm.

In December 1840 a fiat in bankruptcy was issued against Storm, under which he was declared a bankrupt, and one Nicholas and two others were appointed creditors' assignees. There was also an official assignee.

In May 1842 Nixon filed his bill against the appellants and the said assignees, and thereby, after stating the instruments before stated, he made the following case, viz.:—That notwithstanding the last mentioned contract, the works were carried on by Nixon in the same manner as before; and he continued to carry on and execute the same from that time until both the specified works and the extra works were completed; that in January 1841 all the works were completed pursuant to the contract, and the extra works so performed amounted to the sum of £9133 2s. 1d., according to the schedule of prices annexed to the contract, and the specified works amounted to the sum of £7395 15s., making together the sum of £16,528 17s. 1d.; that during the progress of the works, and at the completion thereof, and before the 16th of December, 1840, Nixon and Storm had received various [114] sums of money on account of the contract and extra works, amounting in the whole to £9204 12s. 6d., and no more, so that there remained a balance of £7324 4s. 7d. due from the company to Nixon; that in the month of December 1840 Nixon had reason to believe that Storm was in embarrassed circumstances, and he requested his solicitor to give notice to the company not to pay Storm any more money in respect of the contract, and the solicitor wrote and sent a letter to the then secretary of the company, stating that Nixon had consulted him upon the situation of his affairs with Storm and the company, and his inability to obtain from the company an account of the monies paid by them upon the contract since the 11th of April last; that the consideration for the power of attorney from Nixon to Storm was Storm's engagement to advance Nixon all sums of money he might require, and inasmuch as Storm had not fulfilled his part of the engagement, Nixon requested that the company would not pay him any further sums on account of the contract, and also that they would furnish forthwith an account of the monies paid by them in respect of the contract since the 11th of April, 1840.

The bill next set forth a letter sent to Nixon by the solicitors of Storm's assignees, dated in May 1841, applying for authority to use his name as plaintiff in an action to be brought against the company, to recover balances due to Storm's estate in respect of works, money, and materials provided by him in execution of the contract and extra work thereon, up to the time of his bankruptcy; that Nixon declined to comply with that request; that after the works were completed, he sent to the company the particulars of his demand on them, and requested payment of the balance of £7324 4s. 7d., and the company then, and ever since admitted, that the whole of the work amounted to the sum of £16,528 17s. 1d.; and that Nixon alone, or he and Storm, were entitled to receive that sum, but they alleged that a much larger sum than £9204 12s. 6d. [115] had been paid by them to Nixon, and to Storm and his assignees, and a very small sum only remained due, or that the said balance, or the greater part thereof, had been in some manner settled or accounted for with Storm or his assignees, whereas he, Nixon, charged the contrary; and that if any further or other sum than £9204 12s. 6d., before mentioned, was paid by the company to Storm, the same was paid since the company received the notice of December 1840, or in respect of some other work done for the company, with which Nixon had nothing to do, and which was not connected with the said contract.

The bill further stated, that, in April 1842, Nixon's solicitor sent a letter to the company's secretary, demanding payment of the said balance, £7324 4s. 7d., and intimating, that unless some immediate arrangement was made for its payment, they would institute proceedings for its recovery; that the secretary to the company sent an answer by letter, which, after stating the effects of the first and substituted contracts, the power of attorney to Storm, and his bankruptcy, etc., concluded by saying the settlement of the accounts was to be submitted to the arbitration of Mr. Robert Stephenson, and if Nixon had any claim on the company in common with Storm, the whole affair would be settled by the arbitrator; that after receipt of this letter, Nixon's solicitors inquired and discovered that the company and the assignees of Storm had agreed to refer all the matters of the said contracts, and many questions of account between the company and Nixon and the assignees, and other questions between the assignees and the company, to Mr. Stephenson, who was in fact proceeding to arbitrate thereupon, without the authority or consent of Nixon, and that it was the intention of the company to pay to the assignees whatever balance the arbitrator should find due; that all the money that was due from Nixon to Storm, in respect of his advances, had been paid to him or his assignees.

[116] The bill prayed that accounts might be taken of all sums paid by the appellants to Nixon and to Storm and his assignees, in discharge of the said sums of £7395 15s., and £9133 2s. 1d.; and of all monies advanced and properly laid out by Storm, on account of the works; and that the sums so received by him and his assignees might be set off against the sums so laid out by him, and the balance ascertained, etc.; and that the company might be restrained from paying any sums to the said assignees; and that they, the assignees, might be restrained from instituting any action or other proceeding against Nixon, in respect of the matters aforesaid.

The appellants, by their answer, submitted that the suit was improperly framed, that they had no connection or privity with the dealings and accounts between Nixon and Storm, and ought not to be parties to any suit in respect thereof; that Nixon was not entitled to any account or relief against the appellants in respect of the said contract and extra works, and the mixing up of such account with the pecuniary transactions between Nixon and Storm was multifarious, and they claimed the same benefit of such objection as if they had demurred to the bill; and they further said, that they and the assignees had agreed to refer all the matters of the contract to Mr. Stephenson, and he had made his award thereon.

The other defendants to the bill having also put in their answers, the cause came to be heard before the Vice Chancellor of England, who, in giving his judgment, observed that "he did not see in the case anything to distinguish it from the ordinary case of a person making a mortgage of his debt; and, that being so, it followed as a matter of right that Nixon ought to be a party to the settlement of that sort of double account, which would, first of all, have to ascertain what was due from him to his mortgagee, and then what was due from his debtors to him, in order that it might be seen what was the true state of the accounts [117] between the parties." His Honour, accordingly pronounced a decree, referring it to the Master to take the following accounts, viz.:—

An account of all extra works performed by Nixon for the Taff Vale Railway Company, under the said contract. An account of all sums of money paid by them to Nixon and to Storm, or either of them, on account of such extra works. Whether anything, and what, then remained due from the appellants in respect of the said extra works, having regard to the said payments. An account of all sums of money paid and advanced by Storm, to or on account of Nixon, to carry on the said works, as well extra as specified. An account of the corn, hay, and all other materials supplied by Storm, to or on account of Nixon, in carrying on such works. An account of all sums of money paid by the company to Storm on account of the contract: And whether any, and what, sum of money then remained due from Nixon to the defendants, the assignees, in respect of such advances and supplies of hay, corn, and other materials made by Storm on account of Nixon, and in respect of interest on such advances and monies chargeable for such supplies.

The appeal was against that decree.

Sir F. Kelly and Mr. Stuart (with whom was Mr. W. M. James) for the appellants:—

All the matters in dispute in this cause might have been easily disposed of at law if Nixon had allowed his name to be used in the action proposed by the assignees of Storm to be brought against the appellant:—

[The Lord Chancellor.—It may be a question whether matters so complicated as these accounts appear to be, were not fitter for a suit in equity than for an action.]

to pay a legal debt under a contract for railway works in the ordinary form; and no case of account or other ground for equitable relief is stated by [118] the bill. If the contract was not under seal, the simplest form of action, an action for work and labour done, would settle the dispute as against the appellants. Then why should they be dragged into a suit in equity? As between them and Nixon, and Storm, these latter were joint contractors, having a joint interest in the contract, and it is wholly without precedent, and against the established principles of courts of equity, that, where there is a contract between an individual (or company) and a partnership, the mere occurrence of disputes between the partners, requiring the interposition of a court of equity as to partnership concerns, the individual who has entered into a contract with them, or any other debtors of the partnership, should be liable to be made defendants to a suit in equity for settling the partnership disputes. But even if there were some accounts to be settled with the appellants, it is not quite clear that a Master in Chancery would settle them better than a judge and jury. The only question raised against the company on the bill, was whether £9204 claimed by Nixon was due from them. That was a question for a court of law or for an arbitrator; and on the refusal of Nixon to lend his name for an action, an arbitrator, a most competent one for this purpose, was appointed, with the consent of all the parties except Nixon. A view of the works, necessary for the proper settlement of the accounts, was taken by the arbitrator, which a Master in Chancery would not do. The Master's Office is not a proper place for taking accounts of works under a contract, and of payments thereunder; and if any relief at all ought to have been given against the appellants, it should have been by giving such directions as would have enabled the question and amount of their legal liability to be tried in an action at law.

The complaint and case made by Nixon was twofold; first as between him and the company, secondly as between him and Storm and his assignees. This second case might be a fit subject for a suit in equity, but there [119] was no reason for dragging the company into that suit. Even if the Vice Chancellor was right in considering the case as to the appellants as the case of a mortgage of a debt due from them, it is without precedent, and would be of most dangerous results, to hold that a creditor, by his own act in mortgaging his debts, might transfer the jurisdiction as to all his debts to a suit in equity, and to an account in the Master's Office. The appellants ought not, in any view of the case, to have been made parties to a suit for taking the accounts between Nixon and the assignees of Storm. Such a suit is irregular and multifarious.

The state of the case was this:—Nixon and Storm contracted to do certain works for the company at specified prices, amounting to £16,000 odd; they admitted that the company paid £9000 odd, and the bill was filed for the alleged balance. Was not that a proper case for an action to recover the balance? If a suit in Chancery be held to be a more appropriate course of proceeding in this case, then every builder's bill of charges may be fit for a suit in equity:—

[The Lord Chancellor.—And properly so, if there be complicated accounts. It is here admitted that there are accounts between Nixon and Storm proper for a suit in equity, and that the money to answer these accounts, when taken, are in the hands of the railway company. Are they not in the position of stakeholders?]

The bill does not state a case of that nature—it does pray an injunction against the company's paying Storm; but they are not about to pay him, or his assignees, and no injunction was necessary, nor was it applied for. The reference to Mr. Stephenson was not impugned by the bill, which only seeks to restrain payment of what should be found due by his award: and the decree, while directing accounts generally as against the appellants of all the works and payments, omits to make any declaration as to the reference and the award made under it.

[120] It is of great importance to preserve the distinction between cases which are proper for a suit in equity, and those which may be disposed of by an action at law. That distinction was properly taken by Lord Chancellor King, in the case of Dhegetoff v. The London Assurance Company (Moseley, 83), which was affirmed in this House (Nom. Marino de Ghettoff, 4 Bro. P. C. 436), and in Fall v. Chambers (Moseley, 193). In both cases his lordship allowed demurrers to the bills, saying in the latter case, "If I should give way in this attempt, no action would ever be brought upon a policy, and a bill might as well be brought for payment of a bond, on suggestion that the witnesses were abroad, etc. The jury will take the account, and consider of salvage, and all proper allowances, and do it in all such trials." It is not the practice of a court of equity to draw matters under its jurisdiction; and the question for the House to determine is, whether this case, though somewhat complicated as between Nixon and Storm, is not, as to the appellants, a case of simple facts, in which they were to make payments for certain works done for them according to contract. The demand against them is not to be split and apportioned between the joint contractors. It is desirable that some intelligible rule should be laid down by the highest tribunal for withdrawing cases like this from courts of equity. It is impossible for the respondents to put their case higher than that it is one of concurrent jurisdiction; but the appellants do not grant that. In a case in the Exchequer, King v. Rossett (2 You. and Jerv. 33), it was held that the further ingredient of the relation of principal and agent was not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff there to relief in equity if the account could be fairly taken at law, and a demurrer was allowed on that ground.

[The Lord Chancellor.—You did not demur.]

No; but the objection was raised in our answer, and we craved the benefit of it as if we had demurred. Our an-[121]-swer, having brought the award before the court, took the objection properly. How is that award to stand with Nixon's case? He should have first got rid of the award, which, if his bill be sustained, must be treated as a nullity.

[Mr. Bethell, of counsel for the respondents, said the award was not made when the bill was filed.]

It was made before answer put in, and no application was made to the court to stay the award by injunction or otherwise.

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Stinton, Mr. Peacock, and Mr. Whitbread, appeared for the various respondents, but were not called on.

The Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, having fully considered the arguments urged on behalf of the appellants in this case, it appears to me to be unnecessary to hear the counsel on the other side, and that, according to all the authorities, the decree is fully justified by the facts as they appeared before the Vice Chancellor.

There were some cases cited in order to show that there are instances in which a court of equity refuses to exercise any jurisdiction upon any matter of law. I have no doubt that is so; but the question is whether this is one of those cases.

Now I think the rule is very well laid down by Lord Redesdale in the case of O'Connor v. Spaight in which he says (1 Sch. and Lef. 309), "The ground on which I think that this is a proper case for equity, is, that the account has become so complicated that a court of law would be incompetent to examine it, upon a trial at Nisi Prius, with all necessary accuracy, and it could appear only from the result of the account that the rent was not due. This is a principle on which courts of equity constantly act, by taking cognizance of matters, which, though cognizable at law, are yet so involved with a complex account, that it cannot pro-[122]-perly be taken at law, and until the result of the account, the justice of the case cannot appear. Matter of account may indeed be made the subject of an action; but an account of this sort is not a proper subject for this mode of proceeding. The old mode of proceeding upon the writ of account shows it. The only judgment was that the party 'should account,' and then the account was taken by the auditor. The court never went into it."

That, my lords, is the rule applicable to questions of this sort; and it is quite obvious from the rule so laid down, that each case must be decided according to the peculiar circumstances belonging to it. It is, therefore, nothing to the purpose to show that there are cases where the court will not entertain jurisdiction, because it is a matter of law. Each case must be investigated, in order to see whether it comes within the rule laid down as that upon which a court of equity exercises its jurisdiction.

A very short reference to the facts of this case will show, beyond all controversy, that this is one of those cases. Here a contract was originally made by William Nixon with the railway company. A specification of the works to be done was appended to the contract. That certainly is complicated enough, as indeed all specifications of contracts are. It appears that he wanted money to carry into effect the contract which he had entered into, and he then applied to the other party, Storm, to assist him with money, and he assigned to him, as security for repayment of the money so advanced, the payments which he might have to receive under his contract.

This went on for some time, and afterwards a new scheme was adopted for the purpose of giving to the party who so advanced the money the security of the payments which might become due from the company in respect of the original contract with Nixon. To this contract all three were parties. It was made in the shape of a joint contract, by which both the liabilities and the rights [123] arising out of the former contract were given up. The company on the one hand gave up their claim against the parties, and the parties gave up their claim against the company. The whole resulted in a new contract between the company on the one hand and these two parties on the other, by which they became joint contractors for the works which were to be performed under the contract originally entered into by Nixon with the railway company.

Now although that is in the form of a joint contract, and therefore gives to each party a right, independently of the other, to deal with the railway company, yet it is admitted, on all hands, that it was adopted for the purpose of adding to the security which Nixon was to give for the money to become due under the contract. But it appears that the other party was not only himself a party to the joint contract with Nixon, but that he himself executed work independently of Nixon. By this means there was an account between him and Nixon, and the company, on account of the contract in which Nixon was a joint contractor; and there was also an account of payments that became due in respect of the contract which he had formerly entered into. The company, however, as they admit in their answer, dealt with these as payments on account generally, and they say that they are unable to say whether those payments are to be referred to the one account or to the other; the payments were made by them as the monies became due, without reference to the particular works in respect of which they were made.

Then, not only is the account of this complicated nature between Nixon and the company, but as between the three there is the duty of ascertaining to what contract and to what works the payments made are to be referred; a question of account utterly impossible to be investigated at Nisi Prius, not only from the complicated nature of the original account of receipts and payments, but from [124] the mode in which the appellants, the company themselves, have dealt with the several contracts, not keeping distinct those payments in which Nixon was interested, but making them as payments on account generally, some of which might be referred to one account and some to another, but which they have not distinguished.

Under these circumstances Nixon files his bill, and asks for an account to be taken of what is due from this company in respect of the contract in which he was originally interested; and also for an account to be taken as between himself and the other party who had become interested in the account as security for the money advanced.

Looking at the rule laid down by Lord Redesdale, and looking at the facts of this case as they are developed in these papers, it appears to me clear that if ever there was a case which was quite unfit for a trial at law, and which necessarily became the subject of investigation in a court of equity, the facts of this case come within that rule; and that is the point for our consideration here. The appellants say, "You have no right to direct this account to be taken in equity; it is entirely a matter of law; let us go to law to try the question between us." I think that the Vice Chancellor was entirely right in the course that he took, and that the case ought to be investigated at equity.

I have therefore to move your lordships that the decree appealed from be affirmed.

Lord Brougham.—I have no desire to take any part in this deliberation, for this reason, that I did not hear the whole of the arguments for the appellants; but what I did hear, and my examination of the printed cases, have led me to the conclusion at which my noble and learned friend has arrived, that this is clearly a case for a court of equity, and one that is not fit to be sent to trial at law. [125] At the same time, as I did not take any active part during the argument, I shall decline entering further upon the case except to say that I entirely concur, as far as I have heard the case, in the observations which my noble and learned friend has made.

Lord Campbell.—My lords, having heard the whole of the argument for the appellants in this case, and having considered it very carefully, I have come to a clear conclusion that this decree ought to be affirmed. I have great satisfaction in doing so, because if there really had been any technical rule whereby a bill in equity could not have been filed in this case, it would have amounted to a very great defect. For if an action at law were the only remedy in such a case, it really would amount, in my opinion, to a denial of justice.

I do not proceed merely upon the ground, which is stated in the case as having been taken by his Honour the Vice Chancellor; I proceed upon this ground, that here is a complicated account that could not by possibility be taken by a jury. The facts of the case, as stated by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, very clearly show that it would be mere mockery to bring such an action before a jury. What would be done if such an action were brought at Nisi Prius? I know that within five minutes from the opening of the case by the leading counsel for the plaintiffs, the judge would say, "If we sit here for a fortnight we cannot try this sort of case, and therefore it is indispensably necessary for the sake of justice—not to save us from the trouble of trying the case, which we are perfectly willing to take—but for the sake of justice, that there should be a reference to an arbitrator who will take accounts between the parties."

My Lords, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, that recommendation would at once be acceded to. Sometimes there is a wrong-headed client, who is fool enough [126] to resist such a recommendation, and to whom, according to a well-known saying that we have in Westminster Hall, it is necessary to use "strong language" to induce him to listen to the recommendation of my Lord the judge.

But, my Lords, it is quite clear that trial by jury never was meant for such a case, and it is wholly incapable of doing justice in such a case. Although a demand may resolve itself into a legal demand, still if there is such a complication of accounts that it is not a fit case for a trial at law, then according to the rule laid down by that most eminent judge, Lord Redesdale, a bill in equity is the remedy. That, if properly pursued, will be effectual, because that is followed by a reference to the Master, and the Master takes the account, and he does justice between the parties; he at once doing properly what, after great expense incurred by an action at law in bringing the case before a jury, would at last have to be attempted by arbitration.

My Lords, I may be allowed at this point to say that I think some important improvement might be made even with reference to this remedy of a bill in equity in a case of this sort; because I think it is an enormous hardship upon parties coming into the Master's Office, taking out warrant after warrant for months and years, and sitting an hour a day in a very complicated account. But if there were to be means taken, which I hope we may see taken in cases of this sort, first of accelerating the proceedings for bringing it into the Master's Office, and then, when it is in the Master's Office, going on continuously until the account is taken, speedy and ample justice would be done. This decision to which your Lordships are prepared to come, certainly will tend to facilitate these further improvements; and I only hope that after it is fully established that a bill in equity will lie in cases of this sort, the practice of bringing an action at law and incurring enormous expense, and then referring the matter to arbitra-[127]-tion will fall into disuse, and that at once, in a case of this sort, the remedy which is afforded by a bill in equity will be resorted to, and that then by some improvement in the mode of taking the account in the Master's Office, speedy and effectual justice may be done.

Under the circumstances of this case, it is quite clear that the account is of a very complicated nature, which could not by possibility be taken before a jury; and therefore I am very glad to find that according to the authorities and the established doctrine of a court of equity, a bill in equity may be brought in such a case, and on this ground I entirely concur in the motion of my noble and learned friend, that the decree of the Vice Chancellor be affirmed.

Lord Brougham.—My Lords, I rise only to mention a circumstance which my noble and learned friend reminds me of, that it was formerly so much a matter of course, when cases of this sort came before us at Nisi Prius upon the Northern Circuit, to refer them to arbitration, that we invented a phrase for it at consultation, the meaning of which was, that it could not be tried, and that the leading counsel for the plaintiff would, what is commonly called, "open a reference." Now, the course ought to be a bill in equity; that is clearly the best remedy: and with my noble and learned friend I entirely concur, in the hope that we may live to see such an improvement in the practice as would eradicate all the abuse and stop all complaints against the Master's Office, and almost against the Court of Chancery—that of parties being obliged to go on, not de die in diem merely, but de hora in horam, as they do at Nisi Prius after due notice.

Lord Campbell.—I may remind your Lordships that the inadequacy of a jury to try such a case was felt so [128] strongly by the Common Law Commissioners appointed some years ago, that, to meet the case of an obstinate party who stood out against the recommendation of a reference, they recommended that an act of Parliament should be passed giving the judge power to force a reference; and such a bill was brought in, but it was opposed by high authority. There was, however, a great improvement made in the most preposterous rule of the common law as to revoking the appointment of an arbitrator. That improvement was introduced, but it was thought that it would be improper to give the power of compulsory reference. The bill therefore, after a good deal of deliberation in both Houses of Parliament, was dropped. I only mention that, in order to show the opinion that was then entertained of the extreme impossibility of a jury trying a case of this description. But if it could be taken speedily to the Master's Office, and the Master were then to sit continuously to dispose of it, I am sure that it would be a very great improvement in the administration of justice in such cases.

The decree was then affirmed, with costs.

Will: Construction of the word "surviving;" to what period referable.

A testator, after various bequests, gave to his wife, for her life only, all his remaining estates, and also gave her all his capital in trade, with the three quarters of the profits arising therefrom, for her life; but nevertheless, in trust, at her death, for his then surviving children, share and share alike, "independent of the rental of his said estates, which he gave and bequeathed to his surviving female children," to be paid to them as he directed. The testator then proceeded thus: "On the decease of any of these children, should they die without issue lawfully begotten, that share to fall to the rest, and so on to the last female child; but should they marry and have children, then their share to go to the said child or children, and from my last female child to the males of my body lawfully begotten, with the same restrictions as before expressed, and to the heirs and assigns of the last of them." One of the testator's daughters, after his death, married, and died in the lifetime of his widow, leaving children:—

Held, that such children did not take any interest under the will, the word "surviving" having reference to the death of the testator's widow, and not to his own.

The question in this appeal arose on a clause in the will of Mr. Joseph Wood, the maternal grandfather of the appellants, by which—after directing payment of his debt and funeral expenses, and an abstract to be made of all his property, estates, freehold, leasehold, ground rents, etc., as the property he had to bequeath—he gave and bequeathed to his son, Joseph Carter Wood, one quarter part of the profits of his brewery in Westminster, and the [130] house adjoining the brewery, rent and tax free, so long as he should reside on the premises in the said house, to conduct the business; the brewery, store-houses, and other premises, to pay to his general estate £400 per annum rent for the same, net, and clear of all taxes; and he nominated and appointed his wife, Mary Wood, and his said son, his sole executors.

After other directions for renewing leaseholds held by the testator under the Dean and Chapter of Westminster, "so that the estates may be always kept renewed, that the younger children may have an equal benefit of time, and so to continue to be provided for, for ever;" and after gifts of freehold cottages to each of his sons, to give them votes for the county of Middlesex, the will proceeded as follows:—

"And now I do give and bequeath to my dear wife, Mary Wood, in trust for her life only, all my remaining estates, freeholds, leaseholds, ground rents, and reversions, rent charges, plate, linen, and the household furniture in the houses at Westminster, and Park House, parish of Hayes, county of Middlesex, with the pictures, and any particular articles she may be desirous of from my estates in Devonshire: As also, I leave, give, and bequeath to my said dear wife, all my capital in trade, with the three quarters of the profits arising therefrom, for her life; but nevertheless, in trust, at her death, for my then surviving children, share and share alike, independent of the rental of my said estates, which I give and bequeath to my surviving female children, to be paid them as follows, by my executor, J. C. Wood, or his heirs and assigns; that is to say, the whole rents and produce, share and share alike, of all such freeholds, leaseholds, ground rents and reversions, rent charges, plate, and household furniture, as before mentioned, but to have no power to sell, mortgage, or in any way whatsoever encumber the same; on the contrary, the rents of which I direct may be received by [131] my executor, J. C. Wood, and paid by him to them one month after each quarter day, that is, on the 25th of January, etc. On the decease of any of these children, should they die without issue lawfully begotten, that share to fall to the rest, and so on to the last female child; but should they marry and have children, then their share to go to the said child or children, and from the last female child to the males of my body lawfully begotten, with the same restrictions as before expressed, and to the heirs and assigns of the last of them. But, be it remembered, that my dear daughter, Mrs. Eliza Johnstone, is exempt from any benefit arising from this my will, the said Mrs. Johnstone having had her share of my property at her marriage, namely, an annuity of £200 per annum, which I do hereby likewise provide for, to be paid quarterly, from my share of three-quarters of the profits of the Westminster brewery; but I should recommend my executors to make a sinking fund immediately after my death, to raise a sum of £4000, which, when raised, I desire may be paid to Captain Hope Johnstone, and so redeem the annuity, that the estate may be free to fulfil my desires and requests, in this my last will and testament contained."

A memorandum, signed by the testator, at the foot of the will, contained the following:—"If my executors should think proper to buy up Eliza Johnstone's annuity, the £4000 so paid must be secured by trustees to the said Eliza Johnstone, for her whole and sole use and benefit, independent of her husband, and at her death to her children."

The will was dated the 23d of October, 1827; * the [132] testator died soon afterwards, leaving Mary Wood, his widow, Joseph Carter Wood, his eldest son and heir at law, and four younger sons and seven daughters.

The testator, at the date of his will and at his death, was owner of a brewery in Westminster, and seized of a freehold farm and lands in Devonshire, a dwelling house and some land at Hayes, Middlesex, both in his own occupation, and divers tenements and ground rents in Westminster and at Bermondsey: also, possessed of divers leasehold public houses, and other tenements and ground rents in and about Westminster, some holden on lease for years, absolute or determinable on lives, from the Dean and Chapter of Westminster. Of the properties in and near Westminster,

* The will being found not to have been attested so as to pass real estates, Mr. J. C. Wood, the testator's eldest son, in whom they consequently became vested, executed, in conjunction with others of the children and their mother, certain indentures, dated in 1831 and 1832, in such manner as to effectuate the testator's intentions.

part was held in connection with his trade of a brewer, and was treated by him as part of the capital employed in the trade; other part was not so connected, but held by himself or by undertenants, and forming part of his estate, independent of his trade.

Georgiana, one of the testator's daughters, married Mr. Charles F. F. Wordsworth, in 1834, having previously attained the age of twenty-one years; no settlement or agreement for a settlement was made, and she died in April 1837, during the lifetime of the testator's widow, leaving her said husband, and the appellants, her only children, surviving her.

In March 1839, the appellants, by their next friend, filed their bill in Chancery against the widow and J. C. Wood, and the other sons and the daughters of the testator, and other parties, stating (amongst other things) to the effect hereinbefore stated, and praying that the trusts of the will might be performed under the direction of the Court; and that the rights and interests of the appellants might be declared and ascertained, and that the usual accounts might be taken, etc.

To that bill the respondents, three of the testator's [133] younger sons, demurred for want of equity, and for multifariousness.

The Master of the Rolls, before whom the demurrer came to be argued, allowed it for want of equity, the counsel for the respondents having abandoned the demurrer for multifariousness (2 Beav. 25).

The Lord Chancellor, upon appeal, affirmed the order of the Master of the Rolls, but gave no costs (4 Myl. and C. 641).

This appeal was against both orders.

Mr. Hodgson for the appellants:—

This appeal is entitled to indulgence, although brought against two consecutive judgments of the Master of the Rolls and the Lord Chancellor. It arose on the construction of a will more than ordinarily obscure, being drawn unfortunately in language peculiar to the testator, of whose intention, however, to make provisions for all his daughters, transmissible to their children, there can be no doubt—as was observed by the Master of the Rolls. The appeal was advised by Sir W. Follett, of whose assistance the appellants are unhappily deprived.

It appears by the will that part of the testator's large property, freehold and leasehold, was held by him in connection with his trade of a brewer, and was treated by him as part of his capital employed in that trade; other parts, held by himself or his tenants, were considered by him as distinct from and independent of his trade; he calls them the rental of his estates—probably to denote that they yielded a rental which he spent—and it is with these that the appeal has to deal. The chief difficulty in the case is to determine the meaning of the words “my surviving female children,” which closely follow the words, “my then surviving children.” These last words clearly mean such of the testator's children as should be living at the death of his widow. The first step in our [134] argument is, that the two forms of expression being read separately, and contrasted with each other, the words “surviving female children” cannot have the same meaning as the words “then surviving children,” and consequently ought not to be construed “living at the death of the widow.” The next step is to show that the words, read in connection with the context of the will, lead to the same conclusion as when read separately.

The testator, in the first place, gives his freehold house in Bermondsey, and the Duke's Head, Westminster, to his eldest son, and one of his smaller houses at the back of the Duke's Head, to each of his younger sons (to give them votes), and the remainder (if any) of this estate (meaning, as it would seem, the estate at the back of the Duke's Head) to J. C. Wood. He then gives to his wife all his remaining estates, freehold, leasehold, ground rents, etc., for her life; and then he divides his property into two parts—one of which he describes as his “capital in trade, with the three-quarters of the profits arising therefrom,” and the other of which he calls “the rental of his estates”—meaning, probably, his estates yielding a rental. The former of these (the trade property) he gives, after his wife's decease, to his “then surviving children.” This, he says, is to be “independent of the rental of estates,” which he gives to the surviving (omitting the word “then”) female children. With reference to the trade property, there might be good reasons existing in the testator's mind for confining that gift to children living at the time of the devolution of the property to them in possession, and for giving them absolute interests in it, in order to secure efficient management; but there was no such reason in regard to his estates unconnected with the trade, and the question therefore is, whether Mrs. Wordsworth's taking any share in the property yielding a rental, was to depend on the accident of her surviving her mother.

[135] The testator, in speaking of "the capital of his trade" and "the rental of his estates," does not keep them separate and distinct in all parts of the will, but sometimes mixes them together, so as to make it difficult to determine to what point the line of separation extends: but with all this confusion and obscurity, he appears to have a scheme in his mind including provisions for every member of his family—for all of them in classes. After the gifts of houses to his sons, to make them freeholders, and a quarter of the profits of the brewery to the eldest, he then makes provision for his widow and for all his children, male and female, who should be living at her death. There cannot be a question that the words "then surviving," are to be referred to the widow's death. The testator, at that part of his will, recollecting that, besides that general provision for all his children, he had previously given bequests to every one of his sons, seems to ask himself, what am I to do for my daughters? He then gives the rental of his estates to them, but not absolutely, as he had given the brewery property to his sons and daughters, but only for their lives, with a remainder—which, in the arguments in the courts below, was treated as a substitutionary clause—for their children.

Assuming, in the first instance, that it was a remainder, the first question is, whether it is clear and necessary to conclude that the testator has given his widow any interest in this "rental." There is a contradiction upon the face of the will certainly, but it is open to your Lordships, looking at what comes after the words "independent of the rental of my said estates," to say this, the rental of his estates was that part of his property which he had assigned for the surviving female children. If that could be established, then your Lordships would see there is no life estate, to the termination of which the word "surviving" can, with any propriety, be applied; and the words "surviving female children," must mean those female children [136] who were living at the time he made his will, or who should be living at the time of his death. That is a doubtful point, but it is worth consideration.

In giving the brewery property, at the death of his wife, to his "then surviving children," he took care to use words plain enough to express his meaning, but in the gift of the rental of his estates, he did not say "my then surviving," but "my surviving female children." When the testator made so marked a difference in his language, it is not unfair to conclude that he had something different in his mind, and that he did not mean the "then surviving female children," but some other class of his female children, and he describes them as "surviving."

This word in wills was, for a long period of time, considered to refer to the testator's death, as it does now sometimes, especially with regard to real estates; and it is to be observed, that this is, to a large extent, real estate. However, the testator has made a marked distinction between the two expressions, first saying, his "then surviving children," and immediately afterwards, his "surviving daughters only,"—the words are, "independent of the rental of my said estates, which I give and bequeath to my surviving female children, to be paid them as follows by my executor, or his heirs or assigns." Then he gives directions for quarterly payments to these daughters, some of whom were under age, without saying when the payments should commence; but there is nothing to lead one to the conclusion that he did not mean them to commence upon his own death. He does not positively say "from my decease," but neither does he say "from the decease of my wife," which one would have expected he would have said if he had so intended. The gift to the surviving female children is followed by a provision, that, "on the decease of any of these children," their shares should go to their children, or in default of such children, to the other females, daughters of the testator; and in [137] default of all of them, to the males, his sons. The context shows plainly that he intended this clause to apply only to that provision of which female children were the first objects—to those objects which were designated by the word "surviving," and not to those denoted by the words "then surviving." He gave their shares, if they should marry and have children, to such children, who were to stand in the places of their mothers, and to take their shares; but if they should die without issue, then the shares were to go over from female to female, and, after the exhaustion of the females, to the males.

The obvious meaning of such a clause was to provide for the accident of a daughter dying, leaving children; and the words of the clause are general, importing the death of a daughter at any time—therefore in the widow's lifetime as well as after her death. But it is to be recollected that daughters are not excluded from the former gift to the then surviving children; it may therefore be inferred, that the testator had in his mind the probable event of a daughter dying in his widow's lifetime, leaving children; if not, why should he not have extended the clause to both devises; for (treating it as a clause of remainder or gift over) it was equally applicable to both? There were several reasons why such a provision was most needed, and most important, with reference to daughters who might die in the widow's lifetime. Yet, if the preceding gift—of which this was a qualification—was applicable only to such daughters as should survive their mother, this provision would be confined to those cases in which it would be the least necessary; which would be to impute to the testator an intention both contrary to the context of his will, and in itself improbable; for it is to be observed, that there is no provision in the will, unless this be one, for the children of a child dying in the widow's life, and no power given to the widow to provide against [138] such an accident. This provision was called in the courts below a "substitutionary clause." It is submitted that it was a clause in the nature of a remainder; that it would operate as a substitution in the case of a daughter dying in her mother's lifetime leaving children, but would equally operate in the case of a daughter so dying after her mother's death; and being confined by its language to the gift in which the objects are called "surviving female children," in contradistinction to that in which they were called "then surviving children;" the more proper construction is to consider the clause as pointing first and mainly to the very case which happened—the death of a daughter leaving children in the widow's lifetime.

The distinction between a substitutionary clause and a remainder, is, that under the former each party would take the same quantity of interest—supposing the testator's children not to take vested interests until the death of their mother—if one of them die leaving issue, which issue is in existence when the mother dies, then the grandchildren take their parent's share. The effect of a remainder would be, that, at whatever time the daughter dies, if she leaves issue, the issue succeed to her share. It is necessary to observe the language of the will. It is not "in case of the decease of the children," but "on the decease of these children," importing that at whatever time the decease might happen, then the child should take the share of the mother. That affords a very strong argument that the testator intended to give vested interests, during his widow's lifetime, to be enjoyed by the daughters after the death of their mother; to be enjoyed by them during their lives, and, upon their death, to go, by way of remainder, to their children.

The language of the will is, that the previous gift to the "then surviving children," is "independent of the rental of my said estates." The word, "independent," [139] there must mean, "with the exception of" the rental; it cannot mean that the same persons are to take both the gifts. It is sometimes said, "I give such an estate, independent of another estate," meaning an addition, and that both estates should be held together. But here, it is obvious, from the terms used, that the testator intended the word "independent" to be in the sense of "except." He excepts, out of the generality of the preceding gift, these estates, which he meant to go to his daughters. One part of the property was to go to the widow for her life, and afterwards to the children living at her death, but the other part, "the rental of his estates," he gave to his "surviving female children," a difference of language which was intended to establish a difference in the nature of the bequests. "Surviving" is not a conclusive expression; however, it has been held in many cases to mean, surviving at the testator's death, as in Doe v. Prigg (8 Barn. and Cress. 540), in which Mr. Justice Bayley said, "where you can give a vested interest, it is the habit of the law to give it as early as possible, and therefore to make a vested interest in such children as are living at the testator's death, and not to wait until the death of the tenant for life."

The terms in which the annuity to Mrs. Johnstone is mentioned, "which I do hereby likewise provide for, to be paid quarterly," indicate an intention to give present gifts to the other daughters, to take effect on the testator's death, and not on his widow's. The clause making provision for the children of the daughters, "on the decease of any of these children," not "if," or "in case of the decease," shows that the testator did not intend the event to be a condition, such as the survivorship of his widow, but that the provision for each donee should, on her death, go immediately to her children, and that construction applies to the children of Mrs. Wordsworth, on whose [140] death, without reference to any other event, it is submitted, they became entitled to her share of the rental of the testator's estates.

There is no head of the law on which there is a greater number of conflicting cases, or in which more nice distinctions have been made than on the term "surviving," as applicable to real and to personal estates. For a long time, words of survivorship, as applicable to both species of property, were held to refer to the death of the testator. That doctrine was subsequently broken in upon, with respect to personal estate, but is not yet entirely abandoned as to real estate, though there are conflicting decisions. In Rose v. Hill (3 Burr. 1881), a devise of real estates to the testator's wife for life, and after her decease, to his five children, by name, and to the survivors and survivor of them, was held to carry the property to such of the children as survived the testator. There is no reason for putting a different construction on the words used by the testator in the present case. Probably some of his daughters had died before the will, or he might contemplate the death of some afterwards during his own life. This view is supported by the case of Wilson v. Bayly (3 Bro. P. Cas. 195), in which this House, reversing a decree of the Irish Chancery, adjudged that each of the daughters surviving the testator took a vested interest in a third share of leaseholds, which, on her death, before the contingency—the death of two brothers without issue—happened, was transmissible to her representatives. It is evident that the House in that case considered the words of survivorship to refer to the death of the testator. It is most material to contrast that case with Cripps v. Wolcott (4 Madd. 11), in which Sir J. Leach held the survivorship to refer to the death of the tenant for life, the period of distribution. It does not appear that Sir J. Leach had the advantage of having [141] the case of Wilson v. Bayly brought to his attention. Nor does it appear that it was cited in this case, in either of the Courts below, which therefore, as well as Sir J. Leach in Cripps v. Wolcott, have unconsciously overlooked that solemn decision of this House.

The cases on this point are very numerous, but there cannot be a stronger authority for the appellants' construction than the case of Doe v. Prigg (8 Barn. and C. 231), in which many of the previous cases are brought together and reviewed in the judgment of the Court, delivered by Mr. Justice Bayley.

Suppose the parts of the clause were transposed thus:—"I give the rental of my estates"—no matter whether in possession or after the death of his wife—"to my surviving female children, independent of the profits of my brewery and the property connected with it, which I give, at my wife's death, to my then surviving children;" would not the words "surviving female children," brought to the attention in that way, clearly mean such female children as were living at the time the testator, made his will, or, at all events, at his death? The opinion of the Lord Chancellor, that the contrast and juxta-position of the words "then surviving," and "surviving" repeated in the next line without "then," showed that the same event was referred to in both the passages, was founded on the judgment of Sir W. Grant, in Daniell v. Daniell (6 Ves. 297). It may be said of that case, first, that it was certainly a strong decision; and, secondly, that it was very different from this, in which a fair comparison and contrast of the two portions of the gift lead to the inference, that the word "surviving" in the second portion was not intended to express "living at the widow's death," which was the meaning of the words "then surviving" in the first portion. And as it is not probable that the expression "surviving female children," with the clause of substitution, or rather of remainder, added to it, was used with [142] reference to such female children as should survive the widow, but rather to such as should survive the testator, but die in the lifetime of his widow; that construction ought to be given to it, and then it would take in the appellants' mother. It was not argued in the Court below, nor is it necessary to contend here, that the widow did not take a life interest in "the rental," although the will on the face of it makes that a doubtful point; but, in either way, whether the daughters were to take in possession or in remainder, they were to take a vested interest for their lives, with remainder to their children. The object of the provision carrying over the shares of the daughters on their death to their children, was to provide for the accident of the death of a daughter at some period contemplated by the testator, most probably within, and not after, the widow's life time. The word "surviving" did not cause the vesting of the legacies in the children or female children to be contingent on their outliving the testator's widow, but pointed out when that interest should become one in actual possession, and did not prevent these legacies having vested previously to the widow's death, and consequently passing to the issue of these children or female children, supposing them to die in the lifetime of the widow. There is sufficient in the will to show an intention that these legacies should so vest.

There are authorities and principles which fully justify the adoption of the construction contended for by the appellants. It is material to remember, that the decision in Cripps v. Wolcott [4 Madd. 11], which is supposed to have turned the current of authority, was pronounced in ignorance of the decision of this House in Wilson v. Bayly, which is a governing authority, not to be overturned by a decision of an inferior court.

Mr. Rolt on the same side:—

The principal question is, to what period is the survivorship to be referred in the gift to "my surviving female children." There is a manifest difference between the words "my surviving children" and "the survivors and survivor of my children." If the former words be read without reference to the context—which is a proper and legitimate mode of construing a will—they mean my children who shall survive me; the period to which the survivorship refers is inherent in the very words, that is, the death of the testator; and so it was held in Doe v. Prigg (8 Barn. and C. 231), as already stated. The only other case in which that form of expression is found, is Taylor v. Beverley (1 Collyer, 108), which has no other application to the present case. The usual words in wills are "the survivors and survivor" of the class, as in Roebuck v. Dean (2 Ves., Jun., 265), Brograve v. Winder (2 Ves., Jun., 634), Maberly v. Strode (3 Ves. 450), Perry v. Woods (3 Ves. 204), Russell v. Long (4 Ves. 551), Daniell v. Daniell (6 Ves. 297), Broune v. Bigg (7 Ves. 279), Newton v. Ayscough (19 Ves. 534), Cripps v. Wolcott (4 Madd. 11), Gibbs v. Tat (8 Sim. 132), and Williams v. Tatt (2 Collyer, 85). (He stated and commented on these cases, and showed why some of them received a construction adverse to that contended for by the appellants).

It is apparent on the face of the will that the testator intended a separation of his trade property from his general property, which last produced "the rental;" and supposing, for the sake of the argument, that he gave his wife a life estate in both—but not abandoning Mr. Hodgson's argument, that she took no interest in "the rental"—and reading the words "my surviving female children" in connection and contrast with the preceding "my then surviving children," do we not find a manifest difference between the two gifts, the second being an exception of part of the property first given? "Independent of the rental" must be held to mean "excepting the rental;" so that there are two distinct gifts in different forms of expression. It cannot be said that the words "my surviving children," naturally and necessarily mean "my then surviving children." Why should it be inferred that a testator in using different forms of expression in gifts to different classes of persons, intended limitations of both on the same event? Is not the contrary the more natural inference, especially when the event expressed in the one gift is omitted in the other? We have no right to supply in the second gift an expression which the testator omitted. In Daniell v. Daniell (6 Ves. 297), the leading authority cited in the court below for construing two gifts in different forms of expression to be to the same class, the same expressions could not be applied to both gifts, one being given under a power, the other a gift of the testator's own property, which was a sufficient reason for the difference of expression in respect to gifts in all other respects identical. That case therefore is quite consistent with the construction for which the appellants contend, and also with the case of Perry v. Woods (3 Ves. 204), in which, there being two gifts to different classes, as in the present case, the Court held that the period of survivorship fixed for one of them was not necessarily the period to which the survivorship in the other was to be referred. The authority of Perry v. Woods is recognised by Sir W. Grant in Newton v. Ayscough (19 Ves. 537), saying, "In Perry v. Woods the testator had by his will furnished evidence of his own intention with regard to the meaning of the word 'survivor.' Where he meant the survivorship to refer to the death of the tenant for life, he expressly declared that intention in two instances; and the omission of that reference in another in-[145]-stance, is an indication of a different intention." That observation is expressly in point here. Where two expressions occur in a will, each relating to survivorship, one pointing to a survivorship at a definite period, the death of the tenant for life, the other not referring to any period; is the juxtaposition of the expressions to have the effect of controlling the latter expression, and supplying words which the testator did not use? When we find the testator has used a clear and definite expression in the one gift, which exactly measures his meaning, and has omitted that expression in the other, is it not compulsory on us to say, that as he used language so different, we are not to alter it or supply the deficiency? So far as this juxtaposition has any effect, it has this only, that the one gift is to be considered different from the other, because, in fact, the language is different. Where the testator meant survivorship to refer to the death of the tenant for life, he expressly declared that intention, and the omission of that reference in the limitation of another gift is an indication of a different intention.

It is necessary to impress on the House that there are two distinct gifts to different classes; there are two species of property—the trade property, and the general property—and the wife is the tenant for life of both—let that be supposed. The parties who are to take in remainder are different; the trade property is given to the surviving children; sons are let in for that as well as daughters: that is one class of persons. The general property is given to the surviving female children, to daughters only, that is the other class. The testator intended the survivorship with respect to the one class, his children, sons and daughters, to refer to the death of the tenant for life. The distinct property which he gave to the other class, his daughters, he limited to them to be vested in them at his own death. It is idle to speculate on his motives; the question is whether he has not given to two distinct [146] classes of persons, and whether he has not used distinct language in his gifts to those two classes? We find the trade property given to the sons and daughters; the general property given to the daughters only. We find the trade property given to the sons and daughters living at the death of the wife; we find the general property given to the surviving daughters, that is, surviving himself, for he says, "my surviving female children." When your Lordships find two distinct species of property thus given to two distinct classes of persons, you will, if you affirm the order under appeal, unquestionably overrule Perry v. Woods [3 Ves. 204], overruling at the same time what Sir William Grant said of it in Newton v. Ayscough [19 Ves. 537], "that it is a sound rule of construction, if you find two gifts to two classes of persons, and the form of expression in the one gift is different from the expression used in the gift to the other; you are not to say that, because they are in some respects alike, they are the same in each; but the effect of the contrast is to lead you to conclude that the testator meant a different thing when he said a different thing: that in the one case he meant to give to the children living at the death of the wife, and in the other he did not mean that, because he did not say it." But we find other differences between these two gifts, the one gift being a gift absolute to the children generally, while the other, the gift of the general property to the daughters, is a gift to them for life only. That is a material difference, and when we find the testator making an entirely different series of limitations in the property given, we may naturally suppose that he intended different periods or events upon which they were to vest. There is no limitation over of the gift of the trade property, for the testator, after giving the general property and capital in trade to his wife, then says, "but nevertheless in trust at her death for my then surviving children, share and share alike, independent of the rental of my said estates which [147] I give and bequeath to my surviving female children." So that the gift of the trade property to the then surviving children is an absolute gift. There is nothing more said to cut down the interest to the children surviving at the death of the wife, to a life estate—it is an absolute interest; not so with respect to the general property; “the rental of my said estates,” that is given to his surviving female children, to be paid them as follows: he fixes the times of payment, and then says, “on the decease of any of these children, should they die without issue lawfully begotten, that share to fall to the rest, and so on to the last female child.” That limitation, or remainder, as it may be more properly described, shows that a life estate only in the general property was given to the female children. One may easily conceive reasons for giving the trade property absolutely to the survivors of the children after the wife’s death, excluding the children of such of them as should die in the lifetime of the tenant for life. It would be inconvenient to let infants come into the management of that property. But that would not apply to “the rental,” the general property which he gave to his daughters, and, on the decease of any of them, to her children. That property could be as well enjoyed by infants as by adults.

By the construction put by the appellants on the terms of the gift of the general property, every part of the context is in harmony; the remainder over—which was erroneously argued in the Courts below, as a substitution—fits in exactly with that construction; so that the circumstances of the case—the force of the words and of the context—enable the House to dispose of it without reference to the doctrines discussed in Cripps v. Wolcott [4 Madd. 11]. That case, however, is directly opposed to the decision of this House in Wilson v. Bayly [3 Bro. P.C. 195], and has not been unreservedly adopted by any judge. Sir J. Leach there said, he “considered it to be settled that if a legacy be given to [148] two or more, equally to be divided between them, or to the survivors or survivor of them, and there be no special intent to be found in the will, the survivorship is to be referred to the period of division” (4 Madd. 15). How and when was it “settled?” In all the prior cases, as Stringer v. Phillips (1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 292), Roebuck v. Dean (2 Ves., junr. 265), Maberly v. Strode (3 Ves. 450), Perry v. Woods (3 Ves. 204), Brown v. Bigg (7 Ves. 279), and many others, the survivorship was held to refer to the death of the testator: those cases, in which it was referred to the death of a tenant for life, were distinguished by a direction to trustees, after the death of the tenant for life, to sell the property and divide the money arising from the sale among persons named, and the survivors of them; Brograve v. Winder (2 Ves., junr. 634), Newton v. Ayscough (19 Ves. 534), Hoghton v. Whitgreave (1 Jac. and W. 146). In Russell v. Long (4 Ves. 551), and Jenour v. Jenour (10 Ves. 562), to which Sir J. Leach referred for the principle of his decision, there was no question as to the death of the parties in the life time of the tenant for life, and they were not cases applicable to Cripps v. Wolcott, or to this case. Some cases subsequent to Cripps v. Wolcott, decided the same way, did not add to its authority, as Pope v. Whitcombe (3 Russ. 124), Gibbs v. Tait (8 Sim. 132) and Williams v. Tarrt (2 Collyer, 85), and they are opposed to Doe v. Prigg (8 Barn. and C. 231), which followed Wilson v. Bayly. The only difference between that case and this is, that that related to realty, this to personalty. In Bindon v. Lord Suffolk (4 Bro. P.C. 574), the House of Lords found a special intent in the will, and then referred the survivorship to that period.

[149] Mr. Turner and Mr. Bethell [with whom was Mr. Craig] for the respondents, in the course of their arguments;—which it is unnecessary to report, as they coincide with the two judgments reported in 2 Beav. 25, and 4 Myl. and C. 644—cited and commented on the cases there mentioned, and also Hawes v. Hawes (1 Ves. senr., 14), Batsford v. Kebbell (3 Ves., jun., 365), Rose v. Hill (3 Burr. 1881), Leaming v. Sherratt (2 Hare, 14), Taylor v. Beverley (1 Collyer, 108), and insisted that the case of Wilson v. Bayly (3 Bro. P. C. 194), so much relied on for the appellants, would, upon examination of it, be found in favor of the respondents, and that the judgment in Doe v. Prigg was founded on a misconception of that case.

Mr. Hodgson, in reply, contended that the bequest of the rental to the surviving female children was an absolute gift for life to such of them as should survive the testator, even if it must be held that it was not to take effect in possession until the widow’s death.

Lord Brougham (May 20).—This case comes before your Lordships upon an appeal from two consecutive orders of the Court of Chancery, one pronounced by the present learned Master of the Rolls, and the other by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, on an appeal from the order of the Master of the Rolls. These orders allowed a demurrer to a bill which was filed to establish the trusts of a will, the demurrer having been for multifariousness and for want of equity. I see by the printed cases that the parties demurring abandoned the demurrer on the ground of multifariousness; but so far as it went upon the want of equity, it was allowed; the result of which is that a construction has been put upon the clause of the will which has been before your Lordships in argument, [150] and to dispose of which construction now only remains for your Lordships.

The clause was, "As also I leave, give, and bequeath to my said dear wife, all my capital in trade, with the three-quarters of the profits arising therefrom for her life; but nevertheless in trust, at her death, for my then surviving children, share and share alike, independent of the rental of my said estates, which I give and bequeath to my surviving female children, to be paid them as follows"—omitting the word "then" which had been introduced into the preceding part of the clause, to qualify the words "surviving children," and which created an undoubted relation between the survivorship there referred to, and the determination of the life estate immediately preceding, given to the widow in the capital, with the three-quarters of the profits arising therefrom given for her life.

The question, therefore, is the shortest and the plainest in its terms that can well be imagined, for it only is, whether we are to take the words in the latter part of the clause, "my surviving female children," with or without the word "then," which had been prefixed to the words "surviving children" in the preceding part of the clause. Both the Master of the Rolls in allowing the demurrer, and my noble and learned friend in affirming that allowance, considered that the words "my surviving female children" in the latter part referred to the same period to which were referred the words "the then surviving children, share and share alike," in the former part of the clause; and, upon the best consideration which I have been able to give to the construction of this clause, and to the very able argument before us on the part both of the appellants and of the respondents, I feel no hesitation in arriving at the same conclusion to which both of the learned judges in the Court below came, namely, that the period of survivorship referred to in connection with the gift to the female children in the latter part of [151] the clause, is the period given to the survivorship of the children in the first part of the clause, that is, the determination of the life estate given to the widow.

I consider in the first place, that it is impossible for your Lordships to separate this into two distinct clauses or parts of the will, as if dealing first with one matter, and then with another unconnected matter. I cannot so read the clause as to consider that there is this difference between the two branches, and that you are to take it as if the testator first dealt with one subject matter in one way, and afterwards, without any immediate connection with the preceding matter, wherewithal he had dealt, that he was dealing with another separate subject matter. I take this to be one and the same clause, and it being so, very much aids the construction; because when a person has already specified his intention clearly, and in a manner to leave no doubt or difficulty, and upon which no dispute can be raised, he, in the same clause, in the continuance of it, in the remaining part of that portion of the provision of his will, naturally applies himself in the same manner to the subject matter, although he may not use precisely the same expression, and the close juxtaposition of the two clauses making one, accounts for his not repeating in the second, the very same words of which he has made use in the first part.

Then I think that upon all principles—not only the principles uniformly adopted in such cases, not only the principles upon which the Courts have always proceeded in dealing with such questions, but upon the plain principle of common sense—the last conclusion which you are apt to come to in considering what a testator meant when he talked of surviving persons, of surviving children, or of other surviving parties; the last construction which you adopt, and which you only come to when there is something that drives you to it in the words, is that he meant [152] the survivorship to refer to the period of his own decease, because every gift to a legatee, whether a child or other person, assumes, ex vi termini, that the party to take is a party surviving the giver of the gift, the testator. If in my will I give a legacy to

A. B., I need not say "at my decease," because it is, of course, that my will is to operate only at my decease; otherwise it would be a gift inter vivos. I need not say when I give to A. B., "I give to A. B. in case he survives;" that is assumed, because my will is to speak at the time of my decease. It is then, and then alone, that it can begin to have any effect, and, therefore, it is with a view to that period alone that I must be taken to apply myself in whatever expressions I use indicating the party who is to take, because I am supposed to be speaking, as it were, at the time of my decease, and to be arranging that which is to happen upon my decease. If, therefore, I mean that A. B. is to take in case he survives me, which no doubt I do mean, I assume that he is to survive me, and accordingly in all the cases (there are some exceptions to be pointed out, but they were altered upon appeal), in all those cases the presumption is that when "surviving" is mentioned, the surviving the testator is not the kind of survivorship which is meant, unless it is clearly shown that the testator did so mean, and that he used words which were totally superfluous. Otherwise in talking of survivorship he must mean some survivorship after another person than himself, or some survivorship relating to another period of time than his own decease [4 Madd. 11].

The case of Cripps v. Wolcott was referred to, which has never been overruled, which has never been materially doubted, though, indeed, there is found one decision of the same learned judge, that is incompatible with it (see Home v. Pillans, 2 Myl. and K. 15). That contradictory decision was overruled, and it was over-[153]-ruled very mainly upon the ground of its being totally at variance not only with all the other cases, but with Cripps v. Wolcott, and I agree with those who say that when Lord Eldon in the latter end of 1827, sent to the registrar his written judgment deciding a case (Pope v. Whitcombe, 3 Russ. 124) in which Cripps v. Wolcott had been cited in the argument, if he had disapproved of Cripps v. Wolcott, if he had held a totally different opinion upon that case he would have said so; but the case of Cripps v. Wolcott was referred to in that case, was argued upon mainly in that case as supporting the decision, and Lord Eldon does not appear to have taken any unfavourable notice of it in the argument which he used in support of the decision which he then gave and sent to the registrar.

I therefore take it to be clear, that we are not, without the most plain and manifest necessity, to be driven to consider that the testator, when he uses the words "surviving children," means children surviving himself. If indeed, there is no other period pointed out, either in that part of his will or in any other part of it, to which the word "surviving" can be referred; if it is clear that you can find no other period of time to which that word "surviving," or other words indicating survivorship can refer, then, going upon the common principle of giving effect to all the words which a man uses in his instrument, you must, whether you will or no, be driven to that conclusion, but, undoubtedly, it is not a natural one, and it is not one to which we should willingly come.

Now, is there, in this will, another period to which the words "surviving," etc., can be referred? Not only is there another period in the subject matter connected with the words in question, but there is another period in the same clause, immediately preceding the words in question, and giving the same parties an interest—a period already taken, [154] during which the estate, namely, the "capital and the three quarters of the profits arising therefrom," is given to the widow for her life, "but, nevertheless, in trust at her death for my then surviving children, independent of the rental of my said estates, which I give and bequeath to my surviving female children." I take it then that this refers to the immediately preceding period of time mentioned by the word "then," that is, surviving at the determination of the life estate, at the widow's death, the period immediately preceding, and which is referred to by the word "then" being admitted, in the whole argument on both sides, to be connected with her death, and with no other period.

A case was referred to of Doe v. Prigg (8 Barn. and Cres. 231), and the reasons given by the very learned judge who pronounced that decision do not appear very clearly to support it: I believe it is pretty certain that the reasons have not given satisfaction in Westminster Hall. I do not say that the arguments on the part of the appellants here cannot stand without the case of Doe v. Prigg, nevertheless, both here and in the Court below, that case, it must be observed, was very much relied upon for the construction against the demurrer, which was allowed.

I have no doubt that a sound view has been taken in the Court below of this clause in the will, that it is one and the same clause, and that the demurrer proceeding upon that ground was properly allowed, I therefore move your Lordships that you affirm the orders of the Court below, and with costs. And my reason for saying "with costs," is this: the case was held to be doubtful enough in the Courts below, to justify the learned judges in both those Courts, not to fix the costs upon the party against whom they decided; but I do not consider that we should do well if we adopted in this House, which is the last resort, anything like a rule of disallowing the costs of [155] appeal, when we have no doubt on the grounds of our decision, merely because there were doubts sufficient to induce both the learned judges below in giving their judgments, to refuse the costs. I think it would be a perilous principle to lay down, and it is one upon which we never proceed, having really no doubt. On the question of costs it is to be observed that, as it stood below before the Lord Chancellor, there was then only the opinion of one judge; the Master of the Rolls was appealed from, and as there might be doubts there sufficient to justify an appeal to my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, he did not allow costs. But that argument fails when there are two judges consecutively of the same opinion; and I beg to observe that I cannot find in the judgment of my noble and learned friend, affirming the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, that he expressed any material doubt, except in so far that he thought there had been doubt enough in the Rolls Court, before the case came to him, to justify him in refusing the costs. When there are two consecutive judgments in this way I do not think that we ought to have any hesitation in abiding by the general rule, and giving the costs of the appeal. I therefore, in moving that your Lordships should affirm the order of the Court below, move also that it be affirmed with costs.

Lord Campbell.—I regret very much that I feel myself bound to come to the same conclusion. I should have been very glad, if consistently with the rules by which wills are to be construed, we could find any ground upon which these children should have a provision made for them, and probably the testator would be very much surprised if he found that they were wholly unprovided for; but as he has expressed his intention only by the words which he has used, we must construe the will which he has made, and we cannot make a will for him.

[156] It seems to me that the doctrine of the case of Cripps v. Wolcott [4 Madd. 11] does not arise here. When the same question does arise at your Lordships' bar, I think it will be for your Lordships to determine whether that case is or is not consistent with the former decisions of this House, upon which I will not now give any opinion. It seems to me that neither Cripps v. Wolcott, nor any of the cases that have been cited, throw any light upon this case.

With regard to the first part of this clause, no question arises, because the word "then" excludes all notions of our looking to the death of the testator as the period when the survivorship is to be ascertained. Therefore we need not at all refer to any authorities to construe that part of the clause, because the words are "for her life, but nevertheless in trust at her death for my then surviving children," which language certainly means, the children surviving at her death. But the real question is, whether, according to the language used, it is a new class to whom a benefit is afterwards given, or whether it is only a portion of the preceding class. Now, it appears to me upon the natural and best construction which I can put upon these words, that they do not introduce a new class, but that they only limit the benefit of the estates which are here mentioned. The words are, "independent of the rental of my said estates, which I give and bequeath to my surviving female children." There it seems to me that the testator only means a portion of that class whom he has before described. If that be so, the class whom he had before described are those who are to survive the mother. That therefore excludes those who are to die in the life time of the mother. We want therefore, no canon of construction, except that you are to put upon words the natural and grammatical meaning, unless there be something to show that a different meaning is to be attached to them. I think therefore, looking at the word "then" that it is necessarily implied, and that the effect of it is carried [157] on to the "surviving female children." Upon that part of the case I have a very strong opinion. I own that I was at first struck with what might be the effect of what is called the substitution clause, and that it is possible in a will so very inartificially drawn, although there was to be no vested interest in the daughters until the death of the mother, that upon the death of a daughter in the life time of the mother leaving children, an interest might be given to those children. That depends upon whether "the children" shall mean all the children, or only the children to whom an interest was before given. I certainly at first, had some doubt on that subject, but on further reflection it seems to me that this is not a substitution clause, placing the children in the place of the parent, but that it is rather in the nature of a remainder clause, that of those who died having a portion, their portion was to go over to the children. We must of course look to the record and see how the will is set out. This coming on upon demurrer, we must consider in our judgments the words which the testator has used according to the bill, but I cannot help in my own mind considering that there is a word in the will which would exclude all doubt and all argument, because in the will it is "these," and not "the."* But supposing it to be "the," I think the proper construction upon that word to be the same which was considered by the Master of the Rolls and by the Lord Chancellor, and therefore I think it must be limited to those children in whom an interest is vested, and as no interest vested in the daughter dying in the lifetime of the [158] mother, her interest is determined and therefore the appellants are not entitled to her share.

With regard to the costs, I very reluctantly coincide with the opinion of my noble and learned friend. It seems to me that as this was a will of a very inartificial nature, and that as doubts arose upon the construction of a will so inartificially drawn, it was very fair that the opinion of the Lord Chancellor should be taken as well as the opinion of the Master of the Rolls; but really I think the appellants ought to have been satisfied with that, and I therefore feel myself obliged to come to the conclusion, that this order should be affirmed with costs.

The Lord Chancellor.—This being an appeal from a decision of the Court of Chancery at the time when I presided in that Court, I was very anxious to hear the opinions of the noble and learned lords before I expressed an opinion of my own. Having heard those opinions, and having very carefully attended to the arguments at the bar, I do not see any reason to alter my former opinion upon this case, and with respect to the question of costs, I agree with my noble and learned friends that the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

The orders appealed from were accordingly affirmed, with costs.

[159] BROOKS' DIVORCE BILL [June 1, 1847].

[Mews' Dig. vii. 952. See Martin's Divorce, 1 H.L.C. 79; Heneage's Divorce Bill, 1 H.L.C. 496.]

Divorce—Action for damages—Lapse of time.

The wife's general bad conduct admitted as an excuse for the husband's omitting to bring an action against the adulterer.

A lapse of eight years from the discovery of the wife's adultery till the petition for a divorce was presented, sufficiently accounted for by the husband's inability to bear the expenses of a divorce bill.

It appeared, from the evidence taken on the second reading of this bill, that the parties were married in 1834, and lived together till 1838, when an alteration was observed in the wife's conduct, in consequence of "her unfortunate propensity to drinking wines and spirits." It was suggested that she might derive some benefit from a sojourn at Gravesend, and her uncle, who was also her husband's uncle, accompanied and left her there. It was soon afterwards discovered that she carried on an adulterous intercourse with a Mr. M., a person of substance, living at Gillingham, in Kent, whom, according to her own admission, she met in the boat that took her to Gravesend.

* A doubt arose in the course of the argument whether, in the clause, "on the decease of any of the children," etc., "these" was not the word used by the testator; and so it appeared on production of the original will; but the bill, copying the clause from the probate, had "the;" and their Lordships held that, as the question came before them on demurrer to the bill, they should take the word to be "the."

The husband on that discovery ceased to live with her: he commenced immediately a suit for a divorce in Doctors' Commons, which he obtained in due course; but did not bring an action against the adulterer, because it was the opinion of his brother and solicitor that the wife's "general conduct was so bad, that it would not be advisable to bring an action." His circumstances from that time (1830) to this (1847), would not bear the expenses of a divorce bill.

The bill was read a second time, and afterwards passed.

[160] HENRY TOMMEY,—Appellant; JAMES WHITE and Others,—Respondents
[July 8, 1847].

[Mews' Dig. xi. 620, 630. See 6 Cl. and F. 786; 3 H.L.C. 49; 4 H.L.C. 313.]

Bill of review.

To sustain a bill of review proceeding on facts discovered subsequent to the decree complained of, it must be shewn that leave of the court to file it was regularly obtained.

To sustain a bill of review for error apparent on the decree complained of, it is not enough that it contains allegations that the decree is erroneous, but error must be shewn on the face of it.

The appellant commenced the business of an hotel-keeper in Dublin in 1832, in a house and premises held by him from a Mr. Milliken, one of the respondents, for a term of thirty years; and in 1833, being indebted to several persons, he demised the hotel, and assigned the furniture, plate, linen, etc., to James White and two others, respondents, upon trust for the benefit of the creditors. The trust deed contained covenants to the effect that the appellant should continue for five years and eight months to manage the hotel (on the assumption that the debts would be paid in that time); and in case he should not pay due attention to the business, the trustees might, after giving him three months' notice, sell his interest in the term, dispose of the furniture, plate, etc., and divide the proceeds among the creditors. Differences soon arose between the appellant and the trustees, who, in April 1834, filed a bill against him, charging various breaches of his said covenants, and praying that they might be at liberty to sell the hotel and trust property, and for a receiver and an account, etc. The cause came to hearing in January 1835, before the Lord Chancellor, who made a decree according to the prayer of the bill. The appellant [161] then filed a cross-bill, or bill of review and supplement, against the trustees, besides other proceedings (6 Ir. Eq. Rep. 303); and against the orders made on them, he, in 1839, brought an appeal to this House, which dismissed the same, and remitted him back to the Court of Chancery in Ireland (6 Clark and Fin. 786).

It did not appear by the appellant's printed cases what proceedings, or whether any, were taken by him from 1839 till 1844, when he filed a new bill against the trustees and Milliken, the landlord, purporting to be "a bill of review and reversal," in which he stated the said bill by the trustees, his answer thereto, the decree, and the Master's report in pursuance thereof, and the decree on the merits, also stating the intermediate and subsequent proceedings in that cause, by way of supplement, and with leave of the court, and alleging and charging many irregularities all through them, and various errors in law and fact in the decree of January 1835, and that it was based on fraud, corruption, collusion, and misrepresentation of the trustees, aided by the co-operation of the appellant's law agents, but which he did not discover until 1837.

One of the errors charged by this bill was that the decree directed a sale of the hotel and effects therein, "whereas the appellant faithfully performed his covenants:" another was, that as by the deed of 1833, it was stipulated that the appellant should have the management of the hotel for five years and eight months, for the purpose of paying his creditors out of the profits, the Court had not in 1835 acquired jurisdiction over the property, so as to vary the said deed and direct a sale. And finally, the appellant submitted and insisted "that error is apparent upon the face of the said decree, inasmuch as it thereby appears that only a portion of your suppliant's evidence was read on the hearing of the said [162] cause; and that the said decree recites that such decree was pronounced by your Lordship upon full debate of the matter, which was not the case, as a great portion of your suppliant's evidence was not read, and which practice is contrary to all principles of equity; and your suppliant charges, that the said decree is further erroneous, inasmuch as, if the whole of your suppliant's case had been submitted to your Lordship at the hearing of the said cause, the same does not appear on the face of the said decree." The bill prayed for a rehearing of the cause, and a reversal of said decree.

The respondents, White and the other trustees, put in a demurrer to the bill, for want of equity and other causes, and the respondent Milliken put in a like demurrer.

Both demurrers were heard by the Master of the Rolls, and allowed, with costs, by an order dated the 30th January, 1845; which was affirmed on appeal by the Lord Chancellor by an order dated the 14th February, the same year.

The present appeal was against these orders, and also against the decree of 30th January, 1835.

The appellant undertook to argue his own case.*

[163] There was no counsel or agent for any of the respondents, nor did it appear that they lodged cases or put in answers to the appeal.

The Lord Chancellor.—It is much to be regretted that the appellant, not appearing by counsel, has not been able to put your Lordships fully in possession of the facts: [164] your Lordships can only judge of them from the proceedings which are brought under your consideration by the printed cases. Certain proceedings took place in the Court of Chancery, under which property, to which the appellant was entitled, was decreed to be sold for the purpose of payment of his creditors. By that decree, made in 1835, the rights of the creditors, as they were supposed to exist, were enforced. The appellant brought that decree before this House in the year 1839, irregularly and without advice; the result of which was, that the House was under the necessity of dismissing that appeal. What has taken place from that time to the present does not appear. But ultimately he filed, what has been called a bill of review, the bill appearing on the face of it to be a bill of review; but the appellant on being asked

* It was impossible to arrange the appellant's statements into the form of an argument. The reasons subjoined to his case, signed by Mr. C. P. Cooper and Mr. Bilton, were, "1st., because the decree of January 1835 is contrary to the terms of the trust deed May 1833; and, in particular, that no sale ought to have been directed to be made of the hotel and trust property until the failure of a certain income within a given time, which time had not arrived when the decree was pronounced; and because, if such time had arrived, and such income had not been produced, no such sale should have been directed to be made, unless such failure had been caused by the act or misconduct of appellant; 2d., because it was provided by the said deed, that if the time should have arrived when the trustees might claim to sell the hotel and property, then three months' notice in writing of their intention to sell should have been served on the appellant, whereas no valid notice had in fact been served, or if it had, the same had since been waived and made void by the subsequent acts and agreement of the respondents; 3rd., because the deed gave the appellant five years and eight months to carry on the business in the hotel; and if even he had committed a breach of the covenants, but which he submitted he had not, no penal provision was contained in the deed to the effect that a breach of covenants at the bar what kind of bill of review it was intended to be, whether he intended it as a bill of review proceeding upon facts discovered since the decree complained of, or as a bill of review upon error apparent on the face of the decree, his answer was that he proceeded on both. I do not say that it is incompetent to a party to unite both those matters in one bill, but a party cannot file a bill of review upon facts discovered since the decree, without first submitting those facts to the consideration of the Court, and obtaining an order from the Court giving him liberty to file such a bill. It does not appear that such a proceeding has been adopted, or that any such order has been obtained, consequently he is necessarily confined to the other part of the case, namely, to showing that this was a bill of review upon error apparent upon the face of the decree.

When that part of the bill, which alone proceeded to bring forward error in the decree, came to be investigated, it appeared that the allegations were not allegations of error apparent on the face of the decree, but complaints made of the decree itself being erroneous, that is to say, [165] that the decree ought to have been different from what it was, being in fact that which can only be discussed on appeal, and not being the subject matter of a bill of review.

In order to satisfy the appellant that this was the rule, and that in confining him to that species of error, the House was only following a rule laid down in other cases, I referred him to the case of Haig v. Homan (8 Clark and Fennelly, 321), which, amongst other things, decided that "the mere propriety of a former decree cannot be questioned by a bill of review, it is only where error is on the face of it that such a bill can be sustained." All the allegations therefore complaining of a former decision as having been erroneous, not showing that the errors appeared upon the face of the decree itself, were of course matters which the House could not attend to in this appeal. I observe that in moving the judgment of this House in Haig v. Homan, I stated, "I have been induced to enter fully into an examination of the proceedings in this case, not from any difficulty in the order to be made, but because many of them, particularly that which has been called a bill of review, show that there has been a want of that precision in these pleadings, and of that accurate view of the principles and practice of Courts of Equity, which is essential to the proper administration of justice" (id., p. 373).

My Lords, such being the rule of practice, and the appellant having had ample time allowed him to point out allegations in this bill; for the purpose of showing that there was error in the decree, apparent on the face of it, it is a matter of necessity, in order to preserve a uniformity of practice, that the rules laid down for the benefit of suitors, and which cannot be departed from—although the person appealing, on account of his poverty, states his own case—should be adhered to. It is necessary to adhere to the ordinary forms of proceeding; those [166] forms have not been adhered to, and he has not brought forward such a case by bill of review as would give the Court of Chancery in Ireland jurisdiction to investigate the matter. The Court of Chancery was of that opinion, and has acted upon the established practice should deprive the appellant of the possession of the hotel, which was secured to him for that period by the deed."

The reasons against the orders allowing the demurrer were, "1st., because the bill of review distinctly stated and charged that the jurisdiction assumed by the Court of Chancery in January 1835 was erroneous in law and equity, and that error in law is apparent upon the said decree; and the bill of review made out a case of fraud and collusion, which called for an exercise of the jurisdiction of the Court, in un-kennelling matters of fraud; 2d., because all the proceedings in the cause, wherein the said decree was pronounced, were vexatious, unnecessary, and in direct violation of the terms of the trust deed, and were had by surprise, and were the result of fraud, covin, and misrepresentation; and were instituted by the respondents, plaintiffs in that suit, acting in collusion together and with Milliken, co-defendant of appellant in that cause; and the bill of review contained statements and charges to that effect, and, also, further statements and charges, from which it clearly appears, that the appellant was entitled to the discovery and relief thereby prayed, which statements and charges ought to have been taken to be true for the purposes of the demurrers.

of the Courts of Equity. I therefore move that the judgment of the Court below be affirmed.

Lord Brougham.—I entirely concur with what has fallen from my noble and learned friend. Although a person who is not possessed of the means of obtaining the assistance of counsel is permitted to appear in person as a suitor, yet it is necessary to adhere, both in the Court below and in the Court of Appeal, to those rules which have been adverted to by my noble and learned friend: else the utmost confusion would take place, and the greatest mischief would result to suitors. Those rules have been framed not for the convenience of the Court, but entirely for the benefit of the suitor. It is necessary that such rules should be laid down, and that when they have been laid down they should be enforced; and to say that, because a man is poor, he should be set free from those rules, would just lead to this, that the rules would soon cease to exist, for every party would be at liberty to plead poverty.

The decree and orders appealed from were then affirmed.

[167] The Honourable RICHARD BOOTLE WILBRAHAM,—Appellant; CHARLES SCARISBRICK, Esq., and Others,—Respondents [May 14, June 24, 1847].

[Mews' Dig. xv. 1844. Discussed and adopted in Meredith v. Treffry, 1879, 12 Ch.D. 173; and see Sandeman v. Mackenzie, 1861, 1 J. and H. 628.]

Will—Shifting Clause—Younger Son.

In construing a will, the words "younger son" used by the testator in a proviso for the shifting, in certain events, of an estate thereby devised, are to be taken in their plain and ordinary sense, as meaning "younger in order of birth," unless it satisfactorily appears from other parts of the will that they were used by the testator in another sense.

This was an appeal against a decree of the Chancellor of the Duchy Court of Lancaster upon the construction of a shifting clause contained in Mr. Eccleston's will (the subject of a former appeal) (see 5 Clark and Fin., 398), and the question was whether the words "younger son," should be construed as meaning "younger in order of birth," or "younger," that is, "posterior" in order of limitation.

The testator, at the date of his will, had seven children living, born in this order:—Thomas, Ann, Mary, Elizabeth, Catherine, William, and Charles (the respondent); and being seised of or entitled to large real estates in Lancashire and elsewhere, he devised them all to Edward Bootle Wilbraham and another, on trust, as to those which he called his Scarisbrick estate, to convey and assure the same (subject to a term) to the use of his eldest son Thomas, for his life, and his first and other sons in tail male, with remainders to William and Charles, and every subsequently born son of the testator successively, and [168] their respective first and other sons in tail male; remainder to the first and other sons of Thomas in tail general; with like remainders to the first and other sons of William and Charles, and every subsequently born son of the testator; remainders to the first and other daughters of Thomas, William, and Charles, and of every subsequently born son of testator, respectively and successively in tail; remainder to the use of testator's daughter Ann, for life, and her first and other sons successively, first in tail male, then in tail general; remainder to her daughters as tenants in common in tail, with similar remainders to the use of Mary, Elizabeth, and Catherine, and every subsequently born daughter of the testator in the order of her birth, and their respective sons and daughters in succession, with other remainders not material to state; and with proviso that Thomas and every person becoming entitled to said estate should take and retain the name and arms of Scarisbrick only.

And as to those estates which the testator called his Wrightington estate, he directed the trustees to convey and assure them (also subject to a term) to the use of his sons and daughters born and to be born, and their issue, in the same manner as the Scarisbrick estate, except that William, the second son, and his issue, were to take first and Thomas last, of the sons, and Thomas's second and other younger sons before his first; and also that Mary, the testator's second daughter, was to take first of the daughters, and Ann last. The settlement was to contain a shifting clause to the effect, that if William or Charles, or any subsequently born son of the testator, or his daughters, Mary, Elizabeth, or Catherine, or any subsequently born daughter, or any issue of his said sons or daughters, should become entitled to the Scarisbrick estate, under the limitations before stated, and any younger son or daughter of testator, or any issue of such younger son or daughter should be then living, the uses of the [169] Wrightington estate to the child, who or whose issue should so become entitled, should cease; but if that estate should have shifted to Charles, or any of the testator's subsequently born sons, or to Elizabeth or Catherine, or any of his subsequently born daughters, or any issue of the respective bodies of his said sons or daughters, and should there be failure of issue of all his sons or daughters, younger than the son or daughter from whom, or from whose issue, the same should have shifted, then the Wrightington estate should return and remain to the uses to which it would have gone if there were no proviso for shifting. This settlement also was to contain a proviso that every person becoming entitled to the Wrightington estate, except Thomas and his issue, should take and retain the name and arms of Dicconson.

And as to the testator's other estates, which he called his Eccleston and Sutton estates, he directed his trustees by sale or mortgage to raise out of them sums sufficient for paying his debts, legacies, etc., and for securing provisions for his subsequently born sons, and for his daughters: and in case the residue of these estates should not exceed the value of £15,000, he declared that his trustees should stand seised thereof in trust for his son Charles, or any subsequently born son first attaining twenty-one, etc., his heirs, executors, etc., respectively for ever; and in case the testator should leave only two sons, in trust for the eldest of them, his heirs, executors, etc. But if such residue should exceed the value of £15,000, the testator directed that the estates should go and remain to the use of his third son, Charles (the respondent), and every other subsequently born son of the testator successively in the order of his birth, for his life, and after his decease to his respective first and other sons successively in tail male; remainder to the use of testator's eldest son, Thomas, for life, and after his decease to his first and other sons successively in tail male; remainder to the use of testator's [170] second son, William, for life, and after his decease to his first and other sons successively in tail male, with remainder to the testator's first and other sons in tail general, the son or sons of the eldest of them, and their issue, to take before the son or sons of the younger of them; and their issue; remainder to the sons' daughters successively in tail in the like order, remainder to testator's daughters, Elizabeth, Catherine, and every subsequently born daughter of testator, for life, and their issue in tail general, remainder to testator's first and second daughters, Ann and Mary, for life, and their respective issue, in such order and for such estates as were before expressed in their regard, as to the Scarisbrick estate.

The shifting clause directed to be inserted in the settlement of the Eccleston estate, upon which the question in this appeal turns, was to this effect, "that if by virtue of the settlement the said Charles, or any of the testator's subsequently born sons, or his daughters, Elizabeth and Catherine, or any subsequently born daughter, or any issue male of the respective bodies of the testator's said sons or daughters, should become actually entitled to the possession, or to the receipt of the rents of the Wrightington estate; and any younger son or daughter of testator, or any issue of such younger son or daughter should be then living, then, and as often as the same should happen, the uses to be limited in the settlement in the hereditaments at Eccleston and Sutton to the son or daughter who or whose issue should so become entitled as aforesaid, and to his or her issue, should absolutely cease; but that in the proviso for shifting it should be declared that if by virtue thereof the said hereditaments should have shifted to any of testator's other sons or daughters, or issue of their respective bodies, and there should afterwards be a failure of issue of all testator's sons or daughters, who should be younger than the son or daughter from whom, or from whose issue the same should have so shifted as aforesaid, then the said hereditaments at Eccle[171]-ston and Sutton should return and remain to the uses, and be held in the manner in which the same would have gone and been held if the proviso for shifting the same were not inserted."

The testator directed various provisions and powers, not material to be here mentioned, to be contained in the settlement; and he appointed the trustees to be his executors. He afterwards made five codicils, by the second of which, dated the 27th October, 1809, he bequeathed an additional annuity of £200 to his wife for her life, chargeable, as the annuity given to her by the will was, on the Scarisbrick estates; and he gave each of his four daughters an annuity of £100 for their lives, chargeable on the same estate, in addition to the provisions made for them by the will; and he gave his wife a legacy of £200, and confirmed his will in all respects so far as the same was not "altered by the recent death of his son William."

The testator died in November 1809, leaving his two sons Thomas and Charles and four daughters surviving. William the second son died shortly before, without issue. Thomas, the eldest, upon his father's death, took the name and arms of Scarisbrick, and entered into possession of that estate. Charles at the same time took the name of Dicconson; he was then of the age of nine years. The residue of the Eccleston estate, after answering the purposes mentioned in the will, considerably exceeded the value of £15,000, and therefore became subject to the provisions in the will for settling the same.

The trustees filed a bill in 1815, in the Court of the County Palatine of Lancaster, against Thomas Scarisbrick and the other surviving children of the testator, praying that the will might be established and carried into execution under the decree of the Court. A decree to that effect was accordingly made, and subsequent proceedings were had in the cause.

[172] In 1822, Thomas Scarisbrick presented a petition in said cause, stating that Charles, the second son, had then attained his age of twenty-one years, and became, by the death of William without issue, entitled to the Wrightington estate for his life; and praying that the Eccleston and Sutton estates might be conveyed to the use of the petitioner and his issue. The Vice Chancellor of the said Court, by his order, made the 9th January, 1823, upon the hearing of the petition, declared that the estates given by the said will to Charles and his issue, in the residue of the Eccleston and Sutton estates, never took effect; and that Thomas, in the events which happened, became entitled to the same for his life. It was by the said order referred to the registrar of the Court to make the inquiries necessary for carrying the will into execution, and for proper settlements. No settlement was made.

Thomas Scarisbrick died without issue in 1833, having by his will bequeathed his personal estate to his wife, and appointed her and the appellant and another, executors. He had previously charged the Eccleston estate with a jointure of £1000 a year for his wife.

Upon the death of Thomas, Charles took the name of Scarisbrick, and entered into possession of that estate; and thereupon his sisters, Mary and Elizabeth, filed a bill in the Chancery of England against the trustees of the will and Charles Scarisbrick, insisting that under the provisions of the will, and in the events that happened, the Wrightington estate had gone over to Mary for her life, and the Eccleston, to Elizabeth. The final decision in that suit was, that neither of the estates went to a daughter while a son was living; and that Charles was, from the death of Thomas, entitled for his life to both those estates, and to the Scarisbrick estate (5 Clark and Finnelly, 398).

[173] Soon after that decision, Charles Scarisbrick revived the suit in the Duchy Court of Lancaster, and then presented a petition to that Court, praying a reversal of the Vice Chancellor's declaration of January 1823, that the estate given to him by the will in the Eccleston and Sutton estates never took effect. That petition was heard in May 1840, by Lord Holland, Chancellor of the Duchy Court, assisted by Mr. Justice Maule and Mr. Baron Rolfe, and an order was made thereon, by which the said declaration of the Vice Chancellor was reversed; and it was ordered and declared that upon the death of the testator, the petitioner became and was still entitled to the Eccleston and Sutton estates.*

* Mr. Justice Maule delivered (May 28, 1840) the judgment of the Court, which, so far as is material here, was to this effect:

The object of the appeal is to vary so much of the order of the Vice Chancellor of the County Palatine, dated 9th January, 1823, as declares that on the death of the testator in the cause, Thomas Scarisbrick, his eldest son, became entitled for his life Against that order the surviving executor of Thomas Scarisbrick brought this appeal, which was argued in presence of the Judges (Chief Justice Wilde, Justices Coleridge, Maule, Wightman, Erle, and Barons Alderson, Rolfe, and Platt).

[174] Mr. Turner and Mr. Prior for the appellant:—

to the Eccleston estate. The respondents contend, first, that considering the length of time which has elapsed since the order complained of was made, this Court cannot, or, at all events, in the exercise of its discretion will not interfere; and, secondly, that the order complained of is not open to objection.

On the first point we are of opinion that the petitioner is not barred by lapse of time, and that there is nothing to warrant the Court in refusing to entertain the appeal on that ground.

It was pressed in argument by the respondents, that the present proceeding is to be regarded rather as a rehearing than an appeal, as something therefore which the petitioner is not entitled to ex debito justitiæ, but which he can only obtain as an indulgence to be conceded or withheld at the pleasure of this Court. There is, undoubtedly, some obscurity as to the precise nature of the equitable jurisdiction exercised by the Duchy Court in reviewing the decrees of the Vice Chancellors of the County Palatine. In Addison v. Hindmarsh (1 Vern. 443), it is said in a note, that an appeal lies, by act of Parliament, from the Equity Court at Lancaster to the Duchy Court. The act there referred to, is probably the act of 1 Edw. IV., printed in the appendix to Ruffhead's Statutes, and cited in the case of the Duchy, reported in Plowden, p. 218. (He stated the act.) It is not easy to say from the statute whether, when the Chancellor of the Duchy reverses or varies the decrees of the Vice Chancellor of the County Palatine, he does so in exercise of a jurisdiction strictly appellate, or merely as rehearing that which has been already heard by another judge of the same court. In Ormerod v. Hardman (5 Ves. 725), it appears, that that case which had been heard and reheard by the Vice Chancellor of the County Palatine, was again heard by the Chancellor of the Duchy. This would have conclusively shown the jurisdiction of the Duchy Court to be in the strictest sense appellate, if the doubt suggested by Lord Eldon, in Brown v. Higgs (8 Ves. 562, 566), as to the power of the Lord Chancellor to rehear a cause which had been heard and reheard at the Rolls, was well founded; but it is clear that such is not the case, as appears from the course pursued by Lord Eldon, not only in that case of Brown v. Higgs, but also in the subsequent case of Blackburn v. Jepson (2 V. and B. 359); so that nothing can be deduced from the report of Ormerod v. Hardman, which will throw light on the present question. It appears, however, that when a decree of the Vice Chancellor of the County Palatine is brought before the Duchy Court, the whole record is remitted. This is a circumstance strongly indicative of a jurisdiction strictly appellate; and, on the whole, we incline to the opinion that such is the true nature of the functions of the Chancellor of the Duchy, when reviewing the decrees or orders of the Vice Chancellor. The question, however, is not free from doubt; and if the decision of this point was important in the present case, we might have desired further information before we gave our judgment. Whether the proceeding be strictly an appeal, or merely a rehearing, we think, in either case, the petitioner is entitled to have his case heard, and to have the judgment of this Court on the merits.

It remains now to consider the question on its merits; that is, whether the Vice Chancellor was right in his construction of the Eccleston shifting clause. That estate is, by the will, given to Charles, for his life, and afterwards to his issue; and the declaration of the Vice Chancellor, in the order of 1823, is founded on the assumption that the effect of the shifting clause was to carry the estate away from Charles to Thomas. By that clause, the testator directed that if, by virtue of the settlement which was to be made pursuant to the trusts of his will, his son Charles should become entitled to the possession of the Wrightington estate, and any younger son of the testator's body should then be living, then the uses and trusts of the Eccleston estate, in favour of Charles and his issue, should cease. Two events were thus to concur in order to make the interest of Charles and his issue in the Eccleston estate cease; namely, first, he was to become possessed of the Wrightington estate, and secondly, at the time of his so becoming possessed, there was to be in esse a younger son of the testator, or the issue of such younger son.

The first of these events happened at the testator's death; for William, the second

The Vice Chancellor of the County Palatine, by his order of January 1823, put the true construction on the [177] words "younger son" in this shifting clause; and after so long an acquiescence of all parties in that order, the Chancellor of the Duchy Court—assuming that he had [178] appellate jurisdiction, ought not to have reversed son, having died without issue, in the testator's lifetime, Charles, on the death of his father, became entitled at once to the Wrightington estate. The question is, whether the second event also happened, that is, whether there was, in esse, at the death of the testator, any son of the testator "younger" than Charles, according to the true meaning of the word younger, as used in the Eccleston shifting clause. If there was, then the order of the Vice Chancellor is right; if there was not, it is wrong.

Now there certainly was no younger son in esse, taking "younger" in its ordinary acceptation; for the testator left only two sons, Thomas and Charles. But the respondents contend that, although there was no younger son properly so called, yet that Thomas, though an eldest son in point of age, was, as to the Eccleston estate, subsequent in limitation to Charles, and so a younger son within the meaning of the shifting clause. This was the construction put on the will by the Vice Chancellor; but after giving the subject our most anxious attention, we feel bound to say that we cannot concur in that construction. The safe rule of construction in general is, to interpret the words of wills, as well as of deeds, according to their plain natural import, unless by so doing some manifest absurdity or inconvenience would follow, which is sufficient to satisfy the judge that the person using the words must have used them in some sense different from what would be their ordinary meaning. It does not appear to us that any such absurdity or inconvenience will result from holding, that the testator used the word "younger" in this case in its ordinary sense. He had three estates and three sons. He gave the Scarisbrick, the principal estate, to Thomas, his eldest son, and his issue; he gave the Wrightington, the estate second in point of value, to William, his second son, and his issue; and the Eccleston, which was the smallest estate, to Charles, his third son, and his issue; and he certainly contemplated the possibility of his having other sons to be afterwards born. The great object of the testator was to found three families in the persons of three sons, and to secure one estate to each family; and the will, both in the limitations of the estates and in the shifting clauses, was evidently framed with a view to that leading object. Construing the word "younger" in the Eccleston shifting clause to mean younger in point of age, according to its natural import, that clause is still quite sufficient to carry out the testator's leading intention of founding three families, so long as any three sons, or the issue male of any three sons, should be in existence. By the death of William without issue, and the death of the testator, without having any after-born son, the leading intention, that of founding three families in the persons of three sons, was defeated. It became impossible to found more than two families; and the limitations, with the Wrightington shifting clause, were quite well adapted for that purpose, securing the Scarisbrick estate to the principal branch, and the Wrightington estate to the other, now become the second branch. What then is to become of the third estate, originally destined to support a distinct line, the carrying out of which original destination has become impossible? Is it to remain with the youngest son, to whom it was originally given? or is it to go over to the eldest son? There can be no doubt but that, construing the words of the will literally, it would remain (according to the original gift) with the younger son; and we see no reason to justify us in saying that such construction could not have been the testator's meaning. He evidently considered the Eccleston estate as being a subject of very inferior importance when compared with his other estates. He might think the son who was to take the Scarisbrick estate was already so amply provided for, as to render any shifting clause in his favour altogether unnecessary; and in such case the word "younger" may have been used intentionally, with the very object of excluding the claim on the part of Thomas, now insisted on by the respondents; or, which is the more probable supposition, the case which has occurred may not have presented itself to the mind of the testator, or of those who framed the will. In either of those cases it would be manifestly unjust to construe the language of the testator in any other than its natural sense; in the former case, because such a course would actually defeat the intention, though expressed in unambiguous language; and in the latter, because the Court would be altering the plain meaning of the words, in order to fix on the testator a meaning which, according to the hypothesis, he never entertained.

it, or at all adjudicated on the respondent's petition. The question, however, in this appeal is confined to the mean-[179]-ing that is to be put on those words. It is to be observed that the devise of the estates is executory, but even if the testator had actually devised the Eccleston estate, which [180] alone is here in question, to the uses upon

It is, however, said, that there are circumstances on the face of this will indicating a probable intention, that in the events which happened, Thomas, and not Charles, should take the Eccleston estate. If, it is said, the value of that estate had been less than £15,000, then, as the testator in fact left only two sons surviving him, it would have gone to Thomas, the eldest son, and not to Charles. This is undoubtedly true; that is a case which did present itself to the mind of the testator, and for which he has made express provision. In such a state of things Thomas would have taken, not by any forced interpretation of the word "younger," but by a plain gift in his favour, on the construction of which no doubt could have arisen. On the other hand, if all the three sons had survived the testator, and the Eccleston estate had been under the value of £15,000, Charles would have taken it absolutely; and on the death of William, without issue, would have taken the Wrightington estate, when there would clearly have been no shifting clause as to the Eccleston estate; so that Charles would have kept both. Very little reliance, therefore, as to intention, can be placed on this gift of the Eccleston estate, in case it had turned out to be below the value of £15,000. In such case, if William died the day before the testator, Thomas would take it; if he died the day after, then Charles would take it. The argument of the respondents is, that the testator probably meant, that if he left only two sons, the Eccleston estate, if above the value of £15,000, and therefore the subject of settlement, should go to Thomas, because if it had been under that value, and therefore not the subject of settlement, it would clearly have gone to him; and in order to carry this intention into effect, it is proposed to do violence to the ordinary meaning of the word "younger" in the shifting clause, by construing it to mean posterior in limitation. The answer is, that by similar reasoning it must be presumed that the testator meant, in case he left three sons, and the second son should die without issue immediately after him, that the youngest son should take the Eccleston estate, if above the value of £15,000, because he would, in such case, certainly have taken it if it had been under that value. And yet this intention would be entirely defeated by the proposed forced interpretation of the word "younger," and would be perfectly carried out by giving to that word its plain ordinary meaning.

Then it is said, that the testator, after the death of William, made a codicil, whereby he increased the amount of provision for his wife and daughters, and thus cast an additional burthen on the estate of Thomas; and it is suggested that he must have done this on the supposition that the property given to Thomas would be augmented by the Eccleston estate coming to him in consequence of the death of William; and this is supposed to furnish an argument that he must have intended to use the word "younger," in the Eccleston shifting clause, in such a sense as should carry that estate to Thomas. All we can say to this suggestion is, that it may be true, but it is mere conjecture. The additional provision for his wife and daughter is just as consistent with the supposition that he thought the former provision inadequate with reference to the then value of the Scarisbrick estate, as that he supposed Thomas would take the Eccleston. And further, it is to be observed that the testator certainly looked to the probability of Eccleston being of a value under £15,000, in which case Thomas would have taken it in addition to Scarisbrick. At all events, as the testator is entirely silent as to the motive for the additional gift, it is impossible for any court to fix on a particular state of circumstances as to what must be supposed to have influenced him, and then to put a forced construction on plain words, in order to make that state of circumstances exist.

It is contended in support of the order of the Vice Chancellor, that in construing the word "younger" to mean "posterior in limitation," little or no violence is offered to its ordinary interpretation. "Younger," it is said, does not necessarily mean "younger in point of age." It is suggested that a person is said to be a "young member of Parliament," "young at the bar," "young in office," and the like. No doubt that is so. The word is, in such cases, used metaphorically, whereas, in speaking of children, the word, unless controlled by the context or by circumstances, is plainly which he directed the conveyance of it to be made; that is, if the trusts of the will had been executed, and not executory; [181] still it is submitted that the word "younger," in the Eccleston shifting clause, must be construed as meaning "younger or posterior in order of limitation," and not [182] "younger in order of birth." And therefore, used in its direct, and not in any figurative, sense. We say unless controlled by the context or by circumstances, because there are, undoubtedly, many cases in the books in which the courts have felt themselves warranted in saying that the word "younger" must receive a construction large enough to include children not strictly younger, but standing in the same situation as younger children properly so called; and the respondents rely much on those cases as authorities for the construction adopted by the Vice Chancellor in the order now appealed from. We have consulted all those cases, but we cannot think they bear out the proposition of the respondents. (He then stated the grounds of the decisions in the cases which were cited in the argument; Beale v. Beale (1 P. Wms. 244), Butler v. Duncombe (id. 448), Teynham v. Webb (2 Ves. sen. 210), Mead v. Cave (1 Rep. in Chan. 224), Bretton v. Bretton (3 Chan. Rep. 1), Chadwick v. Doleman (2 Vern. 528), Duke v. Doidge (2 Ves. sen. 203 n.), Heneage v. Hunloke (2 Atk. 456).

All these cases proceeded on the intelligible principle, that from the nature of the deed or will under which the question arose, it must have been the meaning of the parties to provide for all the children, and in order to carry out this intention, it was necessary to understand by the words "younger children," all the children other than an eldest or only son: in other words, all the children except the haeres natus or haeres factus. The Court has felt itself warranted in thus putting on the words a construction not strictly according to their literal meaning, in the same way as it does with the words "heirs of the body" in marriage articles. In both cases, the nature of the provision intended clearly shows that the words must have been used in a sense different from that which they ordinarily had been; and the Court therefore construes them in the sense in which, from the nature of the instrument, they must have been understood by the parties. What analogy then do these cases furnish towards enabling us to construe the word "younger" in the will now before us? What is there in the very nature of the provisions of this will showing that the testator must have used the word "younger" not in its obvious sense? When the intention of founding three distinct families in the persons of three sons became impossible, by the death of one son without issue, there is no more incongruity with the presumable intention of the testator in uniting the two mesne estates in the person of the younger son, than in giving one of them to the elder. The only guide as to intention in such case must be found in the language of the will itself, and there does not appear to us to be any thing in that language to give to the word "younger" any other than its ordinary meaning. [He then stated the case of Hall v. Luckup (4 Sim. 5), also referred to in the argument, and shewed that it had no application to the present case.]

It was pressed at the bar that this is a case of an executory trust, and not a trust executed; and therefore it was said the Court will direct a conveyance so as to obviate any omissions or errors on the part of the testator, so as to effectuate the real intention. Undoubtedly it will. But the question still arises, what is the intention? How is that intention to be ascertained? It can only be obtained by looking to the language used, and if we are right in our opinion, that there is nothing to show that the testator meant to use the word "younger" in any other than its ordinary sense, it matters not whether the trust is executed or executory. In either case the ordinary sense must be adhered to.

On the whole, therefore, there does not appear to us, either in the nature of the provisions or the presumable intention of the testator, or in the context of the will, any thing which can justify us in saying that the word "younger," in the Eccleston shifting clause, means any thing else than younger in point of age. It follows that so much of the order of the Vice Chancellor of the County Palatine as declares that, on the death of the testator, Thomas, his eldest son, became entitled to the Eccleston estate, was erroneous, and that it must be varied by declaring that Charles, on the death of his father, became entitled to that estate for his life. We have come to this conclusion on a full consideration of the case, and without resting on what was said by the late Mr. Justice Park, in delivering the opinion of the Judges in the House of

after the Wrightington estate devolved on Charles by reason of the death of William without issue, the Eccleston estate [183] shifted from Charles to Thomas, who, as to that estate, was then a "younger" son than Charles in order of limitation, there being then no son living, or issue of a son younger in the order of birth.

[184] This question was not involved in the decision of the House on the former appeal, which was brought by the present respondent. That decision proceeded on the ground that both the Eccleston and Wrightington shifting clauses were to be read distributively as to sons and daughters, and that they did not cause either of the estates to shift to a daughter of the testator, as long as any son, or the issue of any son, was living. The respondent was the only son then living, and there was no issue of any other son. The question which had arisen and been decided in the affirmative by the Vice Chancellor of the Court of the County Palatine in 1823, was, whether, under the shifting clause of the Eccleston estate, that estate would shift in the event of there being living a son, as there then was, or issue of a son, elder in birth, but posterior in limitation, to the respondent, the son on whom the Wrightington estate had devolved. That question is now, for the first time, before this House. The Vice-Chancellor decided that the word "younger," in the Eccleston shifting clause, meant "younger in order of limitation." The decision of the Chancellor of the Duchy Court, reversing the Vice Chancellor's order, rests on the assumption that the words "elder" and "younger" are to be taken in their natural and ordinary signification, and mean elder and younger in order of birth, and that, although they may receive another construction if the context of the instrument required it, there was nothing in the context of this will to warrant such other construction.

The words "elder" and "younger," applied to individuals, merely as living beings, without reference to property, office, title, or other like distinction, must, of course, be taken to refer to the order of their births; but the parties to whom they are applied may be placed in situations, and under conditions regardless of their ages, rendering the words capable of other distinctions; and then the question would be whether, from the context in which the [185] words are used, they are to be referred to the differences in the natural, or in the social or adventitious age of the parties to whom they are applied. There are many familiar instances in which the natural and ordinary meaning of the words is excluded when they are applied to persons with relation to their office or situation, as when it is said, one member of the bar is senior or junior to another, a junior bencher of one of the inns of Court, a junior peer of this House: So, also, in the construction of instruments providing portions for children, excluding the one to whom the family estate is limited, the words "elder" and "younger" have acquired a technical meaning, referable to the order of limitation of the principal estate, distinct from the order of birth.

There are several passages in this will which shew that the testator used the word "younger," in the Eccleston shifting clause, in the sense of "younger in the order of limitation." In the limitations of the Wrightington and Eccleston estates to the sons of the testator's sons in tail general, it is evident, from the context, that the words "eldest" and "younger" are to be construed in reference to the order of limitation, and not of birth. On examination of the will, it appears clear that, although it was a great object with the testator to found three distinct families, his desire in that respect was subordinate to a preference of males over females; and so his daughters do not take any of the estates until the sons and the whole of their issue are extinct; and the male issue of the son, last in order of succession to the estates, take before the female issue of the son first in order of succession. In the events which happened, of the Wrightington estate having devolved on Charles by the death of William, without issue, Thomas still living, the shifting of the Eccleston estate from Charles, and its devolution to Thomas would, as the appellant contends, depend, not on events in any way connected with Thomas or Charles, or [186] either Lords, in the case of Scarisbrick v. Eccleston (5 Clark and Fin. 450-1-2). We agree with the observation, that what was there said as to the present case was extra-judicial, and not necessary with reference to the question then to be decided. At the same time it is satisfactory to us to know that, in reversing an order which has been so long acquiesced in, we have the high sanction of those who concurred in the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Park.

of their families, but on the state of the family of any after born son of the testator. The decision of the Chancellor of the Duchy Court was, that there having been no subsequently born son of the testator, the Eccleston estate did not go over to Thomas, but remained in Charles, notwithstanding the Wrightington estate had devolved upon him; but the argument in support of that decision, admits that, if there had been a subsequently born son of the testator, who had died leaving only female issue, the Eccleston estate would have been divested from Charles and gone to Thomas, and it is plain that the same result must have followed, if there had been an after born son living at the time of the devolution to Charles of the Wrightington estate, and such after born son had afterwards died leaving female issue, which shews how capricious and inconsistent is the construction put on the word "younger" by the respondent, while by the appellant's construction of it the limitations of the Eccleston estate are in all cases consistent.

There was in the will an absolute gift to Thomas of the Eccleston estate, if, after satisfaction of certain charges, it proved to be of less value than £15,000, and there should be then living but two of the testator's sons, but if of the value of £15,000, it was to be the subject of a settlement. It is manifest on the face of the will that the testator intended to provide better for his eldest than for any other son. Yet the contrary would be the result of the respondent's construction; for the Eccleston estate, if not worth £15,000, would go to the eldest son, absolutely, with the Scarisbrick; but if of greater value, as happened, it would remain with the youngest son, in addition to the Wrightington estate, both which were of far greater value than the Scarisbrick estate, the only property that would, in that case, belong to the eldest son, diminished by the increased charges put on it by the second codicil made upon William's death.

[187] If Charles had died instead of William, it is quite clear that Thomas would have both the Eccleston and Scarisbrick estates, and William the Wrightington only; it is, therefore, imputing a very capricious intention to the testator to suppose that if his two surviving children should be the first and second, the first should have the two estates, and the second the one only, whilst if the two children who survived him should be the eldest and the third or a subsequently born son, the eldest should have but the one estate, and the youngest the two.

The provisions of the second codicil, made after the death of William, are inexplicable, unless on the construction contended for by the appellant, that the death of William gave the Eccleston estate to Thomas. By that codicil, the testator referred to the death of William, and in consequence of that event, charged the Scarisbrick estate with additional annuities to his wife and daughters. But why should he, on that occasion, select the Scarisbrick estate to bear those charges, unless it was that by that circumstance the owner of the Scarisbrick estate acquired a large portion of his property, as according to the appellant's construction he would do? But if, according to the respondent's construction, the death of William proved only an accession of fortune to Charles, surely the testator would have charged these additional annuities on one of the estates given to Charles.

It is to be observed that the testator in several parts of the will describes a younger son in order of birth, by the words "subsequently born son," and in other parts, as in the Wrightington shifting clause, he actually says his eldest son shall be a younger son in order of limitation, thereby putting his own meaning on the words, and leaving no doubt of his intention, which it is the duty of the House to carry into execution. The House, looking to the whole context, cannot fail to see the meaning of the testator.

[188] They cited Oddie v. Woodford (3 Myl. and C. 584); and Hall v. Luckup (4 Simons, 5).

The Lord Chancellor observed that the case had been very ably argued; yet, as the learned judges present entertained no doubt, nor did he himself, on the point in question, it was not necessary to hear the other side. His Lordship then put a question of law to the judges, which they obtained time to answer.

Lord Chief Justice Wilde delivered (June 24, 1847) the opinion of himself and the other judges:—

The answer to your Lordship's question depends upon the construction of the shifting clause relating to the Eccleston estate in Mr. Eccleston's will.

The language of the clause is not ambiguous, but is such as is in ordinary use, and bears a well known meaning. But it is contended, that upon reference to the other parts of the will an intention may be inferred on the part of the testator, which will not be fully carried into effect by reading the clause in question in the ordinary sense attached to the language. Such imputed intentions are in most respects speculative and uncertain, and where any are to be found which the construction of the clause in question, according to its ordinary meaning, will not carry into effect, or may defeat, it is more probable that such failure will arise from the testator not having contemplated or provided for the very many events which may be supposed as possible to arise in the family, than that he used such expressions in any other than the ordinary meaning. The clause being plain and simple in its language, we do not think the rules of construction, now considered as settled, will warrant the clause receiving a [189] construction other than according to its ordinary meaning, without its appearing satisfactorily from other parts of the will that the language was used by the testator in some other sense.

The judges having heard the arguments, and having perused the judgment given in the court below (vide ante, p. 175, et seq., note), in which the judges entirely concur, are unanimously of opinion that none of the passages in the will referred to, nor any of the arguments which have been urged, warrants a construction of the clause in question, other than that which the language of it in the ordinary meaning should receive; and, therefore, we are of opinion that, on the death of the testator, his son Charles became entitled to the Eccleston estate.

Lord Brougham.—I entirely agree in the opinion that has been come to by the learned judges who acted as assessors to the Chancellor in the Court below, and with the learned judges who have pronounced their opinion to-day. I do not mean to deny that the words "younger son" might not, according to the context, be capable of a different meaning from what they ordinarily bear. I do not mean to deny that if any gross absurdity, any glaring inconsistency with the manifest intention of the party making the instrument, would arise from taking the words in their ordinary meaning, you might not by implication be entitled to take the unusual and extraordinary meaning of those words rather than the ordinary meaning. But those circumstances do not exist in the present case, neither in the context, nor as matter of inference, is there anything that entitles us to depart from the ordinary meaning of the words "younger son."

The Lord Chancellor.—I have merely to express that [190] my opinion is in accordance with the opinion of the learned judges. There is only one point to which I wish to allude, which was raised by Mr. Turner. Looking at the original decree of the Vice Chancellor of the Duchy, I find that there is no adjudication on the subject of the rents. There was merely an inquiry as to the receipt of the rents. That decree was the subject matter of appeal to the Chancellor of the Duchy, and is now before this House. There is nothing upon the subject of arrears of rent before us, which in the proceedings are under consideration; nothing is done with regard to rents that is not consistent with the judgment now pronounced by this House; that is, that the decree of the Court below be affirmed.

Mr. Tinney *.—I trust, after this long litigation, your Lordships will give us the costs of the appeal.

The Lord Chancellor.—I think you are entitled to the costs: their Lordships' opinion is, that the decree of the Court below be affirmed, with costs.

The judgment was then affirmed, with costs.

Will—Fraud—Probate—Jurisdiction.

A testator by his will and codicils gave R. A. large bequests, which he revoked by a final codicil, providing only a small weekly allowance for him during his life. The will and all the codicils having been admitted to probate, after litigation as to the last codicil in the Ecclesiastical Court, R. A. filed a bill in Chancery alleging that the testator had executed the last codicil under undue influence of the residuary legatee, and false representations made at her instance respecting R. A.'s character; and that he had not been permitted in the Ecclesiastical Court to take any objections to that codicil, except such as affected the validity of the whole instrument: the bill therefore prayed that the executors or residuary legatee might be declared trustees or trustee for R. A. to the amount of the revoked bequests.

Held, on demurrer, that the Court of Chancery had no jurisdiction in the matter (dissentientibus, Lord Cottenham (Chancellor) and Lord Langdale (M. R.), and that the proper course would have been an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council against the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court.

John Allen, a native of East Chinnock, in the county of Somerset, came at an early age to London, and there acquired a large fortune in trade, from which he retired in 1820. He made his will in 1834, and thereby, after appointing Richard M'Pherson and Samuel Tomkins his executors, and providing for his daughter, his only legitimate child, then wife of George Evans, he gave, among other bequests to his relations at East Chinnock, the sum of £4000 to the appellant and his sister and brother, children of his deceased nephew, in equal shares, to be [192] paid to them as by the will directed. He gave the residue of his estate to his executors, in trust for his daughter. He afterwards made nine codicils; by the fourth of which, dated November 1836, he gave additional bequests of £2000 each to the appellant and his brother, and £3000 to their sister, to take effect only in case Mrs. Evans died in her husband's lifetime. By the sixth codicil, dated March, 1837, he gave the fourth part of the clear residue of his estate to the appellant. By the seventh he appointed William Allen (who was his son born before marriage) an executor of his will, jointly with the two before named. By the ninth codicil he revoked the bequests given by the will and former codicils to the appellant and the other relatives at East Chinnock, and in lieu of them substituted smaller bequests. The substituted bequest to the appellant was a direction to the executors to purchase £800 in consols in the names of trustees, in trust to receive the dividends, and pay the same to the appellant by weekly instalments during his life; the capital, on his decease or attempt to sell or encumber it, to fall into the residuary estate.

The testator died in November, 1837, and probate of the will and nine codicils was granted by the Prerogative Court to the executors after an attempt made by the appellant to prevent the probate as to the ninth codicil.

The appellant filed his bill in Chancery in 1841 against the executors and Mrs. Evans and her husband, stating the will and codicils, and praying that it might be declared that the appellant was entitled to the bequests given or intended for him by the will and first eight codicils, notwithstanding the revocation of them by the ninth codicil; and that the executors of Mrs. Evans were trustees or trustee for him to the extent of such bequests.

The case stated in the bill to sustain that prayer was, in substance (the allegations in the bill are set forth in 1 Phil. 133), that the testator was, after the date of the [193] sixth codicil, feeble in mind and in body from age, and his previous habits of drinking wine and spirits; that Mrs. Evans, then residing with him, exercised great influence over him, and under that influence he executed the subsequent codicils; that she and William Allen, before mentioned, upon obtaining a knowledge of the bequests given to the appellant by the sixth codicil, became jealous of him, and formed a determination to obtain a revocation, or at least a great diminution, of them, and with that view they contrived that William Allen should go to East Chinnock, with the testator's sanction, to inquire into the character and conduct of the appellant and his brother; that William Allen, upon a secret agreement with Mrs. Evans, concocted a report containing various false representations of the appellant's character and manner of life, in order to prejudice the testator against him; that such pretended report was read to the testator, who did not seem to understand the contents, and was then, without any express directions from him, taken by William Allen to Mrs. Evans's solicitor, who, from the suggestions therein contained, and from verbal instructions given him by W. Allen, prepared the ninth codicil, and the same was executed the same day by the testator—relying on the truth of the pretended report—without any draft being previously submitted for his perusal; the object of such haste being for fear the testator should on reflection think proper to inquire into the truth of the statements made in the said report, and so frustrate the scheme of William Allen and Mrs. Evans; that probate of the will, with the nine codicils, was granted by the Prerogative Court to the executors; that an attempt was made by the appellant to prevent such probate being granted as to the ninth codicil, on the grounds that the testator was of unsound mind at the time of executing it, and that undue influence was exercised over him by W. Allen and Mrs. Evans, but that he was confined by the said Court [194] to grounds of objection, which affected the said codicil as an entire instrument, and was not permitted to go into the case stated in the bill, or into any other case solely relating to the parts of the codicil which affected only himself.

The executors demurred to the bill for want of equity and of parties. The demurrer was overruled by the Master of the Rolls, but on appeal to the Lord Chancellor the demurrer was allowed for want of equity, by an order (1 Phillips, 142) dated the 11th November, 1842, against which the appellant brought this appeal.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Jolliffe for the appellant:

The bill shews a clear case of fraud on the appellant and imposition on the testator, committed by William Allen in conjunction with Mrs. Evans, who will take the benefit of the fraud either as residuary legatee under the will, or as sole next of kin of the testator, according to the Statute of Distributions. The question then is, whether a Court of Equity has not jurisdiction to relieve the appellant from the consequences of such fraud, notwithstanding the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court establishing the whole will. Unless the court has and exercises such jurisdiction, the appellant was, before grant of probate, as well as after it, without remedy, inasmuch as the case of misrepresentation and fraud made by his bill could not be set up in the Ecclesiastical Court against the validity of the ninth codicil or any distinct part of it, because the codicil must be taken to be a part of the will, and made by the testator animo testandi. It must be admitted that he had the mind and intention to revoke the previous bequests, while he was not aware that the representations made to him respecting the appellant were false. But those representations being now admitted by demurrer to the bill to be false and fraudulent, and to have been made at the instance of the person who [195] would have all the benefit of their intended effect, it is contrary to equity and justice to allow the appellant to be deprived of bequests which he would receive if the codicil resulting from such representations had not been executed.

There is a great variety of cases on this subject, most of which were referred to in the arguments in the Courts below. Marriot v. Marriot, reported by Strange (1 Str. 666), and also by Chief Baron Gilbert (Gilb. Cas. in Chan. 203), whose judgment it was, goes to the full extent of the appellant's prayer. There the testator gave the residue of his personal estate to his wife, and made her his executrix; his sons filed their bill in the Exchequer, insisting that the gift of the residue was obtained by fraud and surprise; the wife's counsel contended that the probate of the will, which was granted to the wife, was conclusive, and that a Court of Equity had no jurisdiction touching the disposition of the residue, but that it was matter for determination in the Ecclesiastical Court; but the Chief Baron, in his elaborate judgment, says (1 Str. 673) "Courts of Equity can hold plea concerning a legacy, and likewise concerning the devise of the residuum; they may in notorious cases declare a legatee that has obtained a legacy by fraud to be a trustee for another." Then, after instancing some cases, he proceeds, "But in all such cases, Courts of Equity must consider what is the real will of the testator, and they cannot declare a trust according to their own fancy, nor according to what the testator should have willed, for then they make the will, and not the testator. But they may, to answer the real intention of the testator, declare a trust upon such will, though it be not contained in the will itself, which is in three cases: first, in that of fraud upon a legatary (legatee) before mentioned." After stating the other two cases, he adds, "And nobody has thought, that declaring a trust in any of those cases is an [196] infringement of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction." The Lord Chancellor in his judgment in the present case expressed his concurrence in the three positions so laid down by Chief Baron Gilbert, adding, that in none of such instances would the Ecclesiastical Court be competent to afford relief; but he thought they were distinguishable from the case before him (1 Phillips, 144-5).

[The Lord Chancellor.—It was assumed in the argument before me, that the Ecclesiastical Court had jurisdiction in the case, and I took it to be so, but if it had not, then certainly my decision must be wrong.]

It must be admitted that, in executing the last codicil, as well as all the others, the testator had the animus sic testandi, and therefore the Ecclesiastical Court could not do otherwise than admit them all to probate; but it could not do what the appellant asks the Court of equity to do, declare the residuary legatee a trustee for him, upon the ground that the animus testandi, the disposing mind, which certainly existed, was produced by fraud. In all cases in which Courts of Equity refused to interfere, the question was whether it was the testator's will. That question does not exist here, for it is admitted that it is the will of the testator, made according to his then existing intention; but that intention was the result of fraudulent representations, into which the Ecclesiastical Court refused to enter, on the ground that it could not hear complaints of one legacy only, others given by the same codicil not being complained of; but a Court of Equity may even after probate inquire into the fairness of the case, whether of fraud or mistake; Marriot v. Marriot (1 Strange, 666), Campbell v. French (3 Ves. 321), Kennell v. Abbott (4 Ves. 802). The frauds of which the Ecclesiastical Court takes cognizance must be connected with the actual making of the will—with the mere manufacture of it; and sometimes it will reform a will where there is an ambiguity, and it sees [197] cause for it, as in Harrison v. Stone (2 Hagg. 549), Shadbolt v. Waugh (3 Hagg. 573); but will not strike out a clause in a will giving bequests to a class, for fraud upon one only of that class. That is the case here; there is no ambiguity, and the fraud complained of was not in the execution of the instrument, but in the residuary legatee's previously raising the testamentary disposition in favour of herself to the prejudice of another. What Lord Alvanley says in Kennell v. Abbott is quite in point. The testatrix there gave a legacy to a man whom she supposed to be her husband, but he was the husband of another. "I am called upon," says Lord Alvanley, "to determine whether the law of England will permit this legacy to be claimed by him. Under these circumstances, I am warranted to determine that whenever a legacy is given to a person under a particular character which he has falsely assumed, and which alone can be supposed to be the motive of the bounty, the law will not permit him to avail himself of it." That is the principle, for the application of which the appellant contends: it is the same principle that was applied by Sir A. Hart in Segrave v. Kirwan (1 Beatty, 157), a case not of fraud but of accident and ignorance, and by Lord Eldon in Bulkley v. Wilford (2 Clark and Fin. 102), a case, if not of fraud, of culpable professional ignorance. There is no case or authority whatsoever warranting the argument that the jurisdiction over the fraud in this case belonged to the Ecclesiastical Court and not to the Court of Equity. The cases that were cited in the Court below, and which may be cited here in support of that position. Archer v. Mosse (2 Vern. 8), Plume v. Beale (1 P. Wms. 388), Steventon v. Gardiner (2 P. Wms. 286), Kerrich v. Bransby (7 Bro. P.C. 437), Barnesly v. Powel (1 Ves. sen. 284), Ex parte Fearon (5 Ves. 633), and Gingell v. Horne (9 Sim. 539), do not sustain it.

[198] Mr. Turner and Mr. Russell (with whom was Mr. G. M. Giffard) for the respondents:

The appellant's bill is of first impression. Such cases of fraud and undue influence as he complains of must have often occurred, and if relief had been ever given against them in equity, there would be some such case in the reports; in the absence of which it is not unfair to infer that the remedy for them was found in the Ecclesiastical courts; and so it is said in the text books, as Glanvill (Lib. 7, chap. 8), Bacon's abridgment (Vol. 7, tit. Wills, p. 378), Wooddeson's Lectures (Vol. 3, p. 477), Dr. Arthur Brown's Lectures (Vol. 1, bk. ii., chap. 10). These writers refer to several cases in which it was held that a Court of equity has no jurisdiction to declare a testamentary instrument relating to personal estate invalid, especially after probate in the proper Ecclesiastical Court; James v. Greaves (2 P. Wms. 270), Plume v. Beale (1 P. Wms. 388), Kerrich v. Bransby (7 Bro. P. C. 437).

The case made by the bill is, that the Ecclesiastical Court admitted the ninth codicil to probate, although the appellant opposed it on the grounds that the testator was of unsound mind, and that undue influence and misrepresentation had been used. The proofs of mental incapacity having failed, the other grounds only are now relied on. It is admitted that the testator had a disposing mind at the execution of the codicil, and that he did dispose of his property according to his intention at the time; but it is alleged that that intention was produced by fraud and misrepresentation. The Ecclesiastical Court has the proper jurisdiction to investigate such a case, and, if proved, to refuse probate. Even if a court of equity had jurisdiction, still it would be contrary to law, and a most dangerous precedent, to inquire into the motives which might have induced a testator to make or revoke a disposition of his property, and to support or set aside such disposi-[199]-tion on the ground of his motives being well or ill founded:—

[The Lord Chancellor.—You must admit, what is stated in the record, that it was in consequence of the fraud alone the testator made this codicil. By demurring you admit the facts stated.]

Yes, facts that are well pleaded; they were pleaded in the Ecclesiastical Court, and the appellant was allowed to go into evidence of them; the inference therefore is, that the Court exercised its jurisdiction, as it does constantly in such cases; Castell v. Fagg (1 Curtis, 298); In re Shuttleworth (id. 911); Grindall v. Grindall (4 Hagg. 10). The interference of a Court of equity would give rise to a conflict of jurisdictions between two Courts acting on the same subject by different ways. There may be cases of fraud,—such as Kennell v. Abbott, where a person assumed a false character for the purpose of obtaining a legacy,—in which a Court of Equity would interfere to deprive a party of a legacy obtained by fraud.

The question raised by the bill was, whether upon the facts as stated, the Ecclesiastical Court had jurisdiction to admit or reject the testamentary papers propounded for probate. It is the animus testandi that that Court has to consider, and how far deceit or constraint will vitiate the testament. The principle is laid down in Nicholls v. Nicholls (2 Phillimore, 180, 185), Swinburne (Part 1, sec. 3, pla. 32), and Godolphin (Part 3, cap. 25, pla. 7). Circumvention by fraud, deceit, or flattery, have the effect of constraint by force to avoid a will. In this particular case the question is whether the animus, which is admitted to have existed, was circumvented by fraud; whether that question be considered on principle or on authorities, the Ecclesiastical Court must be admitted to have jurisdiction to determine the validity of the instrument, to admit or reject part of it, correct mistakes, or supply omissions; [200] Fawcett v. Jones (3 Phillimore, 434), Micklin v. Franklin, cited in Fawcett v. Jones (id. 461), Billinghurst v. Vickers (1 Phillimore, 187), Wood v. Wood (1 Phillimore, 357), Grindall v. Grindall (4 Hagg. 10). These cases all show that the Ecclesiastical Court will exercise jurisdiction over wills concocted in fraud. There is no case in which, after probate, a legatee was held, on the ground of fraud in obtaining the will, to be a trustee for a party rejected by the testator. Numerous cases of that sort, in which equity declined to interfere, have been referred to, but no one found in which the Court did interfere. Kennell v. Abbott, and Campbell v. French, were cases upon construction of the wills. In Barnesly v. Povel a distinction was taken between fraud in obtaining a will and fraud in obtaining the probate, which is a circumstance to show that the jurisdiction in equity does not attach to the former; and the principle of the distinction is illustrated by the late case of Godrich v. Jones (5 Moore's P. C. C.), and Bullin v. Barry (1 Curtis, 614).

Mr. Kindersley in reply.

The Ecclesiastical Court has jurisdiction to declare what a man's will is, but not its effect—that belongs to the civil courts. The jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court ceases with the grant of probate—the temporal courts then take jurisdiction. The Ecclesiastical Court requires these three ingredients essential to a will: 1st. The testamentary capacity; 2d. The fact of execution of the will; and 3d. The animus ita or sic testandi (2 Blacks. Com. 494), and where these are found, the probate must issue. But this does not prevent the Court of Chancery from holding a person who fraudulently takes a legacy under the will to be a trustee for another, who, but for the fraud, would have obtained the legacy. The probate would stand good notwithstanding the interposition of equity. If the ani-[201]-mus testandi, which the Ecclesiastical Court must find to exist, is produced by misrepresentation, that is a species of fraud over which that court has no jurisdiction; finding the animus or intention existing, however produced, it must grant probate.

[The Lord Chancellor.—Granted, that Courts of Equity have jurisdiction where the courts of law, or courts spiritual cannot do justice; is this a case in which the Ecclesiastical Court could not do justice? Again, suppose the Spiritual Court has jurisdiction, but the party omits to avail himself of it, has the Court of Equity jurisdiction there also?]

Yes; the dicta which have been cited from the text books to shew that the Ecclesiastical Court has the jurisdiction, are quotations from one another, and are founded on cases which do not apply here, as Andrews v. Powys (2 Bro. P.C. 504), Ex parte Fearon (5 Ves. 633), Bodmin v. Roberts; the same case as James v. Greaves (2 P. Wms. 270). The other cases that were cited to show that the Court of Chancery refused to interfere after probate, will be all found, on examination, to be cases in which the question was whether the will was the will of the testator, as Archer v. Mosse (2 Vern. 8), Plume v. Beale (1 P. Wms. 388), Stevenson v. Gardiner (2 P. Wms. 286), Kerrich v. Bransby (7 Bro. P.C. 437), Bennett v. Vade (2 Atk. 324), Gingell v. Horne (9 Sim. 539), Barnesly v. Powel (1 Ves., sen. 284), Podmore v. Gunning (7 Sim. 644).

There is no case among those cited from the Ecclesiastical Courts, which shows that they have jurisdiction to refuse probate in a case like this. In Micklin v. Franklin, and other cases cited in Fawcett v. Jones (3 Phill. 461), the codicil was written by mistake on the wrong will; there was no animus sic testandi; over mistakes like that, [202] and those that occurred in Billinghurst v. Vickers (1 Phill. 187), Nicholls v. Nicholls (2 Phill. 180), Castell v. Tagg (1 Curtis, 298), and In re Shuttleworth (id., 911), it is not denied that the Court of Probate has and exercises jurisdiction. Grindall v. Grindall (4 Hagg. 10) was a peculiar case, but it bears on this case only as to the extent of the exception to the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court. The papers in a case of Butterfield v. Scaven in 1775 have been procured, but are too voluminous to extract any thing from them, except that it appears that the Court decided against the will propounded, and the case went to the Court of Delegates. Although Sir J. Nichol assumed jurisdiction in that case, that is no authority for holding that the jurisdiction in Equity, and of this House also, is ousted in cases of fraud. In the absence of authority either way, the Ecclesiastical Courts will bow to the decision of this House in favour of the jurisdiction in Equity, especially as the Courts Ecclesiastical are not well adapted to deal with questions of fraud.

(At the close of his reply he read, by direction of the House, some of the allegations and extracts from the judgment of Sir H. Jenner in this case,* but he was [203]

* The following are condensed extracts from his judgment, pronounced the 20th of July, 1840.

"The deceased was between seventy-seven and seventy-eight years of age; he left a widow, who was his second wife, and a daughter, Mrs. Evans, who resided with him, separate from her husband. It appears that he had, and retained up almost to the day of his death, a strong affection for the members of his family at East Chinnock, especially for Robert Allen (the appellant) and his brother. There was no provision in the will for William Allen, the deceased's reputed son; but it appears from the evidence that the £10,000 given to Mrs. Evans was a provision for him.

"There is no dispute as to the will and the other codicils; the sole question is, whether the codicil of the 2d of October, 1837, is, or is not entitled to probate. The party opposing the codicil is R. Allen; his brother and sister do not appear in the cause, though a decree has gone out against them, and they will be bound by the decision. R. Allen, who has thought it his interest to oppose the codicil, has appeared and sued in forma pauperis, and has had a proctor and a counsel assigned to him, under whose advice his cause has been ably conducted; and although I differ from not able to point out any passage shewing that the appellant was confined, in the Ecclesiastical Court, to objections affecting the ninth codicil as an entire instrument, [204] as alleged in his bill. The counsel for the respondents were informed, by the Lord Chancellor, that the House [205] would hear any observations which they would the prayer to pronounce against the validity of this codicil, I cannot come to the conclusion that the opposition to this testamentary paper was wholly unauthorized, that there were not circumstances which led the party to oppose this codicil, and in some degree to justify the proceeding adopted in the cause.

"I have already stated that the deceased had expressed a very great regard for his relations in the country; and had shown an intention to benefit them by several testamentary acts before October 1837, and it naturally must have been to R. Allen a matter of surprise and of strong feeling, after he had been led by deceased to believe, down to the spring of 1837, that he had been provided for by the will, to find that his interest under the will had been reduced to the receipt of the dividends of £800 consols; and I cannot but think that some inquiry into the manner in which this was brought about was perfectly open to the party.

"It seems that W. Allen, the reputed son of the deceased, was appointed an executor of the will in August 1837, and was not before then named in the testamentary papers. It did appear to the Court somewhat extraordinary that his name should not have appeared in the will, and that no provision should have been made for him; and it was not till on an examination of an answer to an interrogatory put to the solicitor of the testator, the Court found that a sum was set apart for W. Allen, the £10,000 which was given to the daughter, on an understanding between her and the deceased that it should be given to W. Allen, in order to save the legacy duty of ten per cent., or some other purpose. I mention this circumstance because it was argued that nothing could be more disinterested than the conduct of W. Allen, as he has no interest under the will to advance the cause of Mrs. Evans, so that he would derive no benefit from the confirmation of the codicil which diminished the interest given to R. Allen by the previous testamentary acts of the deceased. But it turns out that he is interested in this sum of £10,000, his receipt of which is to depend upon the fulfilment of the conditions and understanding between the father and daughter, for she is to have the disposal of this fund for the benefit of W. Allen: and when I find that both these parties, according to the evidence, are living together, and keeping up a joint establishment, it does not place W. Allen in the position in which he would have stood if he had been totally independent of any interest.

"There appears to have been always a jealousy between W. Allen and Mrs. Evans, and the Somersetshire relations; and this jealousy was naturally inflamed by information as to the contents of the will and codicils, by which so considerable an interest was given to R. Allen and to his brother and sister.

"I now come to the part of the case which led immediately to the execution of the codicil. I have stated that the deceased had had contradictory reports relating to his Somersetshire relations, and he was annoyed by the letters he received; and in consequence of this annoyance, and of the reports, W. Allen, who was at Tunbridge Wells, was summoned by the deceased's desire, for it is established by the evidence that it was by the desire and direction of the deceased that he was sent for to come up to London: and he then received instructions from the deceased to go into Somersetshire, as he represents, for the purpose of making inquiry into the conduct and character of the Somersetshire relations, and reporting thereon to the deceased. This must have been the purpose for which he was sent. When I look to the evidence and see that on his return he makes to the deceased a written report of information as the result of his inquiries, unless I suppose the deceased to have been in a state of incapacity, unable to understand the report, I must believe that this was the purpose for which he was sent down, and that in consequence of the information thus given to him, he proceeded to the execution of the codicil before the Court.

"A great deal has been said on the subject of this report. On the one hand, it is said that the report was not the result of inquiry; that there is no evidence to show that there was any inquiry made by W. Allen; on the contrary, it is said, that by the evidence it appears that before he came to the place he made certain charges against R. Allen, which are spoken to by one of the witnesses. But it is argued, on the other wish to make on the matter just read ; they said that they heard nothing read requiring observation.)

[206] The case stood over for consideration ; and towards the end of the session 1846 it was set down for judgment, but the learned lords who heard the arguments, finding [207] that they differed in opinion, further postponed the consideration of it.

hand, that there could not be any doubt that the report made to the deceased was the result of inquiries, and amongst other things it is said that the Court would presume so from the res gesta; and although witnesses have not been called from whom W. Allen received such information, the Court would presume that the information was the result of inquiry, and prima facie that the representation was consistent with the information so obtained. I confess, in a case of this description, I think the Court is not entitled to assume anything. If the party has pleaded the fact that he went down to obtain information, and that on his return he stated to the deceased (as he pleads) the result of his inquiries, I think, in order to entitle him to the benefit of the report, he ought to examine the witnesses from whom he obtained the information, and that the Court is not to infer anything for the benefit of a party who has an opportunity of proving the facts, and does not examine witnesses to sustain them. I think it is no answer to say that the other party, knowing what the facts were, and the persons from whom the information was obtained, ought to have examined witnesses if he intended to dispute the veracity or correctness of the information. I apprehend that the party who pleads it, is the party who is to prove it, and it is too much to ask the Court to assume that the plea is true because the other party has not brought evidence to impeach it. But be the matter of the report true or false, a report was made to the deceased, and a letter was written on the return of W. Allen to London to his father, and the letter does particularly advert to the conduct of the party, and the deceased does adopt the information, and acts upon it. True it is, Mrs. Allen has said, that although the report was read to the deceased, she does not consider that he could understand it; though he smiled and appeared satisfied when he heard the report; and he wished her to read it, but she would not read it, and W. Allen read it aloud: and there can be no doubt the report was read to him, and he acted upon the report when the execution of the codicil took place.

"Then the question comes to this, what was the state of the deceased's capacity at the time when this report was made to him? The deceased deals with the matter; the report is read to him, and reference is made to it in an indorsement made by the deceased himself; and the Court, unless it were satisfied that the deceased was in a state of incapacity, must conclude that a report so made would naturally lead to the execution of a codicil founded upon it. I think the party is not altogether placed in the situation he ought to be, that of having the witnesses produced, instead of these charges being made behind his back: nevertheless, if the deceased thought proper to place such a power in the hands of W. Allen, and adopted the information which he laid before him, the Court cannot disturb a codicil which proceeded from the testator in consequence of a report so made to him.

"With regard to the state of the capacity of the deceased at the time the information was given to him, the counsel on behalf of R. Allen has relied upon the evidence given by Mrs. Allen, who says she believes he was not capable of understanding the report or the codicil; but her evidence is not sufficient to satisfy the Court that his mind did not go with the act, and to entitle it to say that he did not understand the contents of this codicil.

"The preparation of the codicil was from instructions received from W. Allen, it is said, without any direction from the deceased himself; but Mrs. Allen says that W. Allen read over the report to the deceased, and the deceased adopted it, and this codicil is in conformity with the report, though there is no proof of any positive direction from the deceased; but it is proved beyond doubt that the codicil was read over twice to him, and he objected to the legacy given to Thomas Allen of £200, but at the intercession of Mrs. Evans he suffered it to remain as part of the codicil; and Mrs. Allen was present, and did not interfere to prevent the execution of the codicil, or represent that the deceased was not in a proper state of mind to perform the act. The medical gentleman who attended the deceased a year and a half before he died, says that he was of perfectly sound mind, memory, and understanding, up to the Lord Lyndhurst (July 20).—The case of the appellant is that the revocation by the ninth codicil of the bequests in his favour, was produced by the false and fraudulent representations made to the testator respecting his character and conduct; that these were made for the purpose of imposing upon the testator, whose faculties were impaired by age and disease, and who became the victim of this imposition.

The first question to be considered is the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court in a case of this nature. Would such a case, if established by evidence to the satisfaction of that tribunal, be a sufficient ground for refusing the probate? Upon this point no doubt can, I think, be entertained. "If a testator be circumvented by fraud, the testament loseth its force" (Swinb., part i., sec. 3, plac. 32). There cannot be a stronger instance of fraud than a false representation respecting the character of an individual to a weak old man, for the purpose of inducing him to revoke a bequest made in favour of the person so calumniated. The case of Grindall v. Grindall (4 Hagg. 10), before Sir J. Nicholl, was founded upon a charge of this description; and though the Court decided against the plaintiff, that decision proceeded upon the failure of the plaintiff's proof, and not upon any doubt of the authority and duty of the Court, if the charge had been established, to refuse the probate. In the course of his judg-[208]-ment, Sir J. Nicholl observed, that "the argument was that the testator's intention of excluding John Grindall, and giving the property to Captain Sturt, was produced in the mind of the deceased by fraud and contrivance practised upon him." "I cannot," he said, "for one moment, hesitate, after reading the evidence, in holding that the fraud is not proved (and where fraud is charged it must be proved); but on the contrary, I think the probability is most decidedly and infinitely more strong on the other side, viz., that the alteration in the deceased's intention was not produced by any fraudulent practice on the part of Captain Sturt; because it is quite clearly proved that the deceased did intend to exclude John Grindall as early as the 7th November."

We were furnished, by the kindness of Dr. Lushington, during the argument with a reference to a similar case, Butterfield v. Scawen, decided in 1775. The question there was whether a will had been revoked in consequence of fraud and imposition practised on the testator. The fraud consisted in a false representation made to the testator, that the woman, who was the principal legatee, had attempted to poison him, and that in consequence of this representation he had revoked the bequest in her favour. That learned judge entertained no doubt as to the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court to refuse probate, and upon sufficient proof of the facts charged, that it would be its duty to do so. Sir H. J. Fust, who was also consulted, expressed himself thus:—"If it should appear, as in the case stated by your Lordships, that an old and infirm testator who had bequeathed a legacy to A. B., had been induced by false and fraudulent representations with reference to the conduct of A. B., made to him for the purpose by C. D., to make a subsequent codicil revoking that bequest, and substituting for it a much smaller legacy, the effect of which would be to give a larger share of the re-[209]-sidue to C. D. than he otherwise would take, I conceive that the Ecclesiastical Court would not, under such circumstances, grant probate of such revoking codicil, provided it should be clearly established in point of evidence that such act and intention were produced by such false and fraudulent representations."

I think therefore your Lordships will be of opinion that this is a case coming distinctly within the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court, and in which, if the charge were established, it would be the duty of that Court to refuse the probate. It did, in fact, come before that tribunal; the parties were heard, and probate was granted.

10th of November, and fully capable of executing a codicil, or of doing any other act of business; and there are other witnesses who come to the same conclusion, and the Court has no reason to doubt the truth of their deposition. There is nothing to satisfy the Court that the deceased was not perfectly capable of understanding the report, and of giving instructions for this codicil, which was the necessary result of it.

"On the whole of this part of the case, therefore, I am of opinion that the validity of the codicil is fully established, and that the parties are entitled to probate of it, with the will and the other codicils."

It is stated in the bill, "that the appellant was confined in the Prerogative Court to grounds of objection which affected the codicil as an entire instrument, and was not permitted to go into the case stated in the bill, or into any other case solely relating to the parts of the codicil which affected only the appellant." The grounds of this alleged decision of the Court are not stated; it may have proceeded from the manner in which the plaintiff shaped his case, from the form of the allegations, or from the nature of the evidence.

It is perfectly clear that the Ecclesiastical Court may admit a part of an instrument to probate, and refuse it as to the rest. There are numerous cases to this effect, as Billinghurst v. Vickers (1 Phillimore, 187), Barton v. Robins (3 Phillimore, 455, note). It is, in fact, the constant practice of the Court; but if an error has been committed in this or any other respect, which I am very far from supposing, that would not be a ground for coming to a Court of Equity. The matter should have been set right upon appeal. But the present is an attempt to review the decision of the Court of probate, not by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the proper tribunal for that purpose, but by the Court of Chancery. I [210] think this cannot be done. It was formerly, indeed, considered that fraud in obtaining a will might be investigated and redressed in a Court of Equity; but that doctrine has long since been overruled. In the case of Bennet v. Vade (2 Atk. 324), Lord Hardwicke states that "it has been settled ever since the case of Powis v. Andrews (2 Bro. P. C. 504), upon an appeal from Lord Macclesfield's decree, February 6th, 1723, to the House of Lords, that a will cannot be set aside for fraud and imposition here (in Chancery), because a will of personal estate may be set aside in the Ecclesiastical Court for fraud, and of real estate, at law." There are other cases to the same effect before the same learned judge (Lord Hardwicke), as Webb v. Claverden (2 Atk. 424), and in Barnesly v. Powell (1 Ves., sen. 287), where the probate had been obtained by fraud, he observed that, "however formerly doubted, it is now settled by the Lords, in Kerrich v. Bransby (7 Bro. P. C. 437), that this Court (of Chancery) cannot set aside a will of personal estate for fraud." "I will not," he adds, "infringe upon what is laid down there, and in Powis v. Andrews." "But there is a material difference," he continues, "between this Court taking upon itself to set aside a will of personal estate on account of fraud or forgery in obtaining or making that will, and taking from the party the benefit of a will established in the Ecclesiastical Court by his fraud, not upon the testator, but upon the person disinherited thereby and claiming after the testator's death against it. Fraud in obtaining a will infects the whole; but the case of a will, of which the probate was obtained by fraud on the next of kin, is of another consideration." The case of Jones v. Frost (3 Madd. 1), and of Jones v. Jones (3 Meriv. 161), are to the same effect. So in Archer [211] v. Mosse (2 Vern. 8n), which was a very gross case of imposition on a sick and weak man, the Lord Chancellor observed that while the probate stood, this matter was not examinable in Chancery; and though, as the reporter observes, the fraud was fully proved and opened to him, he would not have any proof read, but dismissed the bill. In Plume v. Beale (1 P. Wms. 388) it was alleged that a legacy in favour of the defendant had been interlined by her after the will was executed. A bill was brought to be relieved against this legacy. The will had been proved in the Ecclesiastical Court, with the legacy. The Lord Chancellor (Lord Cowper) said the will should have been proved with a reservation of this legacy; the remedy must be there, and the bill was dismissed.

It was contended that, although this Court cannot set aside the codicil for the fraud and imposition practised upon the testator, it can effect the same object indirectly by declaring the defendants trustees for the plaintiff; but if the fraud was cognizable by the Ecclesiastical Court, and would, if established, have been a ground for refusing the probate, to adopt the course suggested would be in effect, as I have already observed, to make the Court of Chancery a Court of appeal from the Ecclesiastical Court, a course the more objectionable in the present instance, the case having been decided after a full hearing by that Court. In the case of Kerrich v. Bransby [7 Bro. P.C. 437], referred to by Lord Hardwicke, which was a case of fraud and imposition in obtaining a will, it was argued on the part of the appellant, in this House, as in the present case, that the probate in the Ecclesiastical Court was not impeached by the decree, though the appellant was restricted, as in justice it was said he ought to be, from taking any beneficial interest under it, and such indeed was the effect of the decree; this House, however, reversed the decision. Doubts [212] have been suggested as to the grounds of the reversal; but Lord Hardwicke, who held the Great Seal within a few years after the decision was pronounced, expressly states that it was reversed upon the point of jurisdiction. Such has always been the understanding of the Profession; and in Ex parte Fearon the Lord Chancellor observes (5 Ves. 647) that the determination in Kerrich v. Bransby, was "that this Court cannot take cognizance of wills of personal estate as to matter of fraud."

There are cases, undoubtedly, in which the Court has declared the legatee or executor to be a trustee for others, as in the case of Thynn v. Thynn (1 Vern. 296), where the defendant induced his mother, by false representations, to prevail on the testator to name him sole executor to his will, declaring that he would only be an executor in trust for her. This, the reporter observes, being a fraud, as also a trust, the Lord Keeper declared it for the plaintiff. Marriot v. Marriot (Gilb. Cas. in Cha. 203) has been much relied upon as containing the opinion of Chief Baron Gilbert upon the subject. The judgment was not delivered, but I lay no stress upon that circumstance. The Chief Baron mentions three cases in which a Court of Equity "may declare a trust upon a will according to the real intention of a testator, although it be not contained in the will itself: first, where the drawer of a will inserts his own name instead of the name of the legatee; no doubt," he adds, "he would be a trustee for the real legatee." But if probate were refused in such a case on account of the fraud, the real legatee would lose his legacy. The other two cases which he puts are not cases of fraud, but of trust, the one express, the other implied, and do not affect the present question.

In the case of Kennell v. Abbott (4 Ves. 802), the testatrix gave an estate to her brother, in trust to sell, and out of the [213] monies arising therefrom to pay her husband, Edward Lovell, the sum of £150. Edward Lovell was not her husband, but she believed him to be so up to the period of her death. He had been previously married to another woman, who was living at the time of his marriage with the testatrix. The legacy was given to him as her husband; that could alone, as Lord Alvanley observed, be supposed the motive of the bounty. The legacy, therefore, failed. This was a question of construction, and upon a trust, and came properly within the jurisdiction of a court of equity.

In the case of Barnesly v. Powel (1 Ves., sen. 284), the probate was obtained by fraud, and Lord Hardwicke drew the distinction to which I have already adverted, between a fraud on the testator and a fraud practised after his death in obtaining the probate. He thought, in the latter case, the Court might declare the party a trustee. This, he said, was a ground of jurisdiction in the Court distinct from the will itself. The distinction taken is decisive as to the opinion of Lord Hardwicke, that in a case like the present—a case of alleged fraud practised on the testator himself—the Court of Chancery could not take cognizance of the matter and apply a remedy by means of a trust. If this, indeed, could properly be done it would follow that in none of the numerous cases to which I have referred, ought the bill to have been dismissed. The attempt was made in Kerrich v. Bransby (7 Bro. P.C. 437). The bill prayed that the will might be cancelled, but this part of the prayer was not adopted in the decree, which merely directed that the legatee should account to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff should be at liberty to use his name to get in the personal estate; in effect treating him as a trustee. This House resisted the encroachment and reversed the decree. [214] In the case of Segrave v. Kirwan (1 Beat. 157), the Ecclesiastical Court could not, upon the question of probate, have applied the proper remedy. The testator intended Kirwan to be his executor, but did not intend that he should take anything under the will. The question in Podmore v. Gunning (7 Sim. 644) had reference to an express trust. The case of Bulkley v. Wilford (2 Clark and Fin 102) has no application to the present case.

I will conclude by observing generally, that I think it will be found upon examining the cases in which this Court has declared a legatee or executor to be a trustee for other persons, that they have been either questions of construction, or cases in which the party had been named a trustee, or had engaged to take as such, or in which the Court of Probate could afford no adequate or proper remedy. If there be any decision that goes beyond this, I must, with all deference, be permitted to doubt its correctness. I will only add, that if the rule, which I have stated, be an inconvenient one, still, if it has been sanctioned by this House, the Court below was bound by it, and your Lordships alone can apply a remedy.

The Lord Chancellor.—I very much regret the necessity which I am under of differing from the conclusion to which my noble and learned friend has come in this case. It is a case of extreme importance; for if your Lordships should affirm the judgment pronounced by the Court of Chancery, in my opinion, the jurisdiction of the Courts of Equity, as it has been administered from all time, will be most materially affected.

My Lords, this is upon a demurrer, and I am therefore under the necessity of calling to your Lordships' recollection, that what may be said to have passed as to matters [215] of fact, or as to the course to be pursued by other Courts, cannot be attended to beyond what appears upon the face of the bill. Now this bill states that the codicil not only affects the interest of the party, the appellant, but provides various other legacies and arrangements for other parties, and then it states, that the Ecclesiastical Court granted probate to the party named as executor after an attempt by the appellant to prevent such probate being granted on the ninth codicil, on the ground that the testator was of unsound mind at the time of the execution, and that undue influence had been exercised upon the mind of the testator in procuring such execution; and then it proceeds to state, that in the suit which arose in the Prerogative Court, touching the validity of the ninth codicil, the appellant was confined by the Court to the grounds of objection which affected the codicil as an entire instrument, and was not permitted to go into the case stated in the bill, or into any other case solely relating to the parts of such codicil which affected only him.

Now, my Lords, whether that statement be in fact correct or not, we are bound upon this demurrer to consider it as an accurate representation of what passed. There is therefore in this case a judgment of the Ecclesiastical Court, that it cannot enter into the question which affects the right of this appellant. It states the attempt to have been made, and the attempt to have been objected to by the Court, and the Court to have proceeded upon this ground only, that it could not listen to any objection as to any particular provision in the codicil, but that it was bound only to look at objections which went to the validity of the codicil itself. The case of fraud stated upon this bill I must assume to be capable of proof, and if proved it is sufficient to give the plaintiff right to relief somewhere. It states a prior provision largely made for his benefit, and a codicil obtained from the testator by contrivance, [216] conspiracy, and misrepresentation, which had the effect of procuring and producing this ninth codicil, which was a revocation of those benefits which were intended for the appellant. The facts therefore stated are that in the Ecclesiastical Court there is no remedy; that an attempt has been made to obtain a remedy, and that the attempt has failed upon a rule, which, according to the statement made upon the face of this bill, the Court acted upon—that it could not interfere in any question affecting any particular part of the codicil, but only in one affecting the whole of the codicil. That is so stated, and those who know the meaning of a demurrer, must know, that that is a statement from which none of the parties can depart.

Now, if that which is stated be taken as the fact, and if there be no remedy in the Ecclesiastical Court, and if (because we are not sitting here as reviewing any proceeding of the Ecclesiastical Court, and are not competent so to do) we are to say that the Court of Chancery has no jurisdiction to investigate this matter of imputed fraud, where is the plaintiff's remedy? It is obvious that he has none. If the Ecclesiastical Court has come to a wrong decision, and if that decision is capable of being reviewed, is that a reason why a Court of Equity should not interfere? The whole confusion appears to me to result from this, that the two proceedings are confounded, which are in their nature perfectly and entirely distinct. The Court of Chancery has nothing to do with a probate, or with the enquiry whether a certain paper be the will of the testator or not, it never interferes in such a matter. In those early cases to which my noble and learned friend referred, it did interfere, but it does not now interfere with questions which are questions solely for the consideration of the Ecclesiastical Court. But when the Ecclesiastical Court has vested in an individual the legal title to property, by granting him probate, then the Court of Chancery assumes that jurisdiction which belongs to it [217] over all titles, over all interests, over all estates, where a proper case arises of attaching a trust upon that individual. It does so with land, it does so with money, it does so with every species of property.

If a testator were to devise land to trustees under circumstances which would create a resulting trust for an heir at law in equity, so as to entitle him to the benefit of it, would it be any answer to a bill filed by the heir claiming the resulting trust from the devisees to say, "you are quite wrong; to be sure the devisees have recovered in ejectment, they have got possession of the land, but it is all wrong; and if you try it over again, it will be found that there is no proper devise to the trustees, and therefore you must go to law to try whether the devise to the trustees be good or bad. If the devise be bad, the trial which has taken place was not a good trial, and the result is such a result as in law it ought not to be; there is no devise, do not therefore come here to a Court of Equity to ask for a decree declaring a resulting trust, because a Court of Law is the place where questions arising upon real estate are to be tried; go there, and see whether you cannot get rid of the devise." If the case stood thus, I apprehend that to any person, who knows any thing of the Court of Equity, it would appear perfectly ridiculous. But I would beg leave to ask, where is the difference? The only difference is this, that the Courts which decide upon real estate in questions of land are the Common Law Courts of the country. Here the Court which has decided upon the legal estate under the probate is the Ecclesiastical Court. In both the one case and the other, the decision is, as to the legal title, totally and entirely unconnected with that which is the province of the Court of Equity only, namely, a proper case of trust in a legal estate.

If this were a new case, if cases had not occurred, over and over again, from the earliest time, in the Court of [218] Chancery, there might be some difficulty perhaps in persuading your Lordships to agree to it as being the practice of the Court of Equity, but from the earliest time it has been the practice of the Court.

And now I will just observe upon one point which arises upon the face of the bill. Certain learned doctors of eminence, whose opinions upon the cases which they decide are entitled to the highest consideration, seem to have been consulted, not upon this demurrer, but upon some abstract propositions, and thence they appear to have inferred that the Ecclesiastical Courts are competent not only to grant or refuse, or recall probate of the whole codicil, but to recall probate so far as it may affect a particular part of the codicil. My Lords, I am not disposed to controvert that, though it is not at all necessary in the present case to give an opinion upon it; but this I know, that if it be the rule, it infinitely multiplies the number of cases against the decision now under appeal, because in every case where a trust has attached upon a probate, there must of course always have been a decision of the Ecclesiastical Court upon the legal title. In all those cases therefore, whether affecting the whole instrument or affecting a part of the instrument only, according to the opinions which we have heard from my noble and learned friend, there would be a probate and a power within the Ecclesiastical Court of deciding the particular point which a Court of Equity has been called upon to decide. So that if that be so, and I am not disposed to controvert it, all the cases in the books, in which a trust has attached upon a fraudulent bequest, are authorities where a Court of Equity has intervened, although the Ecclesiastical Court might have intervened; when I say that, I say that my noble and learned friend might have brought hundreds of cases against the conclusion to which he has come, because he has confused the difference which in some cases is taken between an objection to a part of a testamentary instrument [219] and an objection to the whole testamentary instrument.

My Lords in order to show that this distinction is not new, and that the rule of law which I have to submit to your Lordships' consideration is not of modern invention, I must refer to one or two authorities in which that distinction is taken, a distinction which is no longer available, because all the cases now would be authorities against the non-interference of a Court of Equity, because, in all cases the Court of Probate would have the power of interfering in the transaction. Lord Redesdale says (Treat. on Plead. 257, 4th edit.), "Where the fraud practised has not gone to the whole will, but only to some particular clause; or if fraud has been practised to obtain the consent of next of kin to the probate, the courts of equity have laid hold of these circumstances to declare the executor a trustee for the next of kin."

That is the deliberate opinion of Lord Redesdale, which has been received by the profession ever since it was published; and it is not a new opinion of Lord Redesdale's, because he refers to the argument, not the judgment (for it was not delivered), of Chief Baron Gilbert, an argument intended for a judgment, and which he printed with his reports (Gilb. Cas. in Cha. 203). He says, "Courts of Equity may, in notorious cases, declare a legatee, who has obtained a legacy by fraud, to be a trustee for another, as if the drawer of a will should insert his own name instead of the name of a legatee, no doubt he would be a trustee for the real legatee: and nobody has thought that the declaring a trust in those cases is an infringement upon the Ecclesiastical jurisdiction."

As the cases are all to be found in the printed report of this case (1 Phil. 133); I will not occupy your Lordships' time by referring to many cases, in which the principle is laid down which has been acted upon by the Court; but I beg to call attention to the distinction between this case and the objection which is made, that this would make a Court of Equity a Court of review, or a Court of appeal from the Ecclesiastical Court. If the Court of Chancery were to take upon itself to do now what it did formerly, to declare a will or codicil void upon the ground of fraud, no doubt it would be exercising the same jurisdiction as the Ecclesiastical Court exercises, and it would be open to that objection, but it never now attempts to do any such thing. The present bill is not founded upon any such principle, it asks no such relief. It gives credit, as it is bound to do, to the act of the Ecclesiastical Court, which has clothed the executors with the power of executors, and given them a legal title to the property, and all that the bill asks is that upon the proof (and we are now upon the assumption of the proof of the facts as stated) of the facts alleged upon the face of the bill, those persons who had so obtained that ninth codicil by fraud may not be permitted to enjoy the property themselves, but may be declared to hold it as trustees for those persons who would have been entitled to it if that fraud had not been practised.

Some of your Lordships are extremely well acquainted with the practice of the Court of Chancery, and I would ask whether we are now to repudiate the doctrine that Courts of Equity will attach trusts upon fraudulent wills; because, if this judgment be affirmed, it will be impossible, particularly now, after the distinction between whole testamentary papers in cases of fraud, and particular provisions in testamentary papers, to maintain that doctrine. Upon what principle can a Court of Equity hereafter say that a legatee is trustee for another? The answer will be at once, that "The House of Lords has decided in the case of a particular legacy, being one among other provisions: we will not look at the fraud, we exercise no jurisdiction over it, because you may go to the Ecclesiastical Court, although that Court has decided against you; we think the Ecclesiastical Court is wrong, if the facts you have stated are true, but you must go to some Superior Court of appeal from the Ecclesiastical Court and get yourself righted." First of all, we have nothing to do with the Ecclesiastical Court: we are not going to review their proceedings. What your Lordships are now asked to do is to administer justice as a Court of Equity to a party, who, upon the facts stated, is clearly entitled to it, and who states that the tribunal which has been applied to has refused, and the Court of Chancery is to refuse its assistance because another court ought to have done it, and has not. My Lords, the jurisdictions are totally distinct; the Ecclesiastical Court cannot do what the plaintiff is asking the Court of Chancery to do. The Ecclesiastical Court may, possibly, indirectly produce the same effect; it may refuse the probate, or, by a process of which I have yet to learn the details, it may strike out of the codicil a particular provision. But if that Court has that jurisdiction—if it has that power—that is not to deprive the Court of Equity of another jurisdiction, and another power founded upon totally different principles; and were that to be done the very foundation of the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery would be gone, because the legal estate would be disposed of before the Court of Chancery intervened; but so long as the legal estate remains—so long as there is a title existing in a party under the decree of the Ecclesiastical Court which is adverse to the claim under the will, and which claim ought to prevail against him, if the case set up by the other parties is true,—so long as that circumstance exists, it is, and has been, from the earliest times, the province and jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery to attach a trust upon that estate so obtained by fraud; if that description of fraud be established, it is yet the duty of the Court of Equity to say,

"What you have [222] got you shall not keep, because you have obtained it by fraud; or even if you show it to be by a legal title which we cannot touch, we will take care that you shall not hold it for your own benefit, but as trustee for those who have been wrongfully deprived of it."

If I were to go through the whole of the cases which have been referred to, they would all and every one come to the same result; whether they apply to the whole or to parts of instruments, there is no distinction to be made. In every case where there has been a legal title derived from the Ecclesiastical Court; in every case where the plaintiff has succeeded, the Court has upon that legal estate, so established by the Ecclesiastical Court, fastened a trust and given the benefit to those who are entitled to it.

Upon these grounds I regret to say that I am obliged to differ from the motion of my noble and learned friend.

Lord Brougham.—I have, as it was my duty to do, very fully considered this case, upon which my two noble and learned friends have differed, and I have come to a conclusion against the decision at the Rolls, and in favour of the decision in the Court of Chancery. If I am wrong in the opinion at which I have arrived, I shall deeply lament it; for the question, I admit, is one of no common importance. But at least I have the satisfaction of feeling in my own mind assured that if I am in error, I have not fallen into it lightly, for I have most deliberately considered the case both in respect to the arguments, which were held at the bar, and to the authorities which were cited: and I have also taken to my assistance in this case, which is a case of some difficulty and of much importance, the lights given by the conclusions of the learned judges of the Ecclesiastical Court, to which reference has been made by my noble and learned friend who first addressed the House. I now, therefore, come prepared to give my opinion differing from my noble and learned friend [223] who spoke last, and agreeing with my noble and learned friend who preceded him, in favour of the judgment under review, the judgment of the Court of Chancery.

I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend who spoke last, and nobody can doubt it, that being here deciding upon demurrer to a bill, we are to take the bill as containing a true statement of the facts; we are bound to assume that all those facts are as they are set forth in the bill, because a demurrer, from its very nature and effect, admits the facts and says, "What then; you have no right to your remedy!" But my noble and learned friend seemed to me to carry the argument rather too far; he stated that the bill set forth not only that in the Court of Probate the party was not permitted to enter into the case stated in the bill, or into any other matter relating exclusively to those parts of the codicil which affected the plaintiff alone, but was confined by the Court to those grounds of objection which affected the codicil as a whole: and my noble and learned friend appeared to me, as I understood him, to go a little further than he was warranted in doing, and to have assumed the fact that the Court had not the power of doing that which the bill complains it refused to do, and the complaint of which refusal is the ground of appeal by way of a bill in equity.

Now it is one thing to say that the bill states a fact which we are bound by the demurrer to admit, viz., that the Court below did in point of fact confine the plaintiff to the objections to the codicil as one entire instrument: It is one thing to say that which I do not deny, and it is a very different thing to say that not only did the Court of Probate in fact refuse relief, and confined him within those particular limits, but that the Court was right in so doing, and had no means of doing otherwise. The Court of Probate is not alleged in the bill to have been right in so doing, or to have had no power of doing otherwise; the Court is only alleged in point of fact to have refused to [224] allow the plaintiff to go into his objections to particular parts of the codicil, that is all.

But I will go a step further, and I will suppose that the bill had alleged, which it does not, that the Court of Probate had no power to allow the plaintiff to go into that case, but was bound by the law of the court of Probate to confine itself to the objections to the codicil as one entire instrument. I do not think that the demurrer can be understood to admit that point of law. A demurrer admits facts, such as that the Court of Probate refused relief, but a demurrer never admits points of law, such as that the Court of Probate was right in that refusal. Take the demurrer, therefore, in either way, whether as admitting in point of fact (and you are bound to believe the point of fact, and to assume that it is correct) or as admitting the allegation in point of law (which would be most incorrect), that the Court of Probate has no power to give any other decision than that which it gave; taking it in either way, it appears to me that the view taken by my noble and learned friend is not borne out. I do not consider it to be at all admitted that the Court of Probate had no such right. I am bound, out of respect to the Court of Probate, not to quarrel with its decision, but to believe that it decided correctly; but of this I am perfectly sure, that if the Court of Probate decided incorrectly, there was a remedy, and that remedy was by appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The remedy was not by going to the Court of Chancery.

My noble and learned friend says that the Court of Chancery is not to be considered as the Court that is to be applied to as the Court of appeal from the Court of Probate; but the course here taken amounts to nearly the same thing. In this case eight codicils gave A. B. certain benefits, and the ninth codicil, which is admitted to probate, took away those benefits; the party claiming under the first eight codicils, and whose claim is defeated by the [225] ninth (the revoking codicil) being admitted to probate, comes to the Court of Chancery and says, "Make C. D. a trustee for me." That is the way of stating it; but in substance and effect it amounts to one thing, namely, "Revoke the ninth codicil, that codicil which, revoking the first eight codicils, has been admitted to proof. I complain of the ninth codicil as having been obtained by fraud; declare that notwithstanding the ninth codicil, which revokes the first eight, I am entitled to the benefit under the first eight." That is the prayer of the bill in so many words.

Now it is admitted by all the cases, and it cannot be denied, that you cannot come to a Court of Equity to set aside a will of personalty as being obtained by fraud; if any doubt were entertained on the point, there are the cases of Plume v. Beale (1 P. Wms. 388), and Kerrich v. Bransby (7 Bro. P. C. 358),—which last is entitled to great consideration from the fact that Lord Macclesfield, who decided it, appears to have differed from the decision of Lord Cowper in Plume v. Beale, and to have allowed the parties to go into a discussion for setting aside the will as obtained by fraud; but when that case came before the House of Lords Lord Macclesfield's decision was reversed.

Much has been said of Kennell v. Abbott (4 Ves. 802), and of Marriot v. Marriot (1 Str. 666; Gilb. Cas. 203), which is reported by Strange and by Chief Baron Gilbert, and was a judgment of that most able judge; though I believe a judgment never delivered in Court; for the case was compromised. That therefore, pro tanto, lessens the effect of it, but still it would be a most important authority, and so would Kennell v. Abbott before Lord Alvanley, a very peculiar case according to my [226] recollection of it. The legacy in that case was bequeathed on the supposition that the party in whose favour it was given was the husband of the testatrix; it turned out that he was not, and the legacy fell into the residue. In the reports of the case,—as is observed in the judgment from which this appeal was brought,—we do not get any distinct account of what the fraud was, and I do not think therefore that it will weigh much in the present decision.

One thing may be said, no doubt, and it goes, I think, rather in favour of the decision of the Court below, and of the view taken by my noble and learned friend (Lord Lyndhurst). How, in the case of great fraud being practised by one party against another, the effect of which may be to swell the residue, is the Court of Chancery ever to get at that fraud, if probate of the instrument has been refused by the Ecclesiastical Court? That is very true, but in all such cases, if the judge of the Court of Probate sees reason to suspect that there ought to be relief in respect of fraud, a judicious mind would naturally lean towards granting probate, in order that the case might come before a Court of Equity, whereas it never could if the probate were refused. I should say that if the Court of Probate has not the power of giving relief, the judge there is bound to grant probate, in order that those who have the power may be able to exercise it, and grant redress. If the Court of Probate refuses to grant it, there is no harm done, or, at least, no harm ought to be supposed to be done, because then there is an appeal which the constitution provides, not to a Court of Equity, but to the Court of Probate in the last resort, formerly the Court of Delegates, now the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Upon these grounds (and what I have stated to your Lordships is out of the great respect I feel for both my noble and learned friends who differ from each other, and [227] on account of the importance of this case, and I have therefore gone into it at greater length than otherwise I should have done); upon these grounds I agree with my noble and learned friend [Lord Lyndhurst] that the judgment of the Court below, allowing the demurrer and reversing the order of the Master of the Rolls, ought to be affirmed.

Lord Langdale.—My Lords, without attributing to the demurrer a greater effect than it ought to have, there is upon the record, as it now stands, an admitted case of fraud—of fraud committed upon the testator, and of fraud committed upon the legatee. It does not appear to me correct to say, that the fraud was practised upon the testator only; and considering the fraud to have been practised upon both the testator and the legatee, the question is, whether a Court of Equity, after probate granted, had any authority to give relief? Being myself of opinion that such relief might be given, I overruled the demurrer when the case was heard before me. My noble and learned friend, then Lord Chancellor, being of a different opinion upon the rehearing of the case, reversed my order, and allowed the demurrer. Had the case gone no further, it would have been my duty to conform to his Lordship's decision in all future cases of a like nature; and after the case was brought to your Lordships' House, I should, if left to act according to my own inclination, have awaited your Lordships' final determination, without taking any part in the discussion. My noble and learned friend, however, who allowed the demurrer in the Court of Chancery, desired my attendance here, and though I wished to be excused, I could not obtain his leave to be absent, and I attended at the hearing of the argument, as I attend to-day, at his particular request.

Under those circumstances I have considered this case, uninfluenced entirely, I hope, by any bias in favour of my [228] formerly expressed opinion, and so far as I have been able, uninfluenced by the authority of my noble and learned friend, to which I owe so much deference and respect. Having so considered this case, I find it my duty to declare that I still continue to be of the opinion which I at first entertained, that if the alleged facts be proved, the Court of Chancery has jurisdiction in this case; that the jurisdiction is supported by cases carrying with them sufficient authority, and that the jurisdiction is most important for the suppression of a considerable class of frauds.

It has been observed that there are early cases in which the Court of Chancery took upon itself to set aside wills both of lands and of personalty, not only for fraud, but for other causes, and even because wills had not been, as the judge thought, properly made, though there had been no fraud; those cases, however, had long since been overruled. It was established by the cases of Archer v. Mosse (2 Vern. 8), Nelson v. Oldfield (2 Vern. 76), Plume v. Beale (1 P. Wms. 388), and, above all, by Kerrich v. Bransby (7 Bro. P. C. 358), that the Court of Chancery had no authority to set aside a will of personalty, and no authority to set aside a will of land without a trial at law. For many years past this position has not been questioned; but it has been sometimes argued (as it appears to me, very erroneously), that the Court of Chancery, because it has no authority to set aside wills, has, therefore, no authority to give a remedy against frauds effectuated by the means of wills. The case is far otherwise. It appears to me that the Court of Chancery has always exercised the authority of attaching trusts to legal rights, which have been obtained by fraud, so as to relieve the sufferer against the effects of such fraud. However legal rights may have been acquired, the [229] Court of Chancery has interposed its authority to repress attempts made to use them for the purposes of fraud.

After the learned arguments addressed to the House on both sides, it is not necessary to go into a minute examination of the authorities; but I will take the liberty of stating that soon after the time when Lord Macclesfield decided the case of Bransby v. Kerrich, by treating a will relating both to real and personal estate, as if the Court of Chancery would set it aside (a decision which was clearly erroneous and was by this House declared to be so); very soon after that time Lord Chief Baron Gilbert prepared the judgment, which has been referred to in Marriot v. Marriot (1 Str. 666; Gilb. Cas. in Chan. 203). That judgment appears, by the report in Gilbert's Cases, not to have been delivered, but it is fully stated, and though it was not a judgment actually delivered, yet it contains the opinion of that very eminent judge. That case gives the history of the jurisdiction in testamentary matters in a manner which I do not think any one can read without instruction; and after carefully considering several points bearing upon the case, his Lordship comes to a conclusion in conformity with the final decision in Kerrich v. Bransby. He then gives certain cases in which the Courts of Equity may grant relief, notwithstanding probate has been granted. He says, "Courts of Equity may declare the party who has obtained a legacy by fraud to be a trustee for the party who has been defrauded." But according to the argument used in support of the demurrer in this case, if the legacy was obtained by fraud, the Ecclesiastical Court has jurisdiction on that, and might grant probate of the will, with the exception of that particular legacy, and, therefore, the Court of Chancery has no jurisdiction. But this is not the doctrine or opinion of Chief Baron Gilbert; he says "the Court of Chancery may declare a legatee who has obtained a legacy by [230] fraud to be a trustee for another; as if the drawer of a will should insert his own name instead of the name of a legatee." Here it is supposed that probate has been granted by the Ecclesiastical Court, and yet the doctrine is that a court of Equity may grant relief by declaring the party a trustee. Further, he says, the Court, "to answer the real intention of the testator, may declare a trust upon such will, though it be not contained in the will itself, in these three cases: first, in that of fraud upon a legatory before mentioned; secondly, where the words imply a trust for relations, as in the case of a specific devise to executors, and no disposition of the residuum; thirdly, in the case of a legatee promising the testator to stand as a trustee for another." I conceive that the cases stated are by way of example and not in exclusion of other cases falling within the same principle, and I am not aware that the position of Lord Chief Baron Gilbert has ever been questioned till the question arose in the present case.

The case of Barnesly v. Powel (1 Ves., sen. 284), a case before Lord Hardwicke, appears to me to be a much stronger case even than Marriot v. Marriot, to show in what way a court of equity may deal with a case of fraud in these matters. It is only necessary to refer to what was done in that case; it was a case of forgery; the forgery was not quite apparent at first; the judge, therefore, sent it to trial, and, afterwards, when the forgery was established, it appeared also that there was another testamentary instrument, which might perhaps appear to be valid in the Ecclesiastical Court, so that his Lordship did not dispose of the whole matter himself, by at once declaring a trust, but, leaving it to the Ecclesiastical Court to decide whether the testamentary instrument, not appearing to be forged, was valid or not, he ordered the forged instru-[231]-ment to be brought in, and by his own jurisdiction and power over the person, and not assuming any jurisdiction to revoke or alter the probate, he ordered the party to appear in the Court of Delegates, and consent to the reversal of the sentence for granting the probate. The Court of Chancery was admitted to have no authority to set aside the sentence or the probate; yet Lord Hardwicke, upon the first hearing, before the fraud was established, with reference to the fraud, considered as then proveable, said he should not scruple decreeing that the defendant, who obtained that probate, should stand as a trustee in respect of the probate; and, afterwards, when the fraud was proved, he compelled the party to consent to the reversal of the sentence by which the probate was obtained; Lord Hardwicke desired not to interfere with the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court, and at the same time not to refuse to the suitors of the Court of Chancery the exercise of the jurisdiction by which it has in all times been so instrumental in the suppression of fraud.

The only other case to which I would call your Lordships' attention is the case of Segrave v. Kirwan (Beatty, 157), before Sir A. Hart. That was not a case of fraud, but a case of implied trust, founded on the non-performance of a duty. The same doctrine was there held, and though the question of jurisdiction, on the ground of fraud, did not arise, the opinion of Sir A. Hart on the subject is clear; and when the case was afterwards commented upon by Lord Eldon in the case of Bulkley v. Wilford (2 Clark and F. 177), it is very improbable that he should not have observed on the opinion of Sir A. Hart, in that respect, if he had thought it erroneous.

It is upon the opinion of Chief Baron Gilbert, in the case of Marriot v. Marriot [1 Str. 666, Gilb. Cas. in Ch. 203], the opinion and orders of [232] Lord Hardwicke in Barnesly v. Powel, and the opinion of Sir Anthony Hart in Segrave v. Kirwan, that I principally rely for the support of the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in the present case; they are, I think, sufficient, without referring to other authorities of less general and distinct application. It appears to me that if your Lordships should allow the present demurrer, these cases, which have not (as far as I am aware of) been hitherto impugned, will be overruled.

Lord Campbell.—I am happy to think that it is not necessary for me to occupy much of your Lordships' time, after the ample discussion which this case has undergone by my noble and learned friends who have preceded me. But upon a question of such great importance, to which I have paid the most anxious attention, I feel it my duty to state the reasons which induce me to concur in the motion of my noble and learned friend, that the decree appealed from be affirmed. I do this without, in the slightest degree, wishing to encroach upon the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery. I wish to guard against what I should consider to be an encroachment by the Court of Chancery upon the jurisdiction of another Court; for the question seems to me to be, whether an appeal from the Court of Probate shall be to the Court of Chancery or to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council?

Now, be it well understood that I give implicit credit to every fact that is stated upon the face of the bill. I know that if there be a demurrer, it admits the facts that are alleged in the bill. It admits facts that are well pleaded, but not alleged inferences of law; and it is because I give implicit credit to every thing which is stated in point of fact in this bill, that I am of opinion that in this case the Court of Chancery has no jurisdiction.

According to the allegations of the bill, the probate of the part of the codicil which concerned the plaintiff, ought [233] not to have been granted. It is not denied that the Ecclesiastical Court had jurisdiction over the subject. It is not denied that the Ecclesiastical Court might have refused to grant probate; and the distinction attempted to be drawn between the powers of the Court of Probate over a will and a part of a will, or over a whole codicil and a part of a codicil, cannot be supported.

Upon the authorities cited by my noble and learned friend (Lord Lyndhurst), it is quite clear that the Ecclesiastical Court had jurisdiction to refuse probate of that part of the codicil which affects the appellant, because giving credit to the facts stated, that part of the codicil was not the will of the testator; he was imposed upon; and probate of that part of the codicil ought to have been refused. My Lords, it appears to be so when we examine the books, as well as upon reason and common sense; but we have the authority of the two judges who now preside in the Courts of Probate, Sir Herbert Jenner Fust and Dr. Lushington, who have both been consulted in this case, and who have both favoured us with their opinions, to which I give implicit credence. They assure us that upon such facts being proved before the Ecclesiastical Court, that Court would be bound to refuse probate. Then it clearly comes to the question which my noble and learned friend stated, had the Ecclesiastical Court jurisdiction over this matter to refuse probate, and was their decree a right or wrong one?

Now I must be permitted to say that my noble and learned friend, the Lord Chancellor, argued the whole case upon the supposition that the decree of the Ecclesiastical Court in granting the probate was right,—that there was a legal estate duly conferred by that probate upon the legatee, who was claiming under the ninth codicil. But giving credit to the facts alleged in this bill, that decree was clearly erroneous. I believe, as the bill states, that the Eccle[234]-siastical Court refused to allow the plaintiff to enter into any examination of a particular part of the codicil separate from any objections that might apply to the whole; but in my opinion that was wrong. My noble and learned friend who last addressed your Lordships very properly says, that this is a case in which there has been gross fraud, and that the party who availed himself of this fraud ought not to be allowed to enjoy the fruits of it. I entirely concur with him in saying so; but the question is, by what means shall justice be done? I say that the proper proceeding would have been an appeal from the decree of the Ecclesiastical Court to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, where the probate granted of the ninth codicil would have been reversed. If there has been probate erroneously granted by the Ecclesiastical Court, what is the remedy? If you say that in this case the party may apply to the Court of Chancery, and may file a bill which shall make the legatee a trustee for the next of kin, or for any other party seeking to set aside that part of the codicil, just see the consequence : in every case, by this contrivance of making the party who would be beneficially interested a trustee for another, you do indirectly that which the law forbids you to do directly. The law says that the Court of Chancery has not jurisdiction over a will of personal property ; it cannot set aside a probate of personal property. Well, then, if you are not allowed to file a bill to set aside the probate, shall you be allowed, in every instance, to file a bill to declare the party in whose favour the probate is granted to be a trustee for the next of kin, or for some other party ? Wherever you wish to find fault with the probate which the Ecclesiastical Court has granted, you have only to file a bill and to pray that the party in whose favour the probate has been granted may be declared a trustee. Nay, my Lords, by this process you might review the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court in refusing probate ; because, let [235] me suppose that the Court refuses probate, and grants administration to the next of kin, then, the Court having refused probate and granted administration to the next of kin, the party who claims under the will would file his bill, and would pray that the next of kin may be declared to be trustees for the legatee, and in that manner you might in every instance have an appeal from the Court of Probate to the Court of Chancery. That has never been the practice of our judicial constitution ; the appeal from the Ecclesiastical Court formerly was to the Court of Delegates ; it is now to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

The reasoning on the other side proceeds upon the supposition that there is what we may call a legal estate in the legatee. I must take the liberty to say that I consider that an entire fallacy ; the legatee has no right. Probate ought to have been refused, and the refusal of probate would have done complete and final justice between the parties. This is totally different from the case of a legal estate being decided by a Court of law to be in a particular individual. In such a case there is no remedy whatever except by filing a bill in the Court of Chancery, and having the party in whom the legal estate is, declared to be a trustee for the party whom he has defrauded. We have a very well known example of that in Bulkley v. Wilford (2 Clark and Fin. 177), where an attorney caused a fine to be levied without informing the testator that the effect would be to revoke his will, he, the attorney, being the heir at law. It was very properly held there that the fine revoked the will, but still that it was a case in which the Court of Chancery might properly declare the heir at law a trustee for the devisee who had been defrauded.

For these reasons I am clearly of opinion that in this case the remedy ought to have been by appeal to the Ju-[236]-dicial Committee of the Privy Council, and not by a bill in the Court of Chancery. I do not go through the authorities, but there is one to which I must refer, because it is the decision of this House, and it is expressly in point. That is the case of Kerrich v. Bransby (7 Bro. Parl. Cas. 358). In that case there had been a probate granted of a will of personal property ; after that there was a bill filed to set aside the probate, but then that bill prayed such other relief as the Court of Chancery might see fit, and praying that the probate might be set aside, it prayed everything short of that. Lord Macclesfield did not set aside the will, but what did he do ? he made a decree that the legatee should be declared a trustee for the next of kin ; that is clearly the effect of his decision. My Lords, that, no doubt, was a right decision according to the doctrine which is now contended for as regulating the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, and it was acquiesced in for some time. But it was at last brought by appeal to this House, and the decree was reversed. An attempt was made to take off from the effect of that authority, by saying that it was not a bill to have the legatee declared a trustee for the next of kin, but that it was a bill to set aside the probate altogether. It sought every thing within the compass of that prayer, and it is to be regarded precisely in the same light as if the bill had been simply to have the legatee declared a trustee for the next of kin. Then it was said that that point was not discussed in this House, and that this House must have proceeded upon the merits of the case. I hold the report in my hand, and I will show your Lordships to demonstration that that point was argued in this House, and that that point was decided by this House. Unfortunately we have not got the judgment at length, but we have the arguments which were raised in support of the appeal. In support [237] of the appeal it was insisted that the Court of Chancery ought not to have impeached the will of the 18th of March, 1715, so far as it concerned the personal estate, because it had been already established by the proper Ecclesiastical Court, which has the sole jurisdiction of determining wills so far as they may relate to personal estate, and if there had been any fraud or imposition in obtaining the will, it was properly examinable in that Court only. Therefore, at your Lordships' bar, in the year 1727, there was exactly the same argument which has been used by the party in this case. On the other side it was argued, "as to the probate of the will in the Ecclesiastical Court it was not impeached by the decree, though the appellant was restrained, as in justice he ought to be, from taking any beneficial interest under it." Now, my Lords, is not that the very argument used in support of the decree of my noble and learned friend, the Master of the Rolls? Because, it is said, you do not impeach the decree of the Ecclesiastical Court granting probate, you only declare that the party who took the benefit of that probate shall be considered a trustee for another. That argument was then urged in this case, but it was urged in vain, because the decree of Lord Macclesfield was reversed, and the probate granted by the Ecclesiastical Court stood with all the consequences belonging to it.

I would merely further observe to your Lordships, that I take this distinction; where the Ecclesiastical Court cannot do justice by the powers belonging to it, probate must be granted; it is not a Court of construction, and it must confine itself within its own limits; in certain cases it must grant probate, and refer the parties for justice to a Court of Equity; but if the Ecclesiastical Court in any particular case can do ample justice by granting or refusing a probate, then after the decree of the Ecclesiastical Court there is no remedy in the Court of Chancery; if the Ecclesiastical Court has come to an erroneous decision, [238] the appeal ought to have been, formerly, to the Court of Delegates, now to the Judicial Committee. To hold otherwise would lead to most inconvenient consequences; it would lead to a conflict of jurisdiction. Suppose that in this very case there had been an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, as there might have been, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council might have been put in conflict with this House, they both being Courts of the last resort.

For these reasons I am of opinion that my noble and learned friend who first addressed the House was quite right in reversing the order of his Lordship, the Master of the Rolls, and that the order appealed from ought to be affirmed.

Appeal dismissed and order affirmed: no costs, the appellant suing as pauper.

[239] The HONOURABLE HENRY TREVOR,—Appellant; The HONOURABLE GEORGE RICE RICE TREVOR and daughters,—Respondents [July 8, 14, 15, 1845; May 10, 11, July 20, 1847].

Will—Construction—Issue in tail male.

A testator devised freehold estates to trustees in trust to settle and convey them to the use of G. R. for life, with remainder to his issue in tail male, in strict settlement, and in default of such issue the estates to go over. G. R. had no son but had several daughters, all born after the testator's death:—

Held that the words "in tail male" were descriptive, not of the issue, but of the interest they were to take, and that the daughters were entitled to take, under the limitation in remainder, as tenants in common.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Vice Chancellor on the construction of a will of Viscount Hampden (reported in 13 Simons, 108). His Lordship made three distinct wills, by the first of which, dated the 6th of September, 1824, he gave his estates in the county of Sussex to the Honourable Henry Brand, the appellant, for life, or until he should succeed to the Barony of Dacre, then enjoyed by his brother; and after his decease or succeeding to that barony, the testator gave the said estates to the appellant's eldest son, Thomas Brand, for life, or until he should succeed to the said barony, with remainder to trustees to preserve, etc.; and after his, Thomas Brand's decease or succeeding to the said barony, the testator gave the said estates to his first and other sons successively in tail male, and, in default of such issue, to the appellant, his heirs, and assigns; "Provided that whenever any son of the said Thomas Brand, or his issue male, should succeed to the [240] said Barony of Dacre, then the estate of the person so succeeding thereto (provided that there should then also be in existence any other son or issue male of any other son of Thomas Brand) should determine in like manner as if the son of the said Thomas Brand, who or whose issue male should then so succeed to the said barony, were not only actually dead, but as if there were also an utter failure or extinction of male issue of such son of Thomas Brand, and thereupon the said estates should go over to the next or other son of Thomas Brand, or his issue male, to be entitled under the devises aforesaid: " With proviso also to take the name and arms of Trevor.

By the second will, dated the 7th of September, 1824, the said testator appointed executors, and by a codicil, dated the 8th of September, he gave them the residue of his personal estate upon certain trusts therein mentioned.

By the third will, dated the 8th of September, 1824, which is the subject of this appeal, the testator gave his estates in the county of Bedford to the Hon. Henry Brand, and another, and their heirs, upon trust that they "do and shall settle and convey the same to the use of or in trust for the Hon. George Rice, son of Lord Dynevor (the respondent) for life, without impeachment of waste, except permissive waste or spoliation, with remainder to his issue in tail male in strict settlement, upon condition that all person or persons from time to time to come into possession of the said settled estates do and shall, within one year afterwards, take the name and bear the arms of Trevor, and also upon the like condition to that I have made in my will of my Sussex estate, so far as the change of circumstances will permit, that the said estate shall go over to the party next entitled on the person for the time being possessed becoming entitled to the Barony of Dynevor, and in default of such issue of the said George Rice, I devise my said Bedfordshire estate unto the said Henry Brand, his heirs and assigns for ever."

[241] The testator directed that in the intended settlement should be contained the usual powers of leasing for George Rice, and the trustees to preserve, etc., during the minority of tenants in tail in possession, and also a power for the said George Rice to jointure any wife or wives, at one or several times, to the extent of one-fifth part of the then ordinary annual rental of the settled estates; and also a power to portion younger children to a limited extent; and the testator declared it to be his will and intention that, notwithstanding the absolute devise of his Sussex estates to Henry Brand and his son and issue male, a settlement under the direction of the same trustees should be made of these estates, so as to include such powers, provisions, and clauses, mutatis mutandis, as before mentioned, concerning his Bedfordshire estates.

The testator died on the 9th of September, 1824. Soon after his death, Henry Brand (the appellant), and George Rice (the respondent), took, respectively, the name and arms of Trevor, and the latter is now called George Rice Rice Trevor. He had no issue at the time of the testator's death, but he has since had five daughters, and no other child.

The Barony of Dacre, mentioned in the first will, is a Barony by writ, descendible to females as well as males. The Barony of Dynevor, mentioned in the will of the Bedfordshire estates, was created by letters patent, and is limited to heirs male of the body of the first Baron.

In a suit instituted in Chancery, between the respondent as plaintiff, and the appellant and others as defendants—to which suit the respondent's daughters were made parties—an order was made, referring it to the Master to approve of a settlement, in pursuance of the will of the Bedfordshire estates.

The Master made his report in 1841, setting forth the [242] draft of settlement, of which he approved. The respondent, and his daughters, severally, took various exceptions to the settlement, all concurring in this, that the settlement contained no limitation in favour of daughters. (The settlement, exceptions, and arguments on them, and also the judgments, are set out in 13 Simons, 113, et seq.)

The Vice Chancellor, in his judgment on the principal exceptions held, that, under the limitation to the "issue in tail male," females might take, and he therefore allowed those exceptions, declaring by his order, dated the 27th July, 1842, "that in the draft of settlement approved by the Master there ought—immediately subsequent to the limitation therein contained of the hereditaments therein comprised to the first and other sons of Geo. R. R. Trevor successively in tail male, and for default of such issue—to have been inserted a limitation of the said estates to the use of all and every the daughter and daughters of the said Geo. R. R. Trevor, as tenants in common in tail male, with cross remainders between them in tail male. The subordinate exceptions also were allowed, some of them with variations; and the report was referred back to the Master to be reviewed.

The appeal was against that order.

Mr. Wigram and Mr. Hodgson (with whom were Mr. J. Parker, and Mr. C. Hall) for the appellant:—

The first and principal question in this appeal is, whether, in the settlement to be made of the Bedfordshire property, estates are, or are not, to be limited to the daughters of Geo. R. R. Trevor? Upon the decision of that question depend the first and third of his exceptions to the draft settlement approved by the Master; the first and third of the exceptions taken by the eldest daughter, and three exceptions taken by the other daughters. The eldest daughter's exceptions differed from those taken by [243] the younger daughters in this, that while the eldest claimed that in default of sons of Geo. R. R. Trevor the property should be limited to his first and other daughters successively in tail male, the younger daughters contended that all the daughters should take together as tenants in common; and to that conclusion the Vice Chancellor came.

There are two other, but subordinate questions: the first of them, raised by the second of Geo. R. R. Trevor's exceptions, relates to the extent of his power of jointuring, under the power given to him in the will, "to jointure any wife or wives, at one or several times, to the extent of one-fifth part of the then ordinary rental of the estates;" the second of these minor questions, raised by his fourth exception, relates to the clause shifting the estates upon the party in possession of them succeeding to the Barony of Dynevor.

The main question depends upon the meaning of the words "with remainder to his issue in tail male, in strict settlement." The respondents contend that the word "issue" describes the persons who are to take; that the words "in tail male" are merely descriptive of the estates which they are to take, and therefore that the settlement ought to contain limitations to daughters as well as sons. The appellant contends that the words "in tail male" go to form part of the description of the persons who are to take, limiting the estate to G. Rice, the first taker, and to the heirs male of his body, and therefore that the settlement ought not to contain limitations to daughters. That was the view taken by the Master, and the object of the appeal is to restore the settlement as approved by him. The grounds on which the appellant submits that the Master was right, and the Vice Chancellor's decree erroneous, are these:—first, according to the natural and proper technical [244] meaning of the words "issue in tail male," limitations to sons only ought to be inserted in the settlement; secondly, looking at the whole will, it appears that the testator plainly contemplated that there should be always a single successive ownership of the estates, and not a co-ownership among tenants in common, as the Vice Chancellor declared. But upon any reasonable construction of the will, it is impossible to agree with his Honour, that daughters are to be admitted to take estates under a limitation to "issue in tail male."

The phrase "issue in tail" is an expression properly and technically descriptive of "heirs of the body." It is a legal and correct phrase, marking that the word "issue" is used in its proper sense of including remote as well as immediate descendants, and not in any restricted sense, such as that of "children." In like manner the words "issue in tail male" are properly and technically descriptive of "heirs male of the body." The expressions "issue in tail male," and "heirs male of the body," are synonymous; they are stated to have been so used by Lord Camden in White v. Carter (Amb. 670), and by Lord Chancellor Sugden, in noticing that case in Rochfort v. Fitzmaurice (2 Dru. and War. 25).

It is clear that if this had not been an executory, but an immediate, devise to G. R., and "his issue in tail male," or to G. R. for life, and after his decease to "his issue in tail male," G. R. would have been tenant in tail male; Shelley's Case (1 Co. Rep. 93). The words describing the issue to take are the same in the two instances, and they would have received the same construction. The words "in tail male" would, in each instance have formed part of the description of the issue to take. All the cases on the meaning of the word "issue," are collected in Mr. Prior's useful Treatise (see ss. 9, 189 and 209). The circumstance that the pre-[245]-sent is the case of an executory trust, and not of an immediate devise, can only make a difference in the mode of parcelling out the estate devised; that is, parties who would, under an immediate devise, have taken by descent, might, under an executory trust, be made to take by purchase; but the parties to take are in each case precisely the same. In Blackburn v. Stables (2 Ves. and B. 269-70), Sir W. Grant says, "there is no difference between an executory trust in marriage articles and in a will, except that the object and purpose of the former furnish an indication of intention, which must be wanting in the latter." "If it is clearly to be ascertained, from any thing in the will, that the testator did not mean to use the expressions, which he has employed, in their strict proper technical sense, the Court in decreeing such settlement as he has directed, will depart from his words in order to execute his intention, but the Court must necessarily follow his words, unless he has himself shown that he did not mean to use them in their proper sense." In an immediate devise, the addition of the words "in strict settlement" would not have made any difference; and here they cannot be taken to mean any thing but to regulate the manner in which the persons designated by "issue in tail male" are to take, so as to preserve the estate to the different members of the family to whom it was destined, and to prevent the first taker from barring the remainder.

It is submitted that this view of the case is alone conclusive in favour of the appellant's construction. It shews that the settlement ought to be made on Geo. R. R. Trevor for life, with remainder to his issue, who would take under a limitation in tail male. This construction renders the testator's direction to settle, perfect in itself; at the same time that it clearly defines the issue who are to take, it also defines the manner and order in which they are to take; therefore, [246] no question can arise, upon this construction, as to the proper limitations to be contained in the settlement. But upon the respondents' construction the direction to settle is indefinite and imperfect. Numerous questions may arise as to the objects to take under the description of "issue," and the manner and order in which the issue are to take; events happening after the date of the will might vary the objects to take. Some of the difficulties arising upon the respondents' construction are so great and so obvious, that the omission of any provision in the will applicable to them, renders it impossible to suppose that the testator meant what the respondents contend for. If a solicitor were to send to counsel instructions for a settlement in the words used by this testator, no conveyancer of experience could doubt as to the meaning of an expression so familiar as "issue in tail male in strict settlement;" even a person less conversant with forms would at once conclude that they mean male issue, by considering that, otherwise, the instructions were too indefinite to be acted upon. The first rule of construction is, that if words be susceptible of their ordinary primary meaning—their proper and legal signification—they are to be taken in that proper legal signification, unless it be repugnant to the context. That rule was illustrated in a recent case in the Court of Exchequer, Mallam v. May (7 Jurist, p. 19).

According to the appellant's construction, the words "issue in tail male" are a description of all the issue who are to take under the limitations, whether by descent or purchase, and the proper sense of the word "issue," as extended to descendants of every degree, is adhered to. But upon the respondents' construction, the word "issue" requires to be confined to children, or to issue in some given degree; for manifestly a direction to settle [247] "on issue in tail male" including all descendants, whether male or female, however remote, would be absurd, and indeed contradictory. The respondents' construction, therefore, would give a confined meaning to the word "issue," without anything in the context to warrant it. They contend that the words "in tail male" are words properly descriptive of an estate known in the law; and then, to avoid an absurdity, the word "issue" must be construed "children." But this argument assumes the point in dispute, that, is, it assumes that the words "in tail male" are descriptive only of the estate which the takers are to take. We, on the contrary, say the words are descriptive of the persons who are to take; that is the primary meaning of the words "issue in tail male," clearly signifying heirs male of the body; Roe v. Grew (2 Wils. 322), Wharton v. Gresham (W. Blacks. 1083), Haydon v. Wilshire (3 T. Rep. 373), Whitelock v. Hedden (1 Bos. and Pul. 243), Leigh v. Norbury (13 Ves. 340), Dalzell v. Welch (2 Sim. 319), Gallini v. Gallini (5 Barn. and Ad. 621), Lees v. Mosley (1 You. and C. (Exc.) 583).

The appellant's construction is aided by other parts of the testator's will and codicils:

First. The settlement is directed to be made upon a condition that the estate is to go over to the "party" next entitled, on the "person" for the time being possessed thereof becoming entitled to the Barony of Dynevor. The words giving the estate over, contemplate only the case of one party being next entitled. The terms of the condition, therefore, raise an inference against the construction that the estate was to go over to several daughters; and favour the appellant's construction, that there could be only a single owner,—only one person at a time entitled to the estate. [248] Upon the respondents' construction several daughters would take together as tenants in common; and so, according to the Vice Chancellor's decree, they would be all co-owners. It is also to be observed that the Barony of Dynevor is a Barony limited to heirs male only. Unless the appellant's construction be adopted, the condition can only be made applicable to some of the persons for the time being possessed of the estate, although, from the language used, it would appear to apply generally to every person for the time being in possession. The condition is not inserted at length in this will. The testator specifies the event in which the estate is to shift, and the person to whom it is to go over, and refers to the condition in the will of the Sussex estate as that with which the condition to be inserted in this settlement was to correspond, "so far as the change of circumstances will permit." There is no ground to argue that these words had reference to the difference in the nature of the limitations of the two estates. It is sufficient to say, that under the direction to settle the Bedfordshire estate in strict settlement, there might have been several estates for life, with several remainders to first and other sons in tail male of different persons, and the shifting clause in the will of the Sussex estate, which was framed so as to provide for a shifting from the issue male of one person only, might therefore require some re-modelling to make it apply to the different state of circumstances.

Secondly. The direction to take the name and arms of Trevor also shows that the estate was to be enjoyed by one person. That direction is inapplicable to females. It can hardly be supposed that the testator contemplated several persons in possession, all using the name and bearing the arms at the same time. The object of clauses of this nature, almost necessarily, is confined to the case of a family estate enjoyed by one person. Further, the testator does not provide for the husbands of daughters [249] taking the name and bearing the arms, a provision which is invariably inserted in similar clauses when females are included; and, further, there is nothing in the will to exempt a daughter who had taken the name, and subsequently married, from a forfeiture consequent upon the change of her name by marriage. The words "all person or persons from time to time to come in possession of the said settled estates," which are used in this condition, do not show that the case of more than one person at a time being in possession was contemplated. The plural, "persons," is rendered necessary by the use of the word "all." The words "from time to time" make the plural, "persons," applicable to a single and successive enjoyment. It is observable that the testator used the plural, "persons," in his codicil, in reference to his Sussex estate, which clearly was to be held by one person only at a time. The words of the codicil are, "to allow the persons for the time being entitled."

Thirdly. The testator directed that the settlement shall contain powers of leasing "during the minority of tenants in tail in possession," and a power of sale, exchange, partition and enfranchisement, "during the minority of each tenant in tail in possession." The language here used, points to a single and successive enjoyment. The difficulty of applying these powers to undivided shares, is also in favour of the appellant's construction. There is no provision for the case of some of the persons in possession being infants, and others of age; and the want of such a provision would render it impossible to act under the powers in the case supposed. Leases or sales of undivided shares only, could not have been in contemplation.

Fourthly. In the codicil, the purchase of additional lands is (by reference to the corresponding direction as to the Sussex estate) to be made with the consent of the "person" who, for the time being, would be "tenant" for life, in [250] possession of the purchased estates; but it is a consequence of the respondents' construction, that there might have been several "persons" who, for the time being, would be tenants for life in possession. Upon that construction also, some of the persons in possession at the same time, as tenants in common, might be tenants for life, and other tenants in tail male, to which state of things the direction in question cannot possibly be applied.

Fifthly. The estate is given over "in default of such issue of the said Geo. Rice." Here the word "issue" is obviously used in the sense attributed by the appellant to the same word in construing the words directing a settlement.

Sixthly. The will of the Sussex estate and the will of the Bedfordshire estate were executed within two days of each other. The former will is not executory, and contains only limitations to first and other sons in tail male. The latter will directs a strict settlement to be made, and the testator therefore does not describe the issue to take as first and other sons in tail male, but generally as issue in tail male. At the end of the latter will the testator refers to the former will, and declares that though such former will was not executory, he now intends that it should be so, and that the settlement to be made of the Sussex estate should "include such powers, provisions, and clauses, mutatis mutandis, as herein before mentioned concerning my Bedfordshire estate." It is submitted that the provision here made, shows that the character of the limitations of the two estates were to be the same, that is, that both estates were to be settled on male issue only. It cannot be contended that those words have the effect of directing a settlement to be made of the Sussex estate on Thomas Brand and his "issue in tail male," in the manner in which the respondents construe those words, so as to let in female issue to take the Sussex estate.

[251] Upon the respondents' construction there would clearly be no ground for confining the word "issue" to "children." It must at least include all issue who might be living at the testator's death, and then very anomalous results might follow upon that construction; for instance, a daughter of Geo. R. R. Trevor might have had a daughter in the testator's lifetime, in which case the grand-daughter would, upon the respondents' construction, have been one of the stock to whom an estate by purchase was to be limited, and her male issue might have inherited; but if such grand-daughter had been born a day after the testator's death, neither she nor her male issue could have taken. Again, the daughter, born in the lifetime of the testator of a daughter, might take, while a daughter, not born at the testator's death, of a son, could not take; and the daughter of a daughter would thus be preferred to the daughter of a son, which would be most capricious. It is impossible for any thing to be more unusual and incongruous than for children, and the children of such children, to take together as tenants in common in tail male. The appellant's construction is free from incongruities and anomalies of that kind.

According to the respondents' construction, the will contains nothing to import any preference of sons to daughters or of daughters to sons, or sons inter se. The Court below expressed its opinion, that the words "in strict settlement" are to be referred only to the mode in which the tenant for life, Geo. R. R. Trevor, and his issue, should take. These words do not describe what issue are to take, but merely express that the issue shall take by purchase. The inevitable consequence would appear to be, that upon the respondents' construction, all the issue (sons, daughters, and remoter issue) must take together as one class, as tenants in common, in tail male. Yet it is certain, and is indeed agreed, that a preference as between sons, and as between sons and daughters, [252] must have been intended, and that the settlement must be framed accordingly. It is impossible, therefore, to adhere to the words used by the testator, if the respondents' construction be adopted.

The result of their construction would be to create limitations to the daughters as tenants in common in tail male. This was so decided by the Court below, and it is an inevitable result, for it is certain there is nothing in the will to give a preference to daughters inter se; such a mode of limitation is without precedent. In practice, limitations in settlements to daughters as tenants in common, are always in tail general. The result of the limitations is against the probable intention of the testator. In practice, where females are not excluded, the daughters of a son are always preferred to his sisters, and accordingly, where there is a limitation to daughters as tenants in common, it follows a limitation to sons in tail general, under which female descendants of the sons would take. It is admitted that the testator did not intend any female descendant of Geo. R. R. Trevor to take by descent, and it attributes a capricious intention to the testator to hold that he intended they might take by purchase.

This being the case of an executory trust, the proper mode of construing the words "issue in tail male," is to read them as referring to those limitations which a conveyancer of experience would insert in a settlement, if he was furnished with instructions in the words of the will in question. It is here again submitted, with great confidence, that any conveyancer of experience would, with such instructions, without hesitation frame the settlement in accordance with the appellant's construction.

[Upon the two subordinate questions, first, as to the power of jointuring, the learned counsel submitted that, according to the true construction of the will, Geo. R. R. Trevor should not be authorized to appoint by way of jointure, a clear yearly sum equal to one-fifth part of [253] the rental of the estates, without any deduction, but that the yearly sum appointed ought to be subject to the land tax; in other words, that the outgoings should be taken out of the gross rental, before the division took place, to ascertain the amount of the jointure; and, secondly, as to the shifting clause, they submitted that the estate of the person becoming entitled to the Barony of Dynevor, ought to be made to cease, whether there should or should not be in existence (applying the condition to Geo. R. R. Trevor himself) any child, or any issue male of any child, or (applying it to any of his children or their issue male) any other child, or any issue male of any other child, capable of taking under the limitations of the settlement. These questions were deemed to be of very little importance in comparison with the first, the decision of which must also govern the construction of the second of these two clauses of the will.]

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Romilly (with whom was Mr. Wickens) for the respondents:

It must not be forgotten that the question raised by the exceptions is, how the settlement of the estates is to be framed so as to effectuate the testator's intention. It is, in the first place, to be a strict settlement embracing Mr. Rice Trevor and his issue, and giving to the issue estates in tail male; and then comes the question, whether his daughters are to be excluded from participation in the estates.

The word "issue," used by the testator in describing the persons whom he meant to take the estates as purchasers, must be taken according to its ordinary acceptation, as including both males and females; Hart v. Middlehurst (3 Atk. 371; see other cases. ante, p. 247). Are you warranted by the language of the will, by decision, or by principle, in saying [254] that the daughters are to be excluded from the settlement on the "issue?" The words "in tail male" do not operate to exclude daughters. No legitimate inference can be drawn from the quantity of interest conferred, to show that the class of persons previously named to take is less extensive than the words import. The word "issue" contains the description of the persons who are to enjoy; the words "in tail male" are indicative of the quantity of interest they are to enjoy. The adjective "male" is not to be separated from the word "tail" and joined to "issue." The phrases "tenants in tail male" and "in tail special" are familiar to all, as laid down in Littleton's Tenures. The issue of Rice Trevor are to be the tenants of the estates to be comprised in the settlement. What interest are they to take? They are to take just the quantity of interest designated by the words "in tail male;" words apt and proper, and used in their plain and ordinary meaning. Let "children" be substituted for "issue," and there will be no difficulty in the construction of the limitation.

The question will be facilitated by attending to the rules of construction as stated in Jarman's Edition of Powell on Devises (Vol. II., p. 8; rules 14, 15, and 16):

"Words in general are to be taken in their ordinary and grammatical sense, unless a clear intention to use them in another can be collected, and they are in all cases to receive a construction which will give them all effect, rather than one that will render some of them inoperative: and of two modes of construction, that is to be preferred which will prevent a total intestacy." "Where a testator uses technical words, he will be presumed to employ them in their legal sense, unless the context contain a clear indication to the contrary." "Words occurring more than once in a will shall be presumed to be used always in the same sense, unless a contrary intention [255] appear by the context, or unless the words be applied to a different subject. And upon the same principle, where a testator uses an additional word or phrase, he shall be presumed to have an additional meaning."

Let these principles be applied to the interpretation of these wills. It will be seen that in the will of the Sussex estates, an immediate devise to males only, the word "issue" occurs seven times, but never without the adjunct "male;" whereas in the will now under consideration, the testator uses the word "issue" only, thereby indicating that, in its proper technical sense, it comprehends females as well as males; but in the other will, where he meant to exclude females, he uses the proper adjunct. The context of the two testamentary instruments shews that the testator, if he had designed to exclude the daughters of Rice Trevor, knew how to use apt words for that purpose; and therefore, in the absence of such words, we cannot come to the conclusion that he had any such intention. The use of the words "person or persons," in the name and arms clause in the will now under consideration, shews that the testator there contemplated the possibility of his Bedfordshire estates being held by a plurality of persons, as females, tenants in common; but he carefully uses the singular number in the clause shifting the estates, on the person in possession of them succeeding to the Barony of Dynevor, which could be held only by one person, and a male. Again, "in default of such issue," he devised the estates over. There he does not use the words "male issue" or "issue male," which would exclude females, but the words "such issue," "such" relating to its antecedent "issue," capable of admitting females as well as males. In the last clause, declaring it to be his will that "notwithstanding the absolute devise of his Sussex estate in favour of Henry Brand, and his issue male," there should be a settlement of that estate, he uses the adjunct, "male," marking again the distinction he [256] made in the limitations of the two estates, the difference of expression manifesting the difference of purpose.

Much of the argument for the appellant has proceeded on the assumption, first, that "issue in tail male" are synonymous and identical with "heirs male of the body;" and, secondly, that the devise is to be considered as if it was an immediate devise to Mr. Rice Trevor, with remainder to his issue in tail male,—under which undoubtedly the first taker would have an estate in tail; Archer's Case (1 Co. Rep. 66), Wild's Case (6 Co. Rep. 17 b), King v. Melling (1 Ventris, 229). For the first part of that argument reference was made to White v. Carter (Eden, 366; Amb. 670), a case which, on examination, will be found to be no authority, and is besides incorrectly reported; and as to the second, the devise in this case is not to be confounded with a devise to a man and his issue in tail male which are words of limitation, and not of purchase—which all parties admit to have been here intended—and it is an established rule that where the word "issue" is used in an instrument as a word of purchase, it cannot, at the same time, be taken as a word of limitation; Roe dem. Dodson v. Grew (2 Wils. 322), Cook v. Cook (2 Vern. 545), Doe dem. Cooper v. Collis (4 Term Rep. 244). The word "issue," here taken as a word of purchase, without anything in the context to controul its meaning, comprehends equally male and female; Hart v. Middlehurst (3 Atk. 371), Dod v. Dod (Amb. 244), Oddie v. Woodford (3 Myl. and C. 600-10-13). (And see the cases, supra, p. 247.)

The clause in the will consists of three distinct parts, first, "issue," which is used as a word of purchase, and has the appropriate purpose of pointing out the descendants, male and female, who are to take; secondly, "in tail male," which words describe the nature and quality of the estates [257] to be taken; and, thirdly, "in strict settlement," which—inasmuch as "issue" is nomen collectivum—have the office of pointing out the series and form of arrangement in which the issue, males and females, are to take. How a settlement in that form is to be carried into effect, is best shown by the practice of conveyancers, and by writers of authority on the subject. Mr. Fonblanque, in his Treatise on Equity, speaking of the general principles of the Court in respect to settlements, as in the case of marriage articles, says (Vol. i. p. 405, 5th edit.), "And if the parties come into a Court of Equity for a specific execution, the Court will provide, not only for the sons of the marriage by proper limitations, but likewise for the daughters; and even although a settlement were actually made in pursuance of such articles before marriage, equity will rectify it in favour of the issue female." Gilbert's Lex Praetoria, published about 1750, has this passage (page 253): "If articles be made between husband and wife, etc., in which the limitations are to the husband for life, remainder to the wife for life, remainder to the heirs of the body, etc., there if they come to a Court of Equity for specific execution, etc., the Court will provide, not only for the sons of the marriage by proper limitations, but also for the daughters." So that under the expression "heirs of the body," though not so comprehensive as "issue," daughters are comprehended. Passages to the same effect occur in Atherley's Treatise on Marriage Settlements (page 101), Butler's Notes to Co. Litt. (page 376 b), and Preston on Estates (page 131). The formula of strict settlement is given in the Books of Precedents, as in Horsman's Precedents (page 629, 2nd edit.), the limitations are to first and other sons of the marriage, in tail male, "remainder to daughters as tenants in common in tail." In Barton's Conveyancing (Vol. vii. p. 281, 1824) the form is given in full, and it is said in a note "the usual plan (of strict settlement) is to limit the estate" (after estates for life to husband, and then to the wife, with remainder to trustees to preserve, etc., interposed) "remainder to the first and other sons in tail, remainder to daughters as tenants in common, with cross remainders between them." Another note to the precedent states, that "in settlements of large estates, they are sometimes limited, on failure of male issue of sons, to daughters in strict settlement in tail male" (id., page 312).

In Stewart's Practice of Conveyancing (Vol. ii. ed. 1832) the formula for strict settlement gives limitations to the sons successively in tail male or general, "to the daughters as tenants in common in tail male." In Shelley's settlement—one of the first precedents put by conveyancers into the hands of their pupils to copy—the limitations are to sons in tail male, to sons in tail general, to daughters as tenants in common in tail general, with cross remainders. The form in Shepherd's Precedent of precedents is to the same effect. Mr. Hayes' form (2 Vol. 54) gives the limitations in strict settlement to sons in tail male, then to daughters in tail male, then to sons in tail general, etc. And in Martin's Conveyancing (Vol. iv., p. 609, ed. 1844; by Davidson), under the head "Strict Settlements," the limitations are to the first and other sons successively, first in tail male, then in tail general; first and other daughters successively, first in tail male, then in tail general. Mr. Jarman's Precedents are precisely to the same effect. It is most important, if not imperative, on the Courts to attend to the meaning which practical men in any department of the law put on the language which they are constantly in the habit of using; the manner in which they use and act upon particular words in the instruments which they prepare, gives the best illustration of their meaning. [259] Lords Eldon and Redesdale, in numerous cases, expressed great respect for their practice, emphatically in Smith v. Earl of Jersey (3 Bligh, 444) and in Cholmondely v. Clinton (4 Bligh, 56).

[In refutation of the argument of the appellants, that "issue in tail male" was identical with heirs male of the body, they cited Seale v. Seale (1 P. Wms. 290), the observations of Sir W. Grant in Blackburn v. Stables (2 Ves. and B. 370-1), and Lord Eldon in Jervoise v. Duke of Northumberland (1 Jac. and W. 570-4).

As to the power of jointuring, they contended that the Vice Chancellor put the true construction on it; and the intention of the testator was that Mr. Rice Trevor should have power to appoint, by way of jointure, a clear annual sum to the amount of one fifth part of the gross annual rental of the estate at the time of making the settlement. The words in the will are "the ordinary annual rental of the estate."

And as to the clause for shifting the estates, on the succession of the person in possession, to the barony of Dynevor, they submitted that, according to the true construction of that part of the will which incorporates in it by reference the like clause in the will of the Sussex estate, the Bedfordshire estates ought not to be made to shift from a child or the issue of a child of Rice Trevor, unless there should then also be in existence some other child, or issue male of some other child of Rice Trevor, capable of taking the settled estates under the limitations of the settlement.]

Mr. Wigram, in reply, claimed the benefit of the canons of construction read by Mr. Bethell from Mr. Jarman's Book (ante, p. 254), and desired that they might be applied to the in-[260]-terpretation of the disputed words, "issue in tail male." The question was narrowed in the cause to the meaning of these words; the appellants contending that they are all descriptive of persons, as distinguished from the estates they are to take, while the respondents contend that the word "issue" is descriptive of persons, the others "in tail male" designating the nature of the estates they are to take under the settlement. If the appellants are right in saying these words merely describe the line of persons who are to take, and are synonymous with the more technical words "heirs male of the body," the whole of the argument for the respondents fails. The appellants do not admit that issue, as used here, is a word of purchase; whether it is a word of purchase or of limitation was not a distinction in the contemplation of the testator. He directed a strict settlement to be made on a line of persons, and it is not till the settlement is to be made that it can be determined who takes by purchase and who by limitation. He referred to the cases that were cited in the argument for the respondents, and submitted that most of them supported his construction, and others of them had no application. He entirely concurred in the proposition, and in the inferences from those cases that were cited to show that in executory trusts for "issue," that term by itself included all descendants, female as well as male.

The order in which the counsel were heard was this: Mr. L. Wigram first, Mr. Hodgson, on the same side, was stopped by the Lord Chancellor, saying that their Lordships thought they had heard enough on that side, and that Mr. Hodgson would, if necessary, be heard in reply. Mr. Bethell was then heard for the respondents, and after him, instead of Mr. Romilly, who was with him, their Lordships called on Mr. Hodgson, and after him Mr. Romilly was heard, and then Mr. Wigram in reply.

[261] The case stood over for consideration until the end of the session of 1846, when the learned Lords, who heard the argument in 1845, viz., the Lord Chancellor, Lord Brougham, Lord Cottenham, and Lord Campbell, thought they ought to have the opinion of the common law judges, and the case was ordered to be argued before them, by one counsel on each side, in the then ensuing session.

The appeal came on now (May 10, 11, 1847) to be re-argued by Mr. L. Wigram for the appellant, and Mr. Bethell for the respondents, before the Lord Chancellor (Lord Cottenham), Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Brougham, Lord Langdale, and Lord Campbell; in the presence of Lord Chief Justice Wilde, Justices Patteson, Coleridge, Coltman, Maule, Wightman, Cresswell, Erle, and Williams, and Barons Parke, Alderson, Rolfe, and Platt.

The points of the arguments on this occasion, and some few new cases and authorities cited, are incorporated in the preceding summary of the more diffuse arguments at the former hearing.

The Lord Chancellor proposed the following question to the learned Judges, and, at their request, time was given to them to consider their answer:—

"George Rice Trevor died, leaving no son, but leaving one daughter, who had a son who attained twenty-one. The mother and son having agreed to sell the Bedfordshire estates to A. B., and to make a good title thereto, have brought an action against A. B. upon the agreement; the question is, whether they can, with the concurrence of the trustees, make a good title to these estates?"

Lord Chief Justice Wilde (June 28).—The question proposed by your Lordships has reference to a statement to the effect that "George Rice Trevor died leaving no son, but leaving one daughter who had a son who attained twenty-[262]-one; and that the mother and son have agreed to sell the Bedfordshire estates to A. B., and to make a good title thereto, and have brought an action against A. B. upon their agreement." And the question proposed by your Lordships is, "whether the only daughter of Geo. R. R. Trevor, and her son, can, with the concurrence of the trustees, make a good title to those estates?"

In answer to that question I have to state, that it is the unanimous opinion of the judges who heard the argument at your Lordships' bar, that a good title can be made, by the parties mentioned in the question, to the estates therein referred to.

The answer to the question depends upon the construction of the devise of the Bedfordshire estates, contained in the will of Lord Hampden, which devise is expressed in the following words: "I give and devise unto General the Honourable Henry Brand (meaning the appellant) and Joseph Rogers, gentleman, and their heirs, all and every my real estates in the county of Bedford, whether freehold or copyhold, upon trust, that they or the survivor of them, or his heirs, do and shall settle and convey the same to the use of or in trust for the Honourable George Rice, son of Lord Dynevor (now the respondent Geo. R. R. Trevor) for life, without impeachment of waste, except permissive waste or spoliation, with remainder to his issue in tail male, in strict settlement, upon condition that all person or persons from time to time to come into possession of the said settled estates do and shall, within one year afterwards, take the name and bear the arms of Trevor: And also, upon the like condition to that I have made in my will of my Sussex estate, so far as the change of circumstances will permit, that the said estate shall go over to the party next entitled, on the person for the time being possessed becoming entitled to the Barony of Dynevor; and in default of such issue of the said George [263] Rice, I devise my said Bedfordshire estate unto the said Henry Brand, his heirs and assigns for ever."

The question upon this devise is, whether, under either the word "issue" or the words "issue in tail male," sons only are comprised, or whether daughters as well as sons were intended to take?

The trusts in the will being executory, it is clear that Geo. R. R. Trevor was not entitled to more than a life estate, and that his issue, whether males only, or males and females, were to take by way of remainder as purchasers. It is not controverted that the word "issue," in its ordinary and proper sense, includes all descendants, however remote, and includes females as well as males. That such is the proper construction of that word is too well established to render it necessary to refer to authorities upon the subject. In this will, therefore, "issue," as a word of purchase, is synonymous with "children." But it is contended on the part of the appellant that the word "issue" in this will cannot be in any manner severed in construction from the words "in tail male" which follow it; and that the words "issue in tail male" must be considered as one entire and indivisible expression, describing the first takers and the estate to be taken; and, consequently, that the parties thereby designated as the first purchasers are the issue male, or sons of Geo. R. R. Trevor, to the exclusion of the daughters.

The respondents contend that the word "issue" is used in its natural and admitted ordinary sense, including females, and that such sense is not varied, or in any respect affected by the words "in tail male:" that the word "issue" expresses the parties to take, and the words "in tail male" the estate to be taken.

It seems to be agreed that the construction of the devise, as to the point submitted to the judges, is not [264] affected by the words "in strict settlement;" and we think that it is not.

The devise, if read in the manner contended for by the appellant, must be deemed to be framed in a very untechnical and inaccurate manner. The issue are to take as purchasers, and the word "issue" is a proper and apt word to describe those who are so to take; but "issue in tail male" is not an usual or apt form of expression to describe the first taker of an estate tail. "Issue in tail male" is an expression only correct when used in reference to an estate already settled; "issue in tail male" being the ordinary and correct form of expression to describe one taking by descent under an estate tail vested in the ancestor; and the words "issue in tail" are used in this sense, and as contrasted with the ancestor or first taker, by Lord Coke in the passages which have been referred to, and in the text books (Litt. ss. 638-642; Co. Litt. 326 b, 327 a, 327 b).

The question in this case seems to be narrowed to the point, whether in construing this devise the word "issue" is to be read in its ordinary sense, as including females as well as males; or whether, by the addition of the words "in tail male" in immediate connexion with the word "issue," or from other parts of the will, it is manifested that the word "issue" was not used in such ordinary and usual sense, but in a restricted and limited sense, as including males only.

It cannot be necessary to cite any of the numerous determinations in which the rule of construction has been recognized in the Courts of Law and Equity, and affirmed by your Lordships' house—that in a will, words, whether technical or otherwise, are to be understood as used in the sense ordinarily and properly applied to them, unless, from [265] the whole context of the will, it shall appear satisfactorily and clearly that the words to be construed have been used, and were intended to be understood, in some other sense.

We are of opinion that the word “issue” was used in the present will in its ordinary sense, and comprised females as well as males, and that such meaning is not controlled or affected by the words “in tail male” which immediately follow the word “issue,” or by any other part of the will.

The words “issue in tail male” were a convenient and not incorrect form of expression to denote the first purchasers, and the estate to be taken; the takers by the word “issue”; the estate to be taken by the words “in tail male.” There is no reason against an estate “in tail male” being limited to a female, or an estate in tail female to a male, and the limitation of an estate tail of one kind or the other has no necessary effect in denoting the sex of the first taker, the effect of the words of such limitation not being to describe the first taker, but simply to mark the course of descent from such first taker. If the word “issue” may be correctly construed as describing the first purchasers, and the words “in tail male” be a correct legal description of the estate to be taken by such purchasers, there should be found some very distinct and substantial reason for so construing the entire expression, as to render it an incorrect form of devise.

Therefore, as an estate in tail male may be limited to a daughter as well as to a son, and as daughters come within the description of issue, there seems no good reason, according to the ordinary rules of construction, for deeming this devise ambiguous.

The argument on the part of the appellant, to prove that the devise in question ought to be read as including males [266] only, has been mainly derived from other parts of the will, and especially from those parts which refer to the disposition and limitations relating to the Sussex estates contained in the first will, and in showing that the testator has limited those estates to males only, and from thence inferring that the testator intended to limit the Bedfordshire estates also to males only.

We think it would be dangerous, and lead to a great uncertainty in construing a devise relating to one estate, to infer an intention not expressed in it, from the intention apparent in regard to a totally independent estate, and devised in terms altogether different; but we see no ground for inferring an identity of intention on the part of the testator in regard to the two estates. Indeed as it appears that the first will is distinctly, aptly, and correctly framed to effectuate the intention of limiting the Sussex estates to descendants through males only, the reference to the terms of that will appears to the judges to afford arguments rather opposed to the appellant's construction of the devise in question than in support of it.

The numerous and important authorities regarding the true rules of construction of wills, determine that a departure from the ordinary meaning of the words contained in them should only be adopted from necessity and in cases where the context or other parts of the will satisfactorily manifest that the language of the will has been used in some other than such ordinary sense: Adopting the principles of those decisions, many of which have received the sanction of this House, the judges are unanimously of the opinion I have before expressed, namely, that the only daughter of George Rice Trevor, and her son, mentioned in the statement, can, with the concurrence of the trustees, make a good title to the Bedfordshire estates.

[267] Lord Brougham.—My Lords, we have had the benefit of two arguments upon this important case; first, in the session of 1845, by two counsel on a side, as usual. It then stood over in order that, in consequence of some doubts entertained in the course of that argument, we might have the benefit of the attendance of the learned judges. It was further argued this session, by one counsel on a side, before those learned judges, and we have now the inestimable advantage of their aid in the learned opinion which they have, with one voice, given upon the point submitted to them. (His Lordship read the question.) That was the only point, and it turned upon the construction which was to be put upon the words of the devise, “with remainder to his issue in tail male in strict settlement, upon condition,” etc., “and in default of such issue of the said George Rice,” etc.

The question is, what is the construction to be put upon those subsequent words, "such issue," connected with the preceding words "issue in tail male in strict settlement?"—"such issue" would, no doubt, be such issue "as your Lordships should be of opinion were meant by "issue in tail male in strict settlement."

There is no doubt of the principle of construction which the learned judges have adopted, and which requires no authority: for it rests upon sound sense as well as upon precedent, and it requires nothing else to support it. There is no doubt, that upon sound principle, you are to take words, especially in a will, in their ordinary sense, unless something in the whole context of the will shall be found to displace that ordinary sense, and to require you, for the purpose of effecting the general intention of the testator to give an extraordinary and special construction to the words, and take them out of their ordinary acceptation. As to the word "issue," the question is, whether the addition of the words "in tail male in strict settle-[268]-ment" makes it a limitation and restriction to issue male, the word "issue" having in it no one tittle of limitation or restriction to males, but being a general word applicable to all issue, female as well as male.

I can easily understand how, if the word "male" had been there, it would have been argued, and most forcibly argued, that "issue male" meant only issue male, to the exclusion of females. But "issue in tail male in strict settlement" is a totally different thing; even if "strict settlement" were not there, "issue in tail male" is something perfectly different. The words "tail male" do not apply to issue, they are not words restricting the issue; they are words describing the estate taken by that issue. Consequently "issue in tail male" is, as the learned judges observed, a convenient and not incorrect form of expression to denote the first purchasers and the estate to be taken, the word "issue" designating the first purchasers, and the phrase "tail male," to which is added "in strict settlement," being a description of the estate taken by those purchasers.

Therefore, I hold the opinion at which the learned judges have arrived, that as an estate in tail male may be limited to a daughter as well as a son, and as daughters come within the description of "issue," there is no reason for deviating from the ordinary rule of construction. The consequence will be, that the question being answered by the learned judges in the affirmative, "that the only daughter of George Rice Trevor, and her son can, with the concurrence of the trustees, make a good title to these estates," it will follow that the judgment proceeding upon that construction—and which is involved in the question so put and so answered by the learned judges—ought to stand, and that your Lordships ought to affirm the judgment of the Court below, to which I humbly move your Lordships.

[269] It is, of course, not a case in which we ought to give costs.

Lord Lyndhurst.—It is scarcely necessary to add anything to what my noble and learned friend has stated. The only question is, after George Rice Trevor's estate for life, what is meant by "remainder to his issue in tail male?" The word "issue," in ordinary acceptation, as my noble and learned friend has very properly said, comprises females as well as males, daughters as well as sons: is there anything in this will to limit it to issue male?—I find nothing whatever. That which was relied upon—the phrase to which my noble and learned friend referred—"in tail male" does not at all affect the question, because females may take in tail male as well as males. I agree with my noble and learned friend, that "issue" points to the purchasers who are to take in the first instance, and that "in tail male" is the description of the estate. That is exactly the judgment that was pronounced by the Vice Chancellor, and it corresponds with the opinion which was expressed by the learned judges. Upon these grounds I think that that part of the judgment of the Court below must be affirmed.

There are two or three other exceptions which have been raised in this case; but the only doubt that could possibly arise related to the point to which my noble and learned friend has addressed his attention. Therefore, being of opinion with my noble and learned friend that the judgment on that point was right, I advise your Lordships generally to affirm the judgment of the Vice Chancellor, and I have authority to state that that is the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, who is prevented from being here by circumstances which oblige him to attend the Court of Chancery.

[270] Lord Campbell.—I concur in the opinion of the learned judges. It seems to me to be a clear case. A number of authorities were cited in the argument, but I do not think that, on either side, they much assist us. The words of the will ought to have the natural and legal meaning and effect, unless there be something in subsequent parts of it which renders it inconsistent that that effect should be given to them.

We have the words "remainder to his issue." I pause there. If I were punctuating this will, I should there put a semi-colon. Then there being "remainder to his issue," which of course would enable us to ascertain who are to take—next comes the quality of the estate which they are to take; they are to take "in tail male." Females may take in tail male as well as males. Then as to the words "in strict settlement," it appears to me that the effect of those words is rather to confirm the opinion which I form on the previous words, that females might be included, because generally speaking where you settle an estate in strict settlement, after the estates given to the sons, the daughters would generally take, therefore, I hold that the words in the will do not go in the slightest degree to restrain, or limit, or affect, the natural interpretation which is always given to the words "issue in tail male."

Lord Lyndhurst.—I wish to add that during the argument considerable stress was laid upon the devise of the Sussex estate. I agree entirely in the opinion of the learned judges, that it would be of very dangerous consequence if we were to introduce any circumstances out of the disposition of that estate, for the purpose of governing the construction of this particular and distinct devise. I also concur in the opinion which they have expressed, that if you refer to the devise of the Sussex estate, it does [271] not in the slightest degree tend to vary the opinion which I should have formed merely from the disposition of the estate which is now in question.

Mr. Wigram.—There is a large fund standing to the credit of the Bedfordshire estate, and I do not understand that the respondents ask to have the judgment affirmed with costs.

Lord Lyndhurst.—In a question of this sort it should be without costs.

Lord Brougham.—I have said so.

The decree was then affirmed, without costs.

Will—Missing codicil—Uncertainty.

A testator gave to his executors beneficially, in equal proportions, all his property, which he might not dispose of, subject to his debts and any bequests which he might afterwards make. He afterwards made a codicil in these words, "In a codicil to my will I gave to the corporation of Gloucester £140,000. In this I wish my executors would give £60,000 more to them, for the same purpose as I have before named. I would also give my friends" (several were named, with large legacies), "and I confirm all other bequests, and give the rest of my property to the executors for their own interest." No other codicil was produced.

Held (affirming a decree of the Court of Chancery on a bill filed by the Corporation of Gloucester claiming the two legacies), that the purpose of both the legacies must be held to be the same, and that both failed for uncertainty of the purpose.

James Wood, of the City of Gloucester, banker, died in April, 1836, seised of considerable freehold estates, and possessed of a very large personal estate, estimated at about £800,000.

In December 1841, the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, after much litigation there (2 Curtis, 82), and before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council upon appeal (2 Moore's Priv. C. Cas. 355), granted probate of the three following testamentary papers to Sir Matthew Wood, Jacob Osborn, and John S. Surman, the surviving executors named in the first:

(A) "Instructions for the will of me, James Wood, esq., of Gloucester. I request my friends Alderman, Wood, of [273] London, M.P., John Chadborn, of Gloucester, Jacob Osborn, of Gloucester, and John S. Surman, of Gloucester, to be my executors, and I appoint them executors accordingly; and I desire that they will take possession of and retain to themselves all my ready monies, securities, and personal estate, subject to the payment of my just debts, and such legacies as I may hereafter direct; and with respect to my real estate, I shall dispose of the same to such persons and in such parts as I shall by any writing endorsed herein direct. Witness my hand this 2d December, 1834.—JAMES WOOD.”

(B) “I, James Wood, esq., do declare this to be my will for disposing my estates as directed by my instructions:—I declare my wish that my executors shall have all my property which I may not dispose of, and that all my estates, real and personal, shall go amongst them and their heirs in equal proportions, subject to my debts and to any legacies or bequests of any part thereof, if any, which I may hereafter make. In witness whereof I have to this my last will set my hand, this 3d December, 1834.

“(Signed, in presence of three witnesses) JAMES WOOD.”

(C) “In a codicil to my will I gave to the Corporation of Gloucester £140,000. In this I wish my executors would give £60,000 more to them for the same purpose as I have before named. I would also give to my friends Mr. Phillpotts £50,000 and Mr. George Council £10,000.” [Four others were then named with large legacies, amounting together to £54,000.] “And I confirm all other bequests, and give the rest of my property to the executors for their own interest.—JAMES WOOD.

“Gloucester City, Old Bank, July 1835.”

The papers (A) and (B) were propounded by the executors, and paper (C) by some of the legatees therein named.

Upon probate of these papers being granted, the appel-[274]-lants filed a bill in the Court of Chancery against the executors, for payment of the two sums of £140,000 and £60,000. The bill was afterwards amended, and the Attorney General was made a party defendant.

Sir Matthew Wood, by his answer, said that several testamentary papers alleged to have been signed by the testator before December 1834, were referred to in the suit in the Prerogative Court, but no testamentary paper of his was found in his house after his death, save the said papers (A) and (B), and another paper writing made in 1834, expressive of his wish that John Chadborn should have the custody of his deeds and management of his affairs. And defendant stated that to the best of his knowledge and belief the testator did not in 1835, or at any time, make or sign the codicil (C), or any such codicil as was there referred to; and if he ever gave such legacies as there mentioned to the Corporation of Gloucester, the purpose for which they were given could not be ascertained, and they were therefore void.

The answers of the respondents, Osborn and Surman, were to the same purport and effect, with this addition in Surman's, that even if paper (C) should be held to be valid—which he submitted to the judgment of the Court—yet the legacy of £140,000 must be deemed to be revoked by revocation of the alleged codicil referred to in paper (C) by the testator, which revocation, defendant submitted, must be presumed from the circumstance of such alleged codicil not being discovered since the testator's death. And this defendant insisted further, that assuming that no such revocation had taken place, or could be presumed, then the two alleged legacies were void for uncertainty.

The Attorney General answered that he was a stranger to the matters stated in the bill, and he claimed, on behalf of charities generally, all such rights as he might be found entitled to.

[275] Vice Chancellor Sir J. Wigram heard the cause in July 1843, and in the November following gave his judgment, ordering the bill to be dismissed, without costs; and refusing to declare that such dismissal should be without prejudice to the appellants filing another bill for the said legacies (see the judgment, 3 Hare, 136).

The appeal was against that order.

Sir Thomas Wilde and Mr. Swanston (Mr. James Wilde was with them) for the appellants:

The question for decision arises on the codicil (paper C). The original bill alleged a prior codicil, but the defendants having, in their answers, denied the existence of it, that allegation was struck out by amendment, and the claim to the two legacies now rests on this codicil alone. But although the missing codicil was so withdrawn from the consideration of the Court, the Vice Chancellor founded his judgment on its absence, declaring that without it he could not ascertain what the purpose was for which the legacies were given. And his Honour, without directing any enquiry as to the existence of that codicil, dismissed the bill, and refused to declare that the dismissal was without prejudice to the appellants' right to file a new bill, by which the circumstances in evidence before the Court of Probate, in reference to the missing codicil, might be brought before the Court. Under these circumstances it was now submitted to their Lordships, that they would find enough in the papers before them to justify them in holding the appellants entitled to the legacies, or, if not, that they would direct an enquiry as to the missing codicil by declaring the appellants entitled to file another bill for that purpose.

The Vice Chancellor's judgment proceeded on an erroneous principle; he ought to have confined his view to the papers proved in the cause, and construed them without [276] out any reference to another paper, which was not proved or propounded.—

[The Lord Chancellor.—That proposition is too broad. Suppose a testator, by his will, gave £1000 for a purpose mentioned in his marriage settlement. That settlement, of course, is not admitted to probate, but the judge, in construing the will, is bound to refer to it to ascertain the purpose for which the legacy is given.]

Then, if reference to the missing codicil was necessary, it was the duty of the judge to direct an issue or inquiry, as asked by the appellants, relative to the testator's testamentary papers, and the executors' dealings with them, in order that the facts might be ascertained, and the proper legal conclusions drawn from them in respect of the existence or non-existence of the missing codicil, and its custody and non-production. The Vice Chancellor, instead of directing such inquiry, drew fancied conclusions from an imaginary document.

The appellants submit, with confidence, that the codicil of July 1835 alone amounts to a substantive gift of the legacy of £140,000. The reference in that codicil to a former codicil does not prove that the former one ever existed; even though it may be considered as having once existed, yet the gift of £140,000 referred to as made thereby, is not revoked, and the non-production of such former codicil does not affect the validity of the gift of either the £140,000 or the £60,000. The codicil in the cause shews a still existing intention to give the £140,000, as well as the “£60,000 more.” The words of reference to the supposed codicil, whether it was ever made or not, or, being made, was revoked, shew a subsequently revived intention to give the sum of £140,000. The gift of that sum is unconnected with any purpose whatsoever.

It appears clear from all the testamentary papers that the testator was an illiterate man, so that it would be unsafe to rely on his use of words in their ordinary sense. [277] The word “purpose” in the codicil—if the testator annexed any meaning to it—is capable of three distinct interpretations: to two of them, the purpose of benefiting his native town, or the corporation individually, the objection of uncertainty would not attach. To the third interpretation alone, that the gift was made to the appellants, for the benefit of some private individual, the objection would be fatal. But it is hardly credible, “highly improbable,” as the Vice Chancellor himself said—that the purpose of the gift was for a private person. Would not the testator rather give the individual the legacy directly, as he gave several other legacies by the same codicil? Or would he not make his friends and well paid executors, rather than a changeable body, such as a corporation, trustees for the individual? But if the “purpose” of the bequest was for the public benefit of the testator's native town, or for beneficial enjoyment by the Corporation, then it was reasonable to transfer the trouble of administering it from the executors of the Corporation.

This construction of the bequest is not affected by the objection of uncertainty. A Court of construction never requires positive certainty of purpose to establish a testamentary gift. Lord Ellenborough says, in Driver v. Frank (3 Maule and Selw., p. 50), “When I speak of certainty, I must be understood to speak of moral certainty, the only certainty which relates to this subject; and hardly any certainty upon any moral subject can be predicated, which does not admit some degree of mere possibility to the contrary.” It is the intention that the Court tries to find; and if of two constructions of ambiguous words in a will, one is improbable and inconsistent, and the other is consistent and probable, the Court will adopt the latter, and will ever prefer the construction which preserves the gift to that which destroys it. In Wright v. Atkins (G. Coop. Ch. Cas. p. 122), Lord Eldon says, “The cases at law amount to this, that if a man de-[278]-vises to A. B., with remainder to his family, inasmuch as the Court never will hold a devise to be too uncertain, unless no fair construction can be put upon it, the heir at law, as the worthiest of the family, is the person taken to be described by the word 'family.' Lord Brougham makes similar observations in Winter v. Perratt (9 Clark and Fin. 687).

The word "purpose" applies to the gift of £60,000 only. But a legacy given for a purpose not ascertainable, is not therefore void, inasmuch as the indication of purpose is not inconsistent with the intention of beneficial enjoyment of the legacy by the legatee; and an intention that he should take the legacy upon trust, is not to be presumed without express words or necessary implication; Cook v. Fountain (3 Swans. 591). If the testator gave these legacies upon "trust," using that word instead of "purpose," and then stopped, the trust would fail for uncertainty of the object; Per Lord Eldon, in Morice v. The Bishop of Durham (10 Ves. 527-35). And so also if precatory words—words of request, desire, or recommendation, which create a trust—are annexed to a gift, unless both the subject and object are certain, the legatee takes the gift absolutely, unless the circumstances are such as amount to an intestacy (id., p. 536, et seq.); King v. Denison (1 Ves. and B. 260), Walton v. Walton (14 Ves. 322), Gibbs v. Rumsey (2 Ves. and B. 294), Cruwys v. Colman (9 Ves. 319-23), Paul v. Compton (8 Ves. 375-80), Pierson v. Garnet (2 Bro. C. C. 41), Pushman v. Filliter (3 Ves. 7), Ommaney v. Butcher (Turn. and R. 270), Hill v. The Bishop of London (1 Atk. 618), Dashwood v. Peyton (18 Ves. 41), Benson v. Whittam (5 Sim. 19), Thorp v. Owen (2 Hare, 607). The same principle governs the Courts in sustaining defective ex-[279]-cutions of powers of appointment; Wilson v. Piggott (2 Ves., jun., 351), Poulson v. Wellington (2 P. Wms. 533), Fortescue v. Gregor (5 Ves. 553), Alloway v. Alloway (4 Dru. and War. 380).

The Courts struggle to prevent intestacy by supplying deficiencies of expression, and presuming testators' intentions, rather than leave their bequests liable to the objection of uncertainty; Castledon v. Turner (3 Atk. 258), Fox v. Collins (2 Eden. 107), Humphreys v. Humphreys (2 Cox, 185), Phillips v. Chamberlaine (4 Ves. 51), Price v. Page (id. 680), Garvey v. Hibbert (19 Ves. 125), Tomkins v. Tomkins (19 Ves. 126, note (b)), Mildred v. Robinson (id. 588), Sheratt v. Bentley (2 Myl. and K. 149).

These are only a few of the authorities which support the principle that the Courts will put a forced construction on the words, in order to give effect to the testator's intention where it can be ascertained. It is not the fault of the appellants, if, without the missing codicil, the Court cannot clearly ascertain the purpose of this gift; for that the respondents are responsible, as not producing all the testamentary papers. But there are many cases in which a bequest by recital of it, or by reference, as in this case, to a missing paper, containing the purpose of it, was sustained; Martin v. Douch and Overton (1 Chan. Cas. 198), Baylis and Church v. The Attorney General (2 Atk. 239), Dormer v. Bishop Burnett, cited in Downing v. Townsend (Amb. 280), Bibin v. Walker (Amb. 661), Smith v. Fitzgerald (3 Ves. and B., p. 7), Knewell v. Gardiner (Gilb. Cas. 184). In Druce v. Denison (6 Ves., p. 397), Lord Eldon says, that "if a testator, by a subsequent paper, says he has bequeathed by [280] a former instrument that, which he has not bequeathed, the Ecclesiastical Courts will hold that subsequent paper a disposition, as being a declaration of his will at the time he made it to dispose by the will, not in terms expressing that it is then his will, but that he has disposed of it before." In Vaughan v. Foakes (1 Keen, 61), Lord Langdale says, "A recital of what a testator had done, or supposed he had done, may amount to a gift."

If these be not gifts to the Corporation of Gloucester for their beneficial enjoyment, it is submitted that they take them in their corporate capacity for public or charitable purposes; Attorney General v. Syderfen (1 Vern. 224), Mills v. Farmer (1 Meriv. 55), Commissioners of Charitable Donations v. Sullivan (1 Dru. and War. 501), Incorporated Society v. Richards (id. 294), Stat. 5 and 6 W. 4, c. 76, s. 71, et seq., Sonley v. Clockmakers' Company (1 Bro. C.C. 81), Widmore v. Woodrooffe (Amb. 636).

Mr. Turner for the respondent Osborn, and Sir F. Kelly for Surman,* argued that the gifts of both sums of £140,000 and £60,000 were connected with the same purpose, and the purpose being unknown, the Court could not presume it; both gifts therefore were void for the uncertainty. [The arguments on these points are comprised in the Vice Chancellor's judgment, 3 Hare, pp. 141, 145.]

* Mr. Walker, Mr. Hodgson, Mr. J. Parker, Mr. Rolt, and Mr. Jolliffe, were with them. The Attorney General was not a party to the appeal.

[The Lord Chancellor.—Suppose these were gifts to the trustees of the British Museum, "for a purpose before mentioned," but which was not mentioned, would it not be presumed that they were gifts to the trustees for the general purposes within the scope of their duty?]

There is no case in which the Court has ever gone so far as to presume the contents of a paper not produced, [281] and founded its decision upon them. That would be to presume the intention of the testator; Mills v. Farmer (1 Meriv. 55), Wheeler v. Sheer, as explained by Lord Eldon in the case of Moggridge v. Thackwell (7 Ves. 36: see p. 79).

There could be no doubt that by the word "purpose" it was the intention to create a trust; Stubbs v. Sargon (3 Myl. and C. 507). The case of Martin v. Douch and Overton (1 Cas. in Chan. 198) is not to be relied on as authority for the point for which it was cited. Dormer v. Bishop Burnett (cited in Amb. 280), and other cases of that sort, referred to by the appellants, are of doubtful authority, and are neutralised by recent decisions; Jerningham v. Herbert (4 Russ. 388).

They submitted that there was no gift at all of the £140,000, even if it was to be held unconnected with, and independent of, the word "purpose." There was no case cited in which the recital of a gift was construed to be a gift. The reference to this gift was only a mere supposition of the testator that he had given that sum; he did not recite it as a present gift, and therefore the principle of Bibin v. Walker (Amb. 661), Smith v. Fitzgerald (3 Ves. and B. 7), Vaughan v. Foakes (1 Keen, 61), Wilson v. Piggott (2 Ves., jun. 351), Dashwood v. Peyton (18 Ves. 41), Shelley v. Bryer (Jac. 207), and other cases, in which the Court assumed the intention and supplied words of gift, were not applicable to this case:—

[The Lord Chancellor.—What is the meaning of "£60,000 more?" Does not the addition show some prior gift?]

The recital that the testator had given the £140,000 does not operate to give effect to it as a gift. Suppose the "purpose"—with which both sums are clearly connected—was unlawful or impossible, or subject to conditions which the [282] Court would not enforce; such supposition shows at once the danger of holding the recital to operate as a gift.

[The Lord Chancellor.—If the gift was for a charitable purpose, the Court would give it effect, though the particular charitable purpose could not be ascertained.]

Certainly; but the Court would not presume it was for a charity, where charity was not mentioned. There may be a thousand other purposes besides charity, legal or illegal. There would be the greatest danger in presuming a testator's intention in one paper by reference to it in another paper. The gift may have been intended for accumulation beyond the legal period, or for corrupting parliamentary electors, or for other illegal purposes.

If the testator had intended these gifts for the beneficial enjoyment of the Corporation, would he not give the legacies to them unqualifiedly, as he did to his several friends mentioned in the same codicil?

In support of the arguments that the gifts failed for uncertainty of the purpose, with which both were evidently connected, and that even if they were presumed to be given in trust for a charitable purpose, such trust could not take effect, as being too indefinite, they cited, among other cases before referred to, West v. Palmer (1 Chan. Cas. 224), Collins v. Wakeman (2 Ves., jun. 383), Sonley v. The Clockmakers' Company (1 Bro. C. C. 81), Morice v. The Bishop of Durham (9 Ves. 399; 10 Ves. 522), Doe v. Aldridge (4 T. Rep. 264), Sandford v. Raikes (1 Meriv. 646), Nash v. Morley (5 Beav. 177), Kendal v. Granger (5 Beav. 300), Ellis v. Selby (7 Sim. 352; 1 Myl. and C. 286), Williams v. Kershaw (5 Clark and Fin. 111 n.), and the Incorporated Society v. Richards (1 Dru. and War. 258). They insisted that the cases of Martin v. Overton (1 Ch. Cas. 198; Salk. 150), Dormer v. Bishop Burnett (cited in Amb. 280), and Baylis [283] v. The Attorney General (2 Atk. 239), relied on by the appellants, were too brief in the reports, differed in their circumstances from the present case, and the reasons given for the judgments were clearly wrong, or at all events inconsistent with subsequent decisions.

As to the objection to the decree of the Court below for dismissing the bill without reserving to the appellants the right without prejudice to file a new bill, they insisted that that was a matter in which the Court exercised its best discretion on a full view of the pleadings.

Sir T. Wilde, in reply, urged the arguments before addressed to the House for the appellants, and in conclusion implored their Lordships, in case they should not reverse the judgment, not to part with the case without giving directions for further inquiry respecting the missing codicil.

The case stood over for consideration.

Lord Lyndhurst (July 21, 1817).—The testator made a codicil to his will, dated July 1835, in the following terms: "In a codicil to his will I gave to the Corporation of Gloucester £140,000. In this I wish that my executors would give £60,000 more to them for the same purpose as I have before named." He then, after bequeathing several large sums as legacies to different individuals, "confirms all other bequests, and gives the rest of his property to his executors, for their own interest." The appellants claim under this codicil the £140,000 and the £60,000.

The codicil refers to a former codicil. No such codicil has been produced. All we know of it is from the reference contained in the codicil of July 1835. The question upon this state of facts, therefore, is, what construction ought to be put by a court of justice upon the produced [284] codicil? I confess that neither during the arguments at your Lordships' bar, nor at any time since, have I been able to bring my mind to entertain any doubt upon this question, and nothing but the very large amount of the sums in controversy, and the irrevocable effect of your Lordships' decision could have led me to pause upon the subject.

First, then as to the construction of the gift of £60,000:

The Vice Chancellor, in the judgment appealed from, first considered what would have been the proper construction of the codicil, if that legacy had been to an individual; and, secondly, whether any difference would result from the corporate character of the legatees. This was a convenient course, as much stress was laid at the bar (and properly laid) on the circumstance that the gift was to a municipal corporation. Looking then at the instrument, the testator, after stating what he had already given to the Corporation of Gloucester, in a former codicil, proceeds to say, "In this I wish my executors would give £60,000 more to them for the same purpose as I have before named." When the testator speaks of the purpose he before named, to what is he referring? Where, and upon what occasion, was the purpose named? Obviously, I think, in the former codicil. He does not indeed tell us in terms where he had named the purpose, but the natural, and, I think, the only reasonable construction of the passage is, that he had before named the purpose in the former codicil, to which he was then referring, and in which that legacy was given.

But the former codicil is not produced, no account is given of it, and we have therefore no means of ascertaining the purpose for which the gift was made, or to what it is to be applied. In the same sentence in which the legacy is given, and immediately after the words of gift, the gift is stated to be for a purpose which the testator [285] had defined, but which is wholly unknown and cannot be discovered. How then could the legatee be allowed to take the legacy for his own use? The purpose is a qualification of the legacy; it is an essential part of it, and till this is ascertained, it is wholly uncertain what the legatee is to take, whether for his own benefit, or for the benefit of others; and for whom, whether for private purposes or for public or charitable objects. It is, therefore, I think clear, that if the legacy had been to an individual, it must have altogether failed. What the testator intended—whom he meant to benefit—does not appear, and cannot be ascertained.

But a distinction had been taken on the ground that the legacy is to a municipal corporation. It is said that a court would presume that a gift to a municipal corporation was for a public object; that, in fact, the property of the Corporation, which the appellants represent, is, by the act 5 and 6 Will. 4, chap. 76, entirely applicable to such purposes—purposes which come within the legal interpretation of charitable objects; and that even if the objects were not fully ascertained, if the purposes of the bequest were charitable, the Court could supply the omission. This is undoubtedly true; and I agree with the Vice Chancellor that the probability is that the legacy was given for some purpose that would be considered to be a charitable purpose. But it cannot, at the same time, be denied that a municipal corporation may take property in trust for the benefit of individuals, and for purposes altogether private, and it is impossible to say, with that degree of legal certainty which would justify your Lordships in giving effect to this bequest, that such was not the case in the present instance.

For these reasons, which in substance are the same, though less elaborately stated than those upon which the Vice Chancellor rested his decision, I have come to the [286] conclusion that the legacy of £60,000 must fail. The same reasoning and the same objections will apply to the legacy of £140,000. I submit to your Lordships, therefore, that the judgment of the Court below should be affirmed.

I beg leave to state, that the Lord Chancellor, who is unable to give his attendance here to-day, entirely concurs in this opinion. He was present during the whole of the argument.

Lord Brougham.—This case, though of very large amount, £140,000 and £60,000, making £200,000 altogether, appears to me to rest upon exceedingly plain and simple grounds. I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend in the view which he has taken of the bequest, both as regards the first argument on the construction of the bequest, and the second argument with respect to its possible application. I am clearly of opinion that the right construction has been put upon it by the Court below, that it fails altogether, and that the property in question goes according to the destination pointed out by the decree; and, therefore I agree with my noble and learned friend's proposition to your Lordships, that this judgment should be affirmed.

Under the peculiar circumstances of the case (I do not enter into details), I submit to your Lordships that it is not a case in which costs should be given.

Lord Campbell.—In the course of my experience, I never read a judgment more cautiously expressed, and better reasoned than that of his Honour the Vice Chancellor Wigram in this case. I have only to state to your Lordships, that after having carefully considered the arguments on both sides, I entirely concur in the judgment which has been proposed.

The appeal was accordingly dismissed, and the decree appealed from was affirmed, without costs.

Policy of Insurance—Total loss.

A vessel is totally lost, within the meaning of a policy, when it becomes, as a ship, of no use or value to the owner, and is as much lost as if it had gone to the bottom of the sea, or had been broken to pieces, and the whole or great part of the fragments had reached the shore as wreck.

A loss is also to be considered as total where a prudent owner, if uninsured, would not have repaired.

In a valued policy the agreed total value is conclusive.

A policy of insurance is not a perfect contract of indemnity. It must be taken with this qualification, that the parties may agree before hand in estimating the value of the subject assured by way of liquidated damages.

A ship was insured in a policy, in which the value was stated at £17,500. The ship was injured by storms, was surveyed, and the repairs were estimated at £10,500. When repaired, the vessel would have been of the marketable value of £9000. The assured abandoned and claimed as for a total loss. The jury found that, under the circumstances existing in the case, a prudent owner, uninsured, would not have repaired the vessel:

Held, by the Lords, affirming the judgment of the Court below, that the assured could recover as for a total loss.

This was a writ of error on a judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, which had affirmed a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, in an action of assumpsit brought against John Irving, the defendant in the Court [288] below, as the representative of the Alliance Marine Insurance Company. The plaintiffs below were the managing owners of a vessel called the General Kyd, upon which a policy of insurance had been effected with this Company for the sum of £3000. The ship was valued in the policy at £17,500, and was insured for a voyage "at and from China to Madras, while there, and back to China, not east of Hong Kong, with leave to call at the Straits." The first count of the declaration was on this policy, and the loss claimed was a total loss, which was averred to have happened through the perils of the sea. There were the usual money counts. The defendant pleaded to the first count that the vessel was not wholly lost in manner and form, etc.; and to the remaining counts non assumpsit.

The cause was tried before Mr. Justice Cresswell, at Guildhall, at the sittings after Trinity Term, 1844, when a verdict was found for the plaintiffs. The facts were stated in the form of a case for the opinion of the Court, and were afterwards turned into a special verdict, which stated that on the 6th June, 1843, the plaintiffs effected with the defendants the policy on their ship, the General Kyd, for the purpose of bona fide covering and protecting themselves from the loss of the said ship, together with its stores, seamen's wages, and other matters not constituting part of the permanent value of the ship; that no insurance was effected by them on the freight; that the ship was of the burthen of one thousand three hundred and eighteen tons; was built originally, and at great expense, for and employed in the trade of the East India Company, and was, on the said East India Company ceasing to trade, sold to the plaintiffs for £11,000; that at the time of effecting the policy the ship was, together with stores, seamen's wages, and other matters not constituting part of the permanent value of the ship, of the value to the plaintiffs of £17,500, and was insured for that sum; that the plaintiffs were interested, as the declaration set forth, [289] and that the ship set sail on the voyage mentioned; that during the risk, and while prosecuting the voyage, the ship was damaged by perils of the sea, so as to become incompetent to proceed on the said voyage, unless repaired as after mentioned; that the necessary expenditure to repair such damage, so as to render the ship sea worthy, and competent to proceed on the voyage, would have amounted to a sum of not less than £10,500, and that if such repairs had been done, and such expenditure had been incurred, the ship being so repaired would have been worth a sum not exceeding £9000, and which was its marketable value, as well at the period of effecting the said policy, as also immediately before the said damage; that a prudent owner, being uninsured, would not have repaired the vessel, and that the vessel was duly abandoned to the underwriters.

The question was, whether, under the circumstances set forth in the special verdict, the defendant was liable as for a total loss. The Court of Common Pleas gave judgment for the plaintiffs (1 Com. Bench Rep. 168). The defendant brought a writ of error in the Exchequer Chamber where that judgment was affirmed (by Lord Chief Baron Pollock, Justices Patteson, Coleridge, and Wightman, and Barons Parke, Alderson, and Rolfe; see 2 Com. B. 784). The writ of error was then brought in this House. The judges were summoned, and Barons Parke and Alderson, Justices Patteson, Coleridge, Coltman, and Maule, Baron Rolfe, Justices Wightman and Cresswell, Baron Platt, and Justices Erle and Vaughan Williams, attended their Lordships.

Sir F. Kelly, and Mr. Serjt. Channell (Mr. Lathom J. Browne was with them) for the plaintiff in error.—The judgment of the Court below rests upon the authority of two cases; Allen v. Sugrue (8 Barn. and Cres. 561; 3 Man. and Ryl. 9), and Young v. Turing (2 Man. and Gr. 593; 2 Scott, N. R. 752). It is submitted that the principle declared in both those cases, that there is, in respect of a question of partial or total loss, no distinction between an open and a valued policy, is erroneous, and that, at all events, such a principle cannot govern the decision in this case.

There are three classes of cases in which total loss may occur. The first is where the ship absolutely sinks and is in fact lost; the second, where the ship itself may not be in fact totally lost, but may be unable to continue the voyage, being injured past repair; and the third, where the ship can be repaired, but the expense of repair will be so considerable, that after the repairs have been effected, the vessel will fetch less in the market than the sum expended in repairing it. This third class is now known as the class of a constructive, total loss. The present case is of that class; and the owners insist that they may refuse to expend a sum of £10,500 in repairs; may therefore convert a loss which is only partial, and capable of reparation, into a total loss; may thereby cast on the insurers a loss of £17,500, and thus gain a large profit on the loss of their vessel. It is submitted that they are not entitled to this advantage.

Nothing is clearer than that a policy of insurance is a contract of indemnity, and in no case will the law give the party insured more than an indemnity. If the assured can here recover as for a total loss he will obtain more than an indemnity; he will do so even upon his own statement of the value of the thing insured. The policy is on the ship alone; stores and other matters are not insured. The ship is not said to be worth £17,500, but to be so together with stores, provisions, and seamen's wages. To allow the assured to recover the whole of that sum will be to allow him to recover more than an indemnity for the thing he has insured, by taking into calculation things which he has not insured.

[291] But he will also obtain more than an indemnity, even with regard to the ship itself, if he should be allowed to recover as for a total loss. Under the circumstances which exist in this case, the vessel might have been repaired, and might have continued the voyage. The voyage was not, therefore, totally lost, it might have been continued had the vessel been repaired, and a profitable freight might have been earned. The assured was not entitled to make this question one of a comparison of advantages and disadvantages, and on the balance of that comparison to decide, to put an end to the thing insured, and claim as for a total loss. The practice of claiming a total loss where the ship is not past repairing, is one of very modern origin. It is one of a dangerous kind, and may introduce fraud into insurance cases.

Although the law considers the ship, upon being abandoned, to be totally lost, still, when that abandonment takes place upon a valued policy, and the value on the policy so far exceeds that which is proved to be the real value of the ship, the law will not allow the assured to recover the value stated in the policy, for that would be to break through a great legal principle, and to give the assured more than an indemnity. There are several cases in which the party has not been permitted to recover more than the actual value of the ship. Hamilton v. Mendez (1 Sir W. Bl. 276; 2 Burr. 1198) is one of that kind. There the ship had been captured, and recaptured, and abandoned, but the recapture of the vessel having been effected, and the vessel brought safe into port before action brought, the Court held (2 Burr. 1214) that "the plaintiff, upon a policy, can only recover an indemnity according to the nature of his case, at the time of the action brought, or, at most, at the time of his offer to abandon." The case of Lewis v. Rucker (2 Burr. 1167) [292] is to the same effect, when the principle adopted in that case comes to be attentively considered; for there it was distinctly said (2 Burr. 1171) that "the only effect of the valuation is fixing the amount of the prime cost," and the assured only recovered the real amount of the loss.

It is true that, in the case of a valued policy, where there has been an actual total loss, no question can arise as to the sum to be paid to the assured, for that sum has been fixed by the policy itself, which, according to Lord Mansfield in the cases just cited, definitively settles what shall be taken as the prime cost of the things insured; but where, as in this case, the loss has not been an actual total loss, but the owner has the option to repair or abandon, it is not consistent with justice, nor can it be reconciled to the policy of the law, that the assured shall receive the whole value agreed upon in the policy, when that has only been agreed upon as that which is to be paid in the event of an actual total loss. That agreement can only be carried into effect where the loss is actually total. Here the ship would be, when repaired, of the value of £9000, and it cannot be said that, that being so, the underwriters must pay the sum of £17,500.

It cannot be contended that, because the policy is a valued policy, the sum stated in it is conclusive as against the insurer, and against him alone. The case of Hamilton v. Mendez (1 Sir W. Bl. 276; 2 Burr. 1197), already cited, shews that the real amount of the loss may be considered upon a valued policy. And the case of Forbes v. Aspinall (13 East, 323) is even more directly an authority for that proposition. There, upon a valued policy upon freight, the plaintiff was only allowed to recover for the freight on the fifty-five bales of cotton actually on board at the time of the loss. And in accordance with that doctrine is the opinion of Mr. [293] Justice Story, as quoted in an American work on Insurance (Phillips on Insurance, vol. 2, p. 273), where it is said, "In giving an opinion on this question, Mr. Justice Story says,—'In what respect does the case of the ship differ from the case of the goods, as to the ascertainment of the damage? Can the valuation in the policy be a more correct guide in the one case than in the other? The question in each case is necessarily the same—what is the present value of the property compared with its value before the injury? and for the same purpose; to fix the extent of the damage sustained by the accident. One should suppose that this was the true measure of the damage in all cases in which it is attainable. The valuation on the policy cannot, in the case of the ship, any more than of the goods, measure the proportion of the damage, because the value may, in the mean time, have essentially changed. And yet it is that proportion which is the object of the inquiry. The law deems the ship worth repair, unless injured more than half its value. At what time?—Surely at the time of the injury.'—Peele v. The Merchants Insurance Company (3 Mason, 27). The doctrine of Mr. Justice Story has been distinctly adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States; Patapasco Insurance Company v. Southgate" (5 Pet. S. C. R. 604).

In the next page of that work it is said, "On the other hand the Supreme Court of Massachusetts has laid down the doctrine, that the rule of abandonment for damage over half of the value, refers to the value in the policy. . . . In the first of the decisions referred to, this Court says the value in the policy is prima facie, and, in the absence of other testimony, the true value. Winn v. The Colonial Insurance Company" (11 Pick., 279). But this doctrine, in laying down which Mr. Justice Story himself took part, [294] does not in reality contradict the former, for it admits that "other testimony" may be given to shew the true value, and if so, the value stated in the policy ceases to be conclusive between the parties. It is, therefore, submitted that the policy must, in the case of a merely constructive total loss, be treated as an open policy, and the real amount of the loss must be ascertained. If, as the assured contend, the policy is to be treated as an open policy, when the question of the propriety of repairing the ship is under consideration, it must equally be so treated when the amount payable in respect of the loss is to be determined. It is open for all or closed for all purposes. If it is closed for all, then it is clear that the owners had no right to abandon on account of the expence of repairing, and then to claim for a total loss; for the ship existed in specie and might have been repaired, and, being repaired, would then have been a good sea risk. The principle adopted in Hamilton v. Mendez (which case was not cited either in Allen v. Sugrue, or in Young v. Turing) is that which must govern the present case. The judgment of the Court below is in contradiction to the first principles of marine insurance law, and must be reversed.

The Attorney General and Sir F. Thesiger (Mr. Greenwood was with them) for the defendants in error.

The question here is not, what is the amount to be paid? but has there, or has there not been a total loss? For the purposes of this case there is no distinction between an open and a valued policy. If so, the assured was entitled to recover, for there can be no doubt that the loss here was a total loss. The facts shew it to be so, and it is so found in the special verdict, which declares that, under the circumstances existing in this case, a prudent owner being uninsured would not have repaired the vessel. It is contended that the fact of the policy being a valued policy cannot affect the question of the right to recover [295] as for a total loss, when the loss is shewn to be in the nature of a total loss.

It is said that a policy of insurance is a mere contract for indemnity, and the main objection to the right of the assured rests upon that argument. It is in some respects a contract of indemnity, but not so as to prevent the right of the assured to recover as for a total loss upon the assessment of that total loss made in the policy itself. That this is a valued policy cannot affect the question, whether this is a case of total loss or not. It would have been a total loss upon an open policy, and the special verdict finds that the circumstances of the loss were such that a prudent uninsured owner would not have repaired the vessel. Upon an open policy it is therefore clear that the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover for a total loss; why should he not do so upon this which is a valued policy? This is an attempt to overturn the decision in Allen v. Sugrue (8 Barn. and Cr. 561; 3 Man. and Ry. 9), which has been recognized as an authority ever since it occurred. It is true that neither in that case, nor in Young v. Turing (2 Man. and Gr. 593; 2 Scott, N. C. 752), which confirmed and adopted the former, was the case of Hamilton v. Mendez referred to. But it is impossible to doubt that that case was known to the counsel who argued, and the judges who decided both the latter cases, and that it was not cited simply because it was not deemed applicable; and it is not, for the only question there was to what extent the goods insured had been injured. It is not denied that a policy of insurance is in some respects a contract of indemnity, but that indemnity is not to be measured by the mere amount for which the vessel would sell at the moment of the abandonment being made. If that measure of value was alone applied to it, the assured would not be indemnified. The indemnity is to be measured by what [296] was agreed to be the value of the ship when the insurance was made. That was the rule which the Court applied in the case of Shaw v. Felton (2 East, 109), though there the value of the thing insured was daily becoming less during the voyage. There an insurance was effected on ship and goods, valued at a certain sum, on a voyage to Africa and the West Indies. The assured was held entitled to recover on a total loss which happened at the latest period of the voyage, although a considerable part of the estimated value consisted of stores and provisions for the purchase and sustenance of slaves during the voyage. The judgments of Mr. Justice Lawrence and Mr. Justice Le Blanc are important on this point. The former said (2 East, 115), "As the practice of binding parties as to the amount of their interest by valued policies has obtained ever since the statute of Geo. II., it would require very strong reasons to show that it is wrong. The effect of a valued policy is not to conclude the underwriter, and prevent him from showing that the assured had no interest, and that in fact it was a mere wagering policy within the statute; but in order to avoid disputes as to the quantum of the assured's interest, the parties agree that it shall be estimated at a certain value. Here it is not pretended that the subject matter of the insurance was not of the value estimated in the policy. Then how does this differ from the case of an open policy in this respect. Would it not be sufficient for the assured in an open policy to prove that at the time the ship sailed the subject matter of the insurance was of such a value? Is not that the period to look to, and not the state of the thing at the time of the total loss happening?" And Mr. Justice Le Blanc said (2 East, 116), "The value of the property must be continually diminishing, and if the loss should happen at the latter end of a long voyage, no doubt the [297] property must be considerably deteriorated by the usual wear and tear, and yet it is never objected that the underwriter is not liable for the original value." There is no authority whatever which supports the doctrine that the assured is not entitled to recover beyond the actual loss, as measured by the value of the ship at the moment that loss occurs, while both these judgments lay down an exactly opposite rule. The case of Allen v. Sugrue is opposed to such a doctrine as that which is contended for on the other side; and there are two cases which occurred between the period of the decision of Allen v. Sugrue and Young v. Turing, both of which proceed on the principles recognized and adopted in those decisions. One of these is the case of Edington v. Jackson (tried at York in the year 1832) before Mr. Baron Alderson. The notes taken in that case, by Mr. Justice Cresswell then at the bar, on an application for a new trial, give this account of the case. The action was on a valued policy, and there Lord Tenterden said it may be prudent not to have a valued policy, but we must decide the question of total loss or not just as we should in a case of an open policy; and the Court, composed of Justices Littledale, Parke, and Patteson, expressly concurred with that opinion. The other case was that of Herne v. Ray, before Mr. Justice Maule (tried at Liverpool, in the year 1842), in which that learned judge expressly adopted the rule as laid down in the case of Allen v. Sugrue, and his ruling there was never afterwards questioned. Then came the case of Young v. Turing (2 Man. and Gr. 593; 2 Scott, N. C. 752), and considering the circumstances in that case, it is impossible to imagine a stronger authority for the doctrine now contended for on the part of the defendants in error. In delivering the judgment of the Court, Lord Chief Justice Tindal said (2 Man. and Gr., 601; 2 Sc., N. C. 761), "I am not aware of any [298] case or principle in the law of insurance which makes the estimated value in the policy a circumstance on which the question of total or partial loss ought to turn. The agreed value in the policy of the subject insured is intended to save the expence and doubt that may attend the investigation of value, as affecting the quantum of compensation only. It may operate, according to events, to the advantage or detriment of either party; and where no fraud exists, both are bound by it." No cases can be cited to impeach the doctrine thus distinctly laid down, and the attempt now made is therefore a mere attempt to avoid its application to the present case. It is, in substance, contended on the other side, that the fact of a policy being valued, ought to be taken into consideration in deciding the question of total or partial loss. Such a proposition cannot be maintained, yet if not maintainable, the arguments on the other side are absolutely inapplicable and valueless.

There are two classes of losses, total and partial, but the expression "constructive total loss" is not a happy one; it introduces confusion into the subject. Whether the loss is total by the absolute sinking of the ship to the bottom of the sea, or by the circumstance that it has sustained such an injury, and is in such circumstances that no prudent uninsured owner would attempt its repair, there is equally a loss of the vessel and the voyage, and an end of the risk. Both cases must proceed on the same principle. It is not pretended to be denied that if the vessel here had been actually sunk, the owner would have been entitled to recover the full amount stated in the policy. Suppose it had been known that at the moment when the ship foundered in the open sea it was only worth £5000, it cannot be pretended that the underwriter would have been entitled to say, "I will only pay you £5000." Yet he might say so if it is true that, to all intents and in every respect, a policy of insurance is a mere contract of indemnity, and nothing more. In some respects it is a contract [299] of indemnity, but it is a contract which, in the case of a valued policy, while it promises an indemnity, settles and declares what shall be the amount of that indemnity. The case of Lewis v. Rucker, so much relied on by the other side, is an authority for that proposition. In that case, Lord Mansfield says (2 Burrow's Reports, 1171), "a valued policy is not to be considered as a wager policy, or like interest or no interest; if it was, it would be void by the act 19 Geo. 2. The only effect of the value is fixing the amount of the prime cost, just as if the parties admitted it at the trial. . . . It is settled that upon valued policies the merchant need only prove some interest to take it out of the 19 Geo. 2, because the adverse party has admitted the value; and if more was required, the agreed valuation would signify nothing. But if it should come out in proof that A. had insured £2000, and had interest on board to the value of a cable only, there never has been, and I believe there never will be, a determination that by such an evasion the Act of Parliament may be defeated." This last expression clearly shows what was Lord Mansfield's meaning when he spoke of a policy of insurance being a contract of indemnity.

A similar observation may be made with regard to what Lord Mansfield says in Hamilton v. Mendes (2 Burr. 1198; 1 Sir W. Bl. 277):—It is clear that a policy being a contract of indemnity is an expression which must be understood with respect to the subject matter. There a capture and recapture had taken place—there was nothing but a delay of the voyage; and the question was whether the assured, by the mere act of his own will, had a right to turn a partial into a total loss. The point of that judgment may be found in this expression of Lord Mansfield (2 Burr. 1212), "If the thing in truth was safe, no artificial reasoning shall be allowed to set up a [300] total loss." But in that very judgment he assumes that total loss may depend on something besides the actual destruction of the vessel, and he says (Id. 1209), "It does not necessarily follow that because there is a recapture, therefore the loss ceases to be total."

The case of Aspinall v. Forbes (13 East, 323) has nothing to do with the present. There the insurance was on freight, and the ship was lost when only some of the goods on which freight was to be earned were on board. Of course, though that was a valued policy, the value was fixed upon the freight of a full cargo, and when only a small part of the cargo was on board, that which had to give rise to the freight was not in existence. Lord Ellenborough distinctly put the judgment upon that ground. Provided the thing on which the insurance was to take effect, and on which the value was calculated, was in existence, the policy would attach, and, when once it had attached, the value in the policy must be taken as conclusive. Thus: suppose there was a valued policy on a ship, and after the policy was effected, but before the loss, a decree of the Government should issue, which produced the result of lessening the value of all shipping by one-half, that would not affect the right of the insured to recover the value according to which he had insured.

The argument here amounted to this, that if the expences of repairs do not exceed the value of the policy, then the loss is to be deemed only a partial loss. But it is impossible to produce any decision, or any declared principle of law, to support such a proposition. The grounds on which the assured may recover for what is called a constructive total loss, are those on which a prudent uninsured man would not go to the expence of repairs, but would put an end to the voyage. Such have always, hitherto, been deemed sufficient. But it is now, [301] for the first time, contended that that is not the test, but that a new element must be introduced into the discussion of the question—that the value fixed in the policy must be taken into consideration, and that if that value exceeds the amount required for repairs, though that amount may itself be greater than the value of the vessel after the repairs have been executed, the owner must nevertheless repair the ship and submit to the loss. This would be to put him, when insured, into a worse position than if he had not been insured, and would convert what the plaintiff in error asserts to be a contract of indemnity into a contract to incur loss without the hope of indemnity.

According to all the principles of marine insurance law there has been a total loss, and if so, then the assured are entitled to recover the value fixed in the policy. The fact that a value has been so fixed cannot affect the question, which is simply, whether the loss is a total or a partial loss?

As there can be no doubt that it is a total loss, the title of the assured is complete, and the judgment of the Court below must be affirmed.

Sir F. Kelly in reply.—There is in this case a conflict of principles. The first principle controverted here is that a policy of insurance is a contract of indemnity, and nothing more; the next is that which governs the Courts with respect to a valued policy. The parties here have admitted the value of the ship. That fact must be taken as settled, and then it is said that where the ship is insured on a valued policy, and is totally lost, there can be no inquiry into the value at the time of the loss, for the parties, as between themselves, have admitted it. But taking that argument to be true in part, and true as applicable to cases of actual total loss, it is not true when the case is merely one of constructive total loss. From all [302] the authorities, the paramount principle on which a distinction is founded may be deduced. In the case of a ship positively lost—sunk to the bottom of the sea—there can be no conflict of principle, the contract is one to indemnify the assured for the loss actually sustained. But if the loss is not actual, but only constructive, all the circumstances attending it must be taken into consideration, and in that sense of the word the policy is an open policy. A different doctrine cannot be reconciled with the principle that a contract to indemnify is of the very essence of a policy of insurance.

The ship here is valued at £17,500. As between the parties it is therefore said, that it must be taken as conclusive that the ship is of that value. But if so, it must be so taken for all purposes, against the owner as well as against the underwriter. Then how stands this case? The owner comes into Court and claims for a total loss. When he has proved that the ship has been totally lost he may recover the value stated in the policy; but to prove that it will cost him £10,500 to repair the ship, does not prove that the ship is totally lost, and till he gives that proof he cannot be entitled to recover. As the proof stands in the present case, the owner has merely proved that he has sustained a loss of £9000, and yet he claims to recover £17,500. That is not indemnity, it is profit. A party cannot be permitted thus to prove a loss of a certain amount, and on that proof to recover something which far exceeds that amount.

To pass from the principle of law to the decided cases. There can be no doubt that all those cases are unfavourable to the claim of the owners. In Hamilton v. Mendez the Court held, that though value was not generally an open question on a valued policy, yet, that cases might arise in which it would be absolutely necessary, in order to maintain other and more important principles of law, to shew what was the real value.

[303] And in Lewis v. Rucker, Lord Mansfield said, that he desired it to be understood that in a valued policy the plaintiff could not recover more than the actual value when the loss occurred. And that principle is the more strongly to be enforced in this case, because, though the ship alone was insured, the valuation was made on the ship, the stores, provisions, and seamen's wages. The case of Forbes v. Aspinall fully supports this argument. There the insurance was on freight, and the damage claimed was for more cargo than was on board the ship when it was lost, and there it was held, that where the valuation is for a greater sum than is actually lost, the indemnity cannot go beyond that loss.

It is clear that where there is a valued policy, the sum mentioned in it must be taken to be the value of the ship as respects both parties, and for all purposes whatever, or for none, and cannot be treated as a fixed sum for one purpose, and an unfixed and unsettled sum for another. It cannot, therefore, be treated as a settled amount for the purpose of the demand on the underwriter, but as an unsettled and unascertained amount, when the conduct of the assured in putting an end to the voyage and converting a partial into a constructive total loss comes to be considered. Yet, unless this inconsistent mode of dealing with the policy can be supported, it is clear that the assured cannot here make out a title to claim as for a total loss.

The Lord Chancellor moved that the following question be put to the Judges:—“Whether, in the judgment upon the special verdict in this case, the damages ought to be taken on property assessed at £3000, or at £1500?”

The Judges requested time to consider the question.

[304] Mr. Justice Patteson, in the absence of Barons Parke and Alderson, stated the answer of the judges in the following terms:—I am desired by the judges, who heard the whole of the argument at your Lordships' bar, to give their answer to this question, and to state their opinion that the plaintiff below was entitled to recover, upon the facts found by the special verdict, the sum of £3000.

Upon the record it appears that the action was on a policy for £3000 on a ship valued at £17,500. The other facts found by the special verdict show, that it was fairly valued at that sum (and, indeed, it would be assumed that it was so, unless fraud had been pleaded and proved), and then it is found that the vessel during the voyage was so damaged as to be incompetent to proceed without repairs; that the necessary expenditure, in order to repair and make it seaworthy, would have amounted to £10,500, and that the ship would have been then worth £9000 only, which was its marketable value then and at the time of the policy; that a prudent owner, uninsured, would not have repaired the vessel; and that it was duly abandoned to the underwriters.

If this had not been the case of a valued policy it is clear that on the facts found there was a total loss; for a vessel is totally lost, within the meaning of a policy, when it becomes of no use or value as a ship to the owner, and is as much so as if the vessel had gone to the bottom of the sea, or had been broken to pieces, and the whole or great part of the fragments had reached the shore as wreck; and the course has been in all cases in modern times to consider the loss as total where a prudent owner, uninsured, would not have repaired.

In an open policy, therefore, the assured would have been entitled to recover for a total loss, the amount to be ascertained by evidence.

What difference then arises from the circumstance that the policy is a valued policy?

[305] By the terms of it, the ship, etc., for so much as concerns the assured, by agreement between the assured and assurers, are and shall be rated and valued at £17,500, and the question turns upon the meaning of these words.

Do they, as contended for by the plaintiff in error, amount to an agreement that for all purposes connected with the voyage, at least for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is a total loss or not, the ship should be taken to be of that value, so that when a question arises whether it would be worth while to repair, it must be assumed that the vessel would be worth that sum when repaired?

Or do they mean only, that for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of compensation to be paid to the assured, when the loss has happened, the value shall be taken to be the sum fixed, in order to avoid disputes as to the quantum of the assured's interest?

We are all of opinion that the latter is the true meaning; and this is consistent with the language of the policy, and with every case that has been decided upon valued policies.

In the case of Lewis v. Rucker (2 Burr. 1167), on a valued policy on goods, the amount to which the underwriter was held liable for a partial loss was ascertained by computing such a proportion of the value in the policy as the difference between the price for which sound goods would have sold at the port of delivery, and that for which the damaged goods, actually sold, bore to the price for which sound goods would have sold. So that in estimating the extent of the loss, that is, in determining whether it was a loss to the extent of one half, one third, or to any other extent, the value in the policy was wholly disregarded, and nothing was considered but the state of the goods as ascertained by their selling prices. If sound goods would have brought double [306] the price of the damaged, the loss was one half, or fifty per cent., whatever the value in the policy might be. But the extent and nature of the loss being ascertained by this comparison, the underwriter was held liable to pay the proportion so ascertained of the value in the policy; and this mode of treating partial losses on goods is always adhered to. Now the question whether a loss is total or partial, is a question of the same nature as the question, what is the extent of a partial loss? and there is the same reason in both cases for excluding the consideration of the value in the policy from the inquiry as to the extent of the loss, and for treating that value as binding on the question of, how much the subject so totally or partially lost was worth; so that the mode of determining the question, whether the loss was total or not, which has been adopted in this case, agrees, in so far as it excludes the consideration of the value in the policy, with that in which the inquiry into the extent of a partial loss on goods is always conducted. Such has been the construction put upon valued policies in the cases which are questioned in this writ of error; Allen v. Sugrue (8 Barn. and Cres. 561); Young v. Turing (2 Man. and Gr. 593); and Egginton v. Lawson, 1832; and Herne and Hay, 1842, cited by Sir F. Thesiger. Those cases have now been considered, for many years, as having settled the law, and have been the basis on which contracts without number have been formed, and they ought not on slight grounds to be departed from. The principle laid down in these latter cases is this: that the question of loss, whether total or not, is to be determined just as if there was no policy at all; and the established mode of putting the question, when it is alleged that there has been, what is perhaps improperly called, a constructive total loss of a ship, is to consider the policy altogether out of the question, and to inquire what a prudent uninsured owner [307] would have done in the state in which the vessel was placed by the perils insured against.

If he would not have repaired the vessel, it is deemed to be lost.

When this test has been applied, and the nature of the loss has been thus determined, the quantum of compensation is then to be fixed.

In an open policy, the compensation must be then ascertained by evidence.

In a valued one, the agreed total value is conclusive; each party has conclusively admitted that this fixed sum shall be that which the assured is entitled to receive in case of a total loss.

It is argued that this course of proceeding infringes on the generally received rule, that an insurance is a mere contract of indemnity, for thus the assured may obtain more than a compensation for his loss; and it is so.

A policy of assurance is not a perfect contract of indemnity. It must be taken with this qualification, that the parties may agree beforehand in estimating the value of the subject assured, by way of liquidated damages, as indeed they may in any other contract to indemnify.

The Lord Chancellor (July 23).—My Lords, in this case of Irving v. Manning, which was before your Lordships a short time since, your Lordships called in the assistance of the learned judges. All the learned judges who were present at the hearing, were clearly of opinion that the judgment of the Court below was correct, and in that opinion all the noble and learned Lords who attended that hearing also concur. I have therefore only to move your Lordships to affirm the judgment of the Court below in favour of the defendant in error.

Lord Campbell.—My Lords, I am extremely glad that a question which has agitated Westminster Hall for the [308] last thirty years is at last solemnly decided by a judgment of your Lordships. It is a question of great importance to the commerce of this country. I entirely concur in the opinion expressed by my noble and learned friend upon this subject.

My Lords, it appears to me that upon the just construction of this contract, the plaintiff was entitled to recover the sum which the jury has awarded him. If you look at the contract, it seems to me that it was definitively determined that, for all purposes, the value of the ship would be taken at the sum of £17,500. There was nothing illegal in this contract; we have only to put a construction upon it, and if it be a just construction, and there is neither any rule of common law nor any statute to prevent that construction being carried into effect, we are bound to give effect to it, and to pronounce in favour of the plaintiff below.

I repeat that I rejoice that this question, which has so long agitated Westminster Hall, is now for ever set at rest, and is satisfactorily decided.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

[309] HENRY PINKUS,—Appellant; THE RATCLIFF GAS-LIGHT and COKE COMPANY, GEORGE OFFOR, and others,—Respondents [May 11, 12, 18, 25, June 8, 15, 1846; July 21, 1847].

Agreements—Specific performance—Companies—Lien.

The appellant having claimed to be a partner with one Paynter in gas works, which the latter had erected and was about to sell to a Company then about to be formed, it was agreed between them, for the purpose of ending their disputes respecting the ownership of the gas works, that Paynter should be at liberty to sell the works at such price as he pleased, upon accounting to the appellant for the value of the works at a certain rate, and that Paynter should hold shares for the appellant in the company to the value of £2000 for two years. The Company having been formed, and having purchased the gas works from Paynter, the appellant filed a bill against him, and obtained a decree for specific performance of their agreement. Before that decree was made, the Company was dissolved, and the gas works were sold to the Ratcliff Gas-light and Coke Company. The appellant then filed a new bill against Paynter, the Ratcliff Company, the directors of the dissolved company, and the assignees of Paynter, who had become bankrupt, to establish a lien upon the gas works for what should be found due to him under the former decree, as well as to carry out the former decree against all these parties:—

Held, by the House of Lords, affirming a decree of the Vice Chancellor, that the sale of the gas works by Paynter to the London Company was authorised by the appellant's agreements; that he had no just claim against the Company, or lien on the property, and that the supplemental bill was properly dismissed, with costs, as against all the defendants, except Paynter and his assignees.

This was an appeal against a decree of the Vice Chancellor of England, in a suit instituted by the appellant for the purpose of enforcing certain agreements entered into between him and one Paynter, relating to a gas manufactory at Prossom's Island and New Crane, Shadwell, as [310] against all the respondents (except one who was a mortgagee of the appellant's interest under the agreements). Offor, and five other respondents, were directors of a company called the "East London Gas-light Company," and claimed an interest in the property in question under a purchase from Paynter. The respondents, the Ratcliff Gas-light and Coke Company, claimed a similar interest as purchasers from the East London Gas-light Company. The remaining respondents were the assignees of Paynter, who became a bankrupt after the institution of the suit.

The appellant had, in the year 1827, invented improved methods for generating and purifying gas, for lights and other purposes, and being desirous of obtaining patents to secure the exclusive use of the inventions, he and Paynter entered into agreements, dated respectively the 17th of April and 20th of August, 1827, by which —after reciting the said inventions, and that in consideration of Paynter having agreed to advance money for making working models of them, and for obtaining patents, and paying the appellant £200 and £400, and other sums, in the events therein mentioned, the appellant had agreed to sell to Paynter a moiety of his inventions, and of the gains and profits to arise therefrom, and that the same should be established and carried on for their joint and equal benefit, subject to the terms and in manner therein mentioned—covenants were entered into by the parties for performance of these agreements. Patents were taken out for both inventions in the same year, for terms of fourteen years each, and leases were obtained of premises in Prossom's Island and New Crane, Shadwell, which were demised to Paynter alone for long terms of years from the year 1830. Upon these premises the appellant and Paynter erected extensive gas works, and carried on the manufacture of gas, according to the appellant's inventions, Paynter finding all the necessary capital. The premises were held, and the manu-[311]-factory carried on, upon the terms of the agreements, for the equal benefit of the appellant and Paynter, who was the acting and ostensible partner, and in whose name the contracts were usually entered into. An agreement on account of the partnership was entered into in July, 1830, between Paynter and George Barlow, which recited the granting of the leases of the premises, and the erection of the works; and that contracts had been entered into for the supply of gas, producing a gross rental of £3000 per annum; and then it was agreed that the possession of all the property, and the benefit of the contracts were to be made over to Barlow for twenty-one years; and he agreed, during that term, to manufacture and supply gas, pay all expenses, enter into further contracts for supplying gas, collect the rents, retain certain allowances, including a salary, and to pay over the residue to Paynter.

In August 1830, Paynter being desirous to form a company which should purchase the gas works, caused copies of a prospectus to be circulated, headed, "Proposals for the establishment of an Association, to be called the East London Gas Company." The prospectus stated that the proprietors of the said gas works were invited to extend their mains, etc., for the supply of gas to a wider district, at moderate prices, and proposed a scheme for forming a company, with a nominal capital of £30,000, in 2000 shares of £15 each, of which sum £8 per share would be required forthwith, and which, it was alleged, would be sufficient for the purchase of the works and mains.

On the 10th of August, 1831, an agreement was entered into by Paynter and the appellant, which recited their intention that the said works and establishment should be sold, and the proceeds paid to Paynter, in order to the just division thereof between them both; the accounts of Paynter for his disbursements to be submitted to arbitrators named by him and the appellant, and that whatever balance [312] should be ascertained by the award to be due to Paynter for his disbursements, should be first paid out of the proceeds of the intended sale; the residue to be equally divided between him and the appellant. The agreement then provided for the reference and for distribution of the proceeds of the sale, according to the recitals.

Shortly after that agreement Paynter renewed a negotiation with Offor, and others of the respondents, for the formation of a joint-stock company; but this negotiation was concealed from the appellant, who, on becoming acquainted with it, wrote to one of the respondents, reminded him that he was joint proprietor of the gas works, that he would not sanction the negotiation unless terms were made with him, and that he dissented from those proposed by Paynter.

An agreement was, notwithstanding, concluded on the 25th of October, 1831, between Paynter of the first part, Offor and others of the second part, and Barlow of the third part, for the sale of the gas works, plant, and property, with the lease of the premises, etc., for £17,500, to a Company to be formed by these parties. The material parts of the agreement were, that the before-mentioned covenant with Barlow should be cancelled, and a new one entered into between him and the directors of the proposed Company; that Paynter should take shares in the Company to the extent of one-sixth of the whole, and should not sell or transfer them for two years, without the consent of the directors; that the capital of the Company should be £30,000, to be raised by 6000 shares of £5 each; that all instalments should be paid to the bankers of the Company, and £75 per cent. thereon should be paid to Paynter, in part of the purchase-money (the instalments due on his own shares to be given credit for as part of such payment), until £13,500 should be paid to him, during which time he was to receive the rental (which was stated at £3300) and allow interest at £5 per cent. on such payments as he [313] should receive; and after payment of the £13,500 the Company were to receive the rental and pay interest after the like rate on the balance of £4000 till the same should be paid, and then the leases and all the property should be assigned to the directors; that if the Company should not be formed, all the expenses incurred should be borne by Paynter, but if it should be formed, then by the Company.

The parties to the agreement issued a prospectus of the "East London Gas-light Company," and the provisional directors therein named passed resolutions to the effect that no person should hold or transfer shares in the Company without the approbation of the directors, which resolutions were, as the appellant alleged, intended to exclude him from all knowledge of what was taking place between Paynter and the Company.

This agreement was not discovered by appellant, as he alleged, until more than a year afterwards. In the mean time he and Paynter entered into an agreement, dated 29th of October, 1831, for sale of the works to a Company to be formed, Paynter thereby agreeing to take and pay for shares in such Company of the value of £2000 for the appellant, and hold them for his interest for two years after the formation of the Company, the appellant to receive all the profits on the shares during such years, Paynter after the expiration of the two years to transfer them to the appellant, and he in consideration thereof agreeing that Paynter might sell said works for such price as to him might seem proper. Then followed other stipulations, one of which was that Paynter should, after the sale, account to the appellant as to the proceeds under the agreement of August, for the value of the works at a price which at £7 per cent. per annum would produce an income equal in amount to the net rentals then payable to the proprietors, which price should be divided between them according to the said agreement. Among the other stipulations was one which provided for the mutual [314] release of the parties, in certain events named, as partners in the gas works.

The appellant being apprised of the formation of a company, by the circulation of the prospectus before mentioned, sent a letter in January 1832, to the directors therein named, informing them that he was partner with Paynter in the said gas works.

The provisional directors of the proposed company met, and after considering the said notice, and the several agreements between the appellant and Paynter, resolved that it was their opinion that the property and title to the gas works were vested in Paynter, and that he had full power to carry the agreement with them into effect. They accepted an offer made by Paynter to deposit one thousand shares in the new company with bankers, as an indemnity against the appellant's claims.

The proposed company was formed in February 1832, by the name of the "East London Gas-light Company," and a deed of settlement was executed, and a sum of £6000 was paid to Paynter as a first instalment, under the agreement of the 25th of October, 1831. He at the same time repudiated the agreements with the appellant of the 10th August and 25th October, 1831, and in July 1832 he assigned the whole property in the gas works to the directors of the said Company, he himself having taken two thousand shares in the concern, five hundred of which he held in trust for the appellant, under the agreement of the 29th of October. 1831.

In May, 1833, the appellant filed a bill against Paynter, and two others, incumbents on the appellant's interest in the said works, stating most of the matters hereinbefore stated, and praying that the said agreements between the appellant and Paynter of the 10th of August and 29th October, 1831, might be carried into execution, and that Paynter might be decreed to concur in all acts [315] requisite for that purpose, particularly in effecting a transfer to the appellant of the shares taken on his account, pursuant to the agreement of the 29th of October, 1831, and that all proper accounts might be taken of Paynter's disbursements on account of the said works and premises, and that the same might be valued by competent persons, and Paynter decreed to account to the appellant for the value of the said works and premises, at a price which, at £7 per cent. per annum, would produce an income equal in amount to the net rental which at the time the agreement of the 29th October, 1831, was executed, was payable to the proprietors of the said works; and that such net rental might be ascertained with reference to the additional customers obtained for the gas: And that Paynter might be declared liable to pay to the appellant a moiety of the value so to be ascertained, after deducting the balance which should be found justly due to him on account of his disbursements, and subject also to the deduction of the £200 in the agreement of the 29th October 1831 mentioned; and that out of the shares in the newly established company which had been taken by Paynter, he might be decreed to be a trustee for the appellant of shares, which at the time of taking the same, were of the value of £2000, and for which the sum of £2000 was paid by him; and to account for and to pay over to the appellant, all the dividends and profits accrued due thereon, which had been received by him or for his use.

Paynter, in his answer, stated the agreement with, and conveyance to, the directors of the "East London Gas-light Company" of the said works and premises, and that the purchase money was £17,100, of which he received £7200 in cash, and the balance in shares; and he took and paid for shares of the value of £6000, viz., one thousand five hundred shares at £4 each, and he insisted that the appellant had no interest in such shares, and that [316] their agreements of the 10th of August and 29th of October, 1831, were void.

Subsequently to the answer, and before the hearing of the cause, alterations were made in the nature and amount of the indemnity, before stated to have been provided by Paynter for the said Company against the appellant's claims; and a negotiation, commenced in June 1833 between the East London Gas-light Company and the respondents, the Ratcliff Gas-light and Coke Company, was carried into effect by an agreement dated the 15th of April, 1835, made between the respondents Offor and others, the then directors of the former Company, of the one part, and certain persons therein described as the committee of management of the latter Company, of the other part, by which, for the consideration of £22,500, partly in cash and partly in shares, as therein mentioned, the parties of the first part agreed to sell the whole leasehold premises and property of their Company to the respondents, the Ratcliff Gas-light and Coke Company, and to procure the regular dissolution and winding up of the affairs of the former Company.

The appellant, on being informed of this agreement, gave notice to the directors of both Companies of his claims in the gas works and premises, and of his suit against Paynter to enforce such claims. Notwithstanding that notice, a deed was executed, the 15th of April, 1835, by the parties to the last mentioned agreement, conveying and assigning the whole property upon the terms thereof. And the directors of the then dissolved company executed to the Ratcliff company a bond in the penal sum of £20,000 against all costs or damages to which they might be put in defending themselves against the claims of the appellant in the property; and by way of counter security to the obligors, Paynter executed to them an indenture, dated the 1st of October, 1836, whereby—after reciting among other [317] things the bill in the suit of Pinkus v. Paynter, and the said bond, and that Paynter, at the time of the dissolution of the "East London Gas-light Company," held one thousand two hundred and thirty-five shares therein, in his own name; and in case they were his own absolute property, discharged from any claim of the appellant, then the proportion of the purchase money of £22,500, paid by the Ratcliff Gas-light and Coke Company for the premises, which Paynter would be entitled to receive in respect of his said shares,* would be £6175, of which sum £2500, with £240 for dividends, would be payable to the appellant, if he should establish his claim in his said suit—it was, therefore, agreed that out of the said purchase money the sums of £2500 and £240 should be invested in the purchase of £3032 8s. 11d., consols. And such sums were accordingly so invested in the names of Paynter and others of the respondents, upon trust to indemnify the proprietors of shares in the dissolved Company, at the time it was dissolved, against the claims of the appellant.

The cause of Pinkus v. Paynter was heard on the 6th December, 1836, before the Vice Chancellor of England, when his Honour declared that the appellant was entitled to specific performance of the agreements of the 10th of August and 29th of October, 1831, and decreed that the same should be performed, and carried into execution; that the appellant was entitled to an immediate transfer and assignment to him of the five hundred shares in the East London Gas-light Company—of which the certificates had already been deposited by Paynter in the hands of his clerk in Court, under orders made in the cause, the 28th of March, and the 3rd of May, 1833—and to all profit or emolument which had arisen from such shares; and that Paynter should accordingly execute to the appellant a proper transfer and assignment of such shares, and pay to him all profits and dividends that were re-[318]ceived on these shares by him, Paynter, or by others by his order. And it was ordered that the Master should ascertain the value of the said works and premises, computed at a price which, at £7 per cent. per annum, would produce an income equal in amount to the net rental payable to the appellant and Paynter, as proprietors of the said works, on the 29th of October, 1831; and should take an account of all their dealings and transactions, receipts and payments, in respect of the patents, works, and premises, and of any other works and premises in which the appellant and Paynter, were or had been jointly interested, having regard to the before stated agreements of April and August 1827, and the said agreements of the 10th of August and the 29th of October, 1831; and should ascertain the balance due on such account.

Notice of this decree was served by the appellant on the directors of the two companies.

The sums of £131 17s. 4d. Bank Annuities, and £7 18s. 4d. cash, were, in pursuance of the decree, transferred and paid to the appellant, and also certificates of five hundred shares were delivered to him, one hundred and fifty of which were delivered by him, pursuant to the said decree, to persons who were incumbrancers on his interest in the gas works.

The Master, in March 1837, made a separate report with reference to the dividends and profits which had been received by Paynter, in respect of the said five hundred shares in the East London Gas-light Company, over and above the said sum of £131 17s., and which he found to amount to £256 13s. 4d. That sum was paid by Paynter to the appellant, as the decree directed.

The appellant was unable, as he alleged, to prosecute his said decree with effect, owing to the delivery of the books of the East London Gas-light Company to the Ratcliff Gas-[319]-light and Coke Company; and inasmuch as both that Company and the directors of the former Company had, throughout the whole of their transactions, acted with full notice of his rights, against Paynter, the appellant, in June 1839, filed a bill against all the parties, which, after stating and charging most of the matters hereinbefore stated, prayed that the appellant might have the benefit thereof, as a supplemental bill against Paynter, and as an original bill against the several other defendants thereto; and that he might have the benefit of the said several matters in prosecuting the said decree, as against Paynter, and might also have the benefit of the aforesaid agreements, and of the said suit, and of the evidence therein, and of the said decree and other proceedings, as against all the other defendants; and that it might be declared that not only Paynter, but also the other defendants were liable and bound to make good to the appellant, the five hundred shares in the East London Gas Light Company, to which, by the said decree, he was declared entitled, and the profit, interest, and emoluments which had arisen from such shares, so far as the same had not then already been made good to him; and that in order thereto he might be declared entitled to fifty shares in the Ratcliff Gas-light Company, as from the dissolution of the East London Gas-light Company and the transfer of the said works and premises to the Ratcliff Company, or the union of the two companies, in lieu of such five hundred shares, or to the value of such fifty shares, computed as therein mentioned, or to a proportionate part, or so much of the said sum of £22,500 purchase money, as was properly attributable to such five hundred shares, together with interest thereon at £5 per cent. per annum, at the appellant's option; and that all the defendants might be declared to be bound by the accounts, which by the said decree were directed to be taken of the several other matters and things therein men-[320]-tioned; and that not only Paynter, but also the respondents, Offor and others, the directors of the late East London Gas-light Company, and also the said works and premises so sold to the Ratcliff Gas-light and Coke Company, or the last mentioned Company in respect thereof, might be declared to be chargeable, and might accordingly be charged with the balance which should be found due to the appellant on the taking of such accounts, with lawful interest thereon; and that such balance, and the interest thereof, might be raised and paid by the defendants, or some of them, out of the said works and premises, and the rental, rates and monies of the Ratcliff Gas-light and Coke Company; or otherwise that the rights and interests of the appellant, as against the said defendants in respect of the said matters, might be ascertained and declared. The bill also prayed for a manager or receiver, and for an injunction.

The respondents, Offor and others, directors of the East London Company, put in a joint answer, and the respondents, the Ratcliff Gas Company, also put in their answer, and they all by their several answers admitted the notices hereinbefore mentioned to have been received by them or their officers respectively; but they insisted that the purchase made by the East London Gas Company from Paynter of the leasehold messuages, gas works, and other premises, and the subsequent sale of the same to the Ratcliff Gas Company, were respectively valid and effectual as against the appellant, and that he was not entitled to any relief as against them, the answering parties.

Paynter, by his answer to the last-mentioned bill, insisted upon his right to sell the said messuages, gas works, and premises, under the aforesaid agreements entered into between him and the appellant.

[321] Paynter was declared a bankrupt soon afterwards, and his assignees were then made defendants to the bill.

The supplemental cause was heard by the Vice Chancellor of England, in July 1843, and in January 1844 his Honour made a decree ordering the bill to be dismissed, with costs, as against all the defendants, except the assignees of Paynter, out of whose estate they were to retain their costs; and it was ordered that the accounts directed to be taken by the decree of December 1836, made in the said cause of Pinkus v. Paynter, should be prosecuted as against them as such assignees. And it was declared that the estate of Paynter was liable for the value of the five hundred shares in the East London Gas-light Company, together with interest thereon, from the 25th of March 1835, after setting off what (if any thing) might be found due from the appellant to the estate of Paynter upon taking the said accounts (see 13 Law Journ. (Eq.), 244).

The appeal was brought against so much of this decree as ordered the dismissal of the bill as against the said several defendants thereto, and as directed their costs to be paid by the appellant, and the accounts directed by the former decree to be prosecuted only against Paynter's assignees, and as declared that his estate only was liable for the value of the said shares in the London Gas-light Company.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. W. P. Wood, for the appellant:

The facts stated and proved, on behalf of the appellant, in the Court below, entitle him to the relief prayed by his supplemental bill, or similar relief, or at least part of such relief. Under the agreements entered into between himself and Paynter on the 10th of August and 29th of October, 1831, and the previous agreements between them, the appellant had, in the first place, a lien on the partner-[322]-ship property, and also on the purchase monies for which the same might be sold, for the full amount of his interest in that property, estimated on the basis of the agreement of the 29th of October, 1831, according to the rental on that day, or at least to the extent of the purchase monies. In the next place, the appellant had, by the said agreement, dated the 29th of October 1831, an independent right to shares of the value of £2000 in the company about to be formed, as therein mentioned; and to all such benefit as the possession of the said shares might entitle him to.

The respondents, the directors of the East London Gas-light Company, were affected with direct notice of all the appellant's rights and interests in the partnership property, and of his rights as against Paynter, when they entered into the agreement of the 25th of October, 1831. They had also direct notice of the instruments executed on the 29th of October, 1831, before any payment whatever was made by them to Paynter by virtue of their agreement. By their conduct, and also by virtue of the notice, they placed themselves, personally, and the company of which they were directors, in precisely the same position, as regarded the rights of the appellant, as that in which Paynter himself stood, as to the partnership property, the purchase monies, and the shares of the value of £2000. And the respondents, the Ratcliff Gas-light and Coke Company, being also affected with direct notice, as well as by the pendency of the suit of Pinkus v. Paynter, were bound to deal with the property and the purchase monies agreed to be paid by them for it, including the part payable in shares, in the same manner as Paynter and the directors of the East London Gas-light Company would have been bound to do. After the purchase was effected between the two companies, and the purchase money paid in money or by shares in the Ratcliff Company, the directors of the dissolved company gave a bond of indemnity to the [323] Ratcliff Company against any claims of the appellant, and took a counter-indemnity from Paynter, who, for their security, invested £2740 in consols, in the name of trustees. The sum of £3023 8s. 11d., £3 consols so purchased, was set apart by the respondents, or some of them, as representing the five hundred shares assigned to the appellant: he is entitled to that sum of £3023 8s. 11d., £3 consols, and the dividends which have accrued thereon, either as representing the said five hundred shares, or as part of the unpaid purchase monies for the partnership estate and effects.

Mr. Stuart (with whom was Mr. Chandless) for the respondents, the Ratcliff Gas-light and Coke Company, pointed out discrepancies between the decree in the suit of Pinkus v. Paynter, and the prayer of the supplemental bill, and contended that the relief sought by the latter bill was inconsistent with the decree made in the original cause, and also inconsistent with the relief sought in that suit: that by the agreements of the 10th of August and 29th of October, 1831, between the appellant and Paynter, Paynter had a full and absolute right to sell the manufactory, works, and premises, at his sole discretion, and to receive and give a good discharge for the proceeds of such sale; and that right was exercised, bona fide, and for a valuable consideration, duly paid to him by the East London Gas-light Company, in which the appellant never was a shareholder: that if he was by law a shareholder in that Company, he could only have shares therein according to its constitution, and must take such Company just as it was formed, and upon the ground on which it was formed; and that it must be taken, as against him, that the East London Company was formed, was carried on, and was ultimately dissolved, and the manufactory, works, and premises sold to the Ratcliff Company, according to the terms of the deed of the 21st of February, 1832, by which the East London Company was created: that the appellant was well [324] aware, before the decree was made in the cause of Pinkus v. Paynter, of all the circumstances touching the sale of the manufactory, works, and premises, to the East London Company, the dissolution of that company, and the ultimate sale of the manufactory, works, and premises to the Ratcliff Company, upon which he founded his title to relief in the supplemental cause. By the prayer of his bill he recognised the dissolution of the East London Company, and at the same time prayed that these respondents might make good to him the five hundred shares in the Company, which he so admitted to be dissolved, the dissolution having been effected strictly and completely in compliance with the provisions of the deed of settlement of that Company. Under these circumstances the Vice Chancellor could not justly do otherwise than dismiss the bill as against these respondents.

Mr. Bethell (with whom was Mr. Smythe), for the respondents, Ofor, and the other directors of the dissolved East London Gas-light Company, also argued that the case made and the relief prayed by the appellant in his bill against the Ratcliff Company and these respondents, was inconsistent with the case made and the decree taken by him in his original suit against Paynter: that according to the true construction of the agreements of the 10th of August and the 29th of October, 1831, Paynter had full power to sell the gas works and premises to the East London Company, and the appellant was not entitled in equity to any lien upon the said works, or to any relief against the East London Company as the purchasers thereof,—in which company he never was a proprietor—or against the indemnity fund; Colyear v. The Countess of Mulgrave (2 Keen, 81; see p. 98). In that case the Master of the Rolls says, “I apprehend that when two persons, for valuable consideration between themselves, covenant to do some act for the benefit of a mere stranger, that stranger has no [325] right to enforce the covenant against the two, although each one might as against the other." The indemnity fund here was the subject of a private agreement to which the appellant was not a party, and to the benefit of which he was not entitled; but if he claimed to be interested in that fund, he could not maintain the claim without consenting to adopt and confirm the sale by the East London Company to the Ratcliff Company; which he refused to do.

If the appellant had any case to make against the East London Company, such case could not be maintained against these respondents after the dissolution of the company; he ought to have instituted his proceeding when he first became acquainted with the circumstances upon which he relied, and of which he was aware before the date of the decree against Paynter. The Vice Chancellor's judgment comprised, in a few words, a complete answer to all the appellant's demands. (13 L. Jour. 246.)

Mr. Walker (with whom was Mr. Rolt) for the respondents, the assignees of Paynter:

The agreement for indemnity, in pursuance of which the indemnity fund was set apart in the names of trustees, was entered into exclusively between Paynter of the one part, and the directors and proprietors of the East London Company of the other; and such agreement was entered into, and the fund was set apart solely as a counter-indemnity to the directors of that company, against the bond of indemnity given by them to the Ratcliff Company. The appellant was not in any way a party to the agreement, nor in any way interested in it, or in the indemnity fund, either under the indenture or declaration of trust of the 1st of October, 1836; and, instead of acquiescing in and confirming the agreement, he claims relief inconsistent with it.

The appellant has not made a case for any relief against Paynter or his assignees, or against any other person or [326] Company, except under and by virtue of the agreements between Paynter and himself, in August and October 1831. Under those agreements the appellant had not any lien upon the gas works and premises sold by Paynter to the East London Company, or any claim against that Company, or any person or Company claiming the gas works and premises under or through them, either in respect of the shares of the value of £2000, which, by the agreement of the 29th of October, 1831, Paynter agreed to purchase and pay the price of for the appellant, or in respect of the balance, if any, which, upon taking the accounts mentioned in the agreements, might be found due to him from Paynter.

The appellant had, long previous to the decree of December 1836, in the first suit against Paynter, full knowledge of every circumstance relied on by him in the cause, in which the decree now appealed from has been made; and so far as he had not previously obtained the full benefit which could be obtained by him from the decree of 1836, the decree now appealed from gives him the full benefit of that decree, and all the relief to which he is entitled as supplemental thereto; any other relief would be inconsistent with the case made by the appellant in the first suit, and with the decree made in that suit. That was rather a harsh decree on Paynter, although the respondents, his assignees, did not complain of it.

Mr. Kindersley replied.

Lord Lyndhurst (July 21, 1847).—This case which, at first view, seems to be long and complicated, will be found, when stripped of superfluous matter, to resolve itself into one or two not very difficult questions. And first as to the purchase of the Gas Works by the East London Company: That pur-[327]-chase was expressly authorised by the agreements of the 10th of August and the 29th of October, 1831. Pinkus was aware that Paynter was in treaty for the sale of the property to a company; he was apprehensive that it might be sold for an inadequate price, and to obviate all difficulties on this head, the second agreement of the 29th October was entered into, by which it was stipulated that Paynter should be at liberty to sell the works for whatever sum he might think proper, but that in his accounts with Pinkus he should be charged upon the purchase according to the rate stated in that agreement.

It was upon the faith of these agreements, and the authority which they conferred upon Paynter, that the East London Gas Company was afterwards formed, and the works were sold to that company according to the terms stipulated in the previous conditional agreement of the 25th of October, 1831. The appellant's notice, dated the 30th December, 1831, and served on the 27th of January, 1832, would not affect the transaction. It merely stated that the plaintiff was a partner in the property with Paynter, which was perfectly consistent with the agreements authorizing the sale, and appeared on the face of those agreements.

The plaintiff, far from repudiating these agreements, insisted upon them, filed a bill against Paynter for a specific performance, and obtained a decree accordingly. He says that at the time of signing the agreement of the 29th of October, he was not aware of the conditional agreement made by Paynter for the sale to the intended company, and that it was carefully concealed from him by Paynter. But, assuming this to have been the case, and the concealment to have been material, he has since, with full knowledge of the fact, ratified these agreements, by his subsequent suit against Paynter, and the decree [328] which he has obtained in that suit, and upon which he is now proceeding.

The next question is: What rights has the plaintiff acquired by this sale against the East London Gas Company? And first as to the purchase money: it was expressly stipulated between the plaintiff and Paynter, by the agreement of the 10th August, 1831, that the purchase money should, in the first instance, be paid into the hands of Paynter, in conformity, as it was said, with the existing agreements. It is equally clear, from the agreement of the 29th October, 1831, that the plaintiff was not to look for any part of the purchase money to the company, since Paynter was to account with the plaintiff, not for the sum received upon the sale, but according to an estimated value to be applied by Paynter, agreeably to the stipulations contained in the previous agreement of August. The purchase was afterwards paid for by the company to Paynter, partly in money, and the residue by an appropriation of shares in the company. The plaintiff can therefore have no claim, either against the company or their property, in respect to the purchase money upon this sale.

But the appellant was, by the agreement of the 29th of October, not only entitled to the benefit in account as against Paynter, for his share of the estimated value of the property, but he was also, as a consideration for his agreeing to the sale, to have an interest in certain shares in the concern, to the value of £2000. They were to be taken in the name of Paynter in trust for the appellant, and to be transferred by him into the plaintiff's name at the expiration of two years. By the company's deed of settlement, it was declared, as is usual in such instruments, that as between the company and any person claiming to be a proprietor, the share register book should be conclusive evidence of his right as proprietor; that the registered proprietors should alone have a voice, and be entitled to act in the proceedings of the company, that payment to the registered proprietor and his receipt should be a sufficient discharge in all cases of trust or any other interest, and that no person's name should be substituted as a proprietor, without the consent of a certain number of the directors, nor should any person be entitled to the rights and privileges of a proprietor until he should have signed a deed of covenant to abide by the rules and regulations of the company. When the appellant agreed with Paynter to take an interest in the shares of the company, he could only take such interest as far as the company was concerned, subject to the regulations by which the company was governed. The company was not bound to consider him as a proprietor, for his name had not been entered as such in the share register book; he never was entitled to act as a proprietor, and accordingly in his first bill, he confined his complaint exclusively to Paynter, praying against him personally for a specific performance of the agreements between them, for a transfer of the shares, and for an account.

This leads, then, to the consideration of the subsequent part of these transactions. While this suit was depending, and in the month of May 1835, measures were taken for dissolving the East London Company, in conformity with a power reserved for that purpose in the deed of settlement. The requisites of the deed in this respect were strictly complied with. The directors were in consequence authorised and required to sell the property: they accordingly disposed of it to the Ratcliff Gas Company, a rival establishment. The competition between these two companies had been injurious to both, and the sale, which seems to have been a prudent and beneficial transaction, was clearly within the competence of the respective parties. [330] The price was fixed at £22,500, a part of which was to be paid in shares estimated at £50 each, and which were to be allotted to such of the East London proprietors as should be willing to take them.

The plaintiff, being informed of these proceedings, caused a notice to be served upon the East London Company, and the Ratcliff Company, of his claims, of the pendency of the suit in Chancery, and other matters, and declaring that he should hold them liable for any loss he might sustain in respect of his interest in the shares to which he claimed to be entitled.

In consequence of this notice, the Ratcliff Company refused to complete their purchase without being indemnified against this claim. The directors of the East London Gas Company executed a bond for that purpose, and they required, on their part, a counter security for the protection of themselves and the shareholders. For this purpose a proportion of the purchase money, payable in respect of Paynter's shares, sufficient to cover the claim of the plaintiff, was, with Paynter's assent, vested in the funds in the names of trustees. Soon afterwards a decree was obtained in the case of Pinkus v. Paynter, directing, among other things, that Paynter should assign to the plaintiff the shares which he so held in trust for him.

In this state of things the present bill has been filed against the two companies, and against Paynter and his assignees.

First, then, as to the Ratcliff Company: The purchase which they made from the directors of the East London Company appears to have been a perfectly fair transaction. The resolution passed at the meeting of proprietors of the East London Company to dissolve the company was in accordance with the provisions of the deed of settlement. The power of the directors to sell was given by the same instrument, and was a consequence of the resolution [331] to dissolve. The price is not shewn to have been inadequate; that price has been paid by the Ratcliff Company to the directors of the East London Company, who, according to the deed of settlement, were the persons to receive it. There appears, therefore, no ground for maintaining this suit as against the Ratcliff Company, and the bill was properly dismissed as against them.

Then as to the directors of the East London Company: they had authority to dispose of the property, and it was their duty to do so. If, by reason of the appellant's notice, the sale could not be completed without the bond, it was proper to give it, and they had a right to insist upon the counter indemnity. The transaction was, I think, within their powers, under the deed of settlement, as a consequence of the dissolution. Independently of any assent on the part of Paynter, they had, I think, a right to retain a sufficient portion of the purchase money to protect themselves and the shareholders against the effect of their bond, and the plaintiff's proceedings against the Ratcliff Company.

It is further to be observed, that, according to the deed of settlement, by the provisions of which in respect of these shares the plaintiff is bound, the produce of a sale of the property upon a dissolution was to be paid to the proprietors, that is, to those registered as such. The directors were, therefore, authorised to pay Paynter the proportion due in respect of the shares standing in his name, and consequently, as I conceive, to retain or apply it by his authority for their indemnity. They cannot, I think, be deprived of this security till they are discharged from their liability to the Ratcliff Company, and secured from all other loss or damage in respect of which the indemnity was given. These are questions which cannot be settled in this suit, and I think, therefore, the bill was [332] properly dismissed by the Vice Chancellor as against the East London Company and their trustees.

The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed, and, I think, with costs.

Lord Campbell concurred.

The appeal was ordered to be dismissed, and the decree complained of to be affirmed, with costs, to be paid by the appellant to the three sets of respondents, namely, the Ratcliff Gas-light and Coke Company, the directors of the (dissolved) East London Gas-light Company, and the assignees of Paynter. (See Lords' Jour. for 21st July, 1847.)

Paynter himself did not put in an answer to the petition of appeal, and did not appear by counsel at the hearing of it.

Void Bond—Inoperative Agreement—Surety—Concealment.

A bond, void in law, may be enforced as an agreement in equity, subject to the effect of the equitable circumstances under which it was made.

An instrument, purporting to be a bond, executed by the obligor, with blanks for the name of the obligee, and therefore void in law, is inoperative in equity as an agreement, there being no second contracting party.

A party joining as surety in a bond, ought to be informed of the nature of the obligation, name of the obligee, and the relation in which he stands to the principal obligor.

M. induced W. to join his as surety in a bond for repayment of a loan, saying he only wanted time to realize securities, and he would hold her harmless. M. and S. being trustees of a fund, sold it, with consent of B., the cestui que trust, and thereby raised the loan for M., who informed W. that B. was the lender, but did not inform her how the loan was raised:

Held that, B. not being in fact the lender, his personal representatives had no privity of contract with, nor equities against, W., and that, in consequence of the concealment from her of the real nature of the transaction, she was, in equity, altogether released from the bond.

In the year 1833, Mr. William Morgan, a stock-broker in London, being suddenly required to provide a large sum of money, applied to his friends for pecuniary assistance, and, amongst others, to Mrs. Whitton, with whom he had been for many years on terms of intimate friendship, and was then co-executor with her of the will of her late husband. Mr. Morgan wrote to her the following letter:—

[334] London, 7th August, 1833.

"My dear friend,—On Friday Mrs. Morgan and myself went to Ramsgate, etc. But if any one regretted the loss of a friend, it is poor me, at this moment, at the loss of dear Mr. Whitton; for, to make short of my story, William (the writer's eldest son) in my absence, entered into a speculation most unaccountable, which I have to make good in seven days from the present; and in order to give time to realize other securities, may I ask the favour of you to join me in a bond for £10,000, which will give me time to make arrangements. You may depend upon it I will hold you harmless; but your answer must be by return of post, or it would be too late for my purpose. I shall take the first opportunity of seeing you, to state particulars; in the meantime believe me, my dear friend, yours, etc., William Morgan."

What answer, or whether any, was made to this letter did not appear; Mrs. Whitton being about seventy-six years of age, when she put in her answer to the bill, was not able to recollect (vide infra, p. 340); and Mr. Morgan in his answer said that by her particular desire he from time to time destroyed all the letters which he received from her.

On the 9th August, 1833, a letter was written by the appellant John Squire, to Mr. Robert Farthing Beauchamp, who was then residing in Somersetshire, and was also an intimate friend of Mr. Morgan. That letter was not produced in the cause, but the purport of it appears, from Mr. Beauchamp's letter of the 11th of August, to have been to obtain the advance of £10,000 (vide infra, p. 337).

Mr. Morgan, aware that the security of Mrs. Whitton was necessary to enable him to obtain the money, instructed Mr. Charles Morgan, one of his sons, then a [335] clerk in the office of Mr. Gregson, the solicitor of Mrs. Whitton, to prepare a bond in the names of William Morgan and Mrs. Whitton, as the obligors for securing the said sum, and to leave blanks for the name of the obligee, and the rate of interest to be reserved. Mr. C. Morgan, pursuant to these instructions, prepared and engrossed a bond as follows:—

“Know all men by these presents, that we, William Morgan, of Colneyhatch, in the county of Middlesex, esquire, and Mary Philippa Whitton, of Stonewall, in the parish of Chiddingstone, in the county of Kent, widow, are held and firmly bound to in the penal sum of £20,000 of good and lawful money of Great Britain, to be paid to the said

, his certain attorney, executors, etc., for which payment, etc., we bind ourselves jointly, and each of us separately, etc., by these presents, sealed with our seals, dated this day of 1833.

“Whereas the said , at the request of the said William Morgan, agreed to lend him the sum of £10,000, and upon the trust of the said loan it was agreed that the repayment thereof should be secured by the joint and several bond of the above bounden William Morgan, and of Mary Philippa Whitton as his surety, in a sufficient penalty, at the time and in the manner mentioned in the condition hereunder written: Now, the condition of the above-written obligation is such, that if the said William Morgan and Mary Philippa Whitton, or either of them, their or either of their heirs, executors, or administrators, do and shall well and truly pay or cause to be paid unto the said his executors, administrators, or assigns, the sum of £10,000 of lawful money of Great Britain, on or before the day of , which will be in the year 1834, with interest thereon, in the meantime, after the rate of for every £100 by the year, by equal half-yearly [336] payments, etc., then the above-written obligation shall be void, otherwise to be and remain in full force and virtue.”

This instrument was signed, sealed, etc., by “William Morgan” and “Mary P. Whitton,” in the presence of “Charles Morgan, 18, Bedford-row, London,” and “Samuel Tinkler, servant to Mrs. Whitton.”

On the 10th of August, 1833, Mr. William Morgan, with his son Charles, went to Mrs. Whitton's, at Stonewall, taking with them the bond; and in the interview which he then had with her, apart from his son, he stated to her, as he alleged in his answer, that the object of his visit was to procure her execution of the bond, to enable him to borrow the £10,000, and his confident expectation that Mr. Beauchamp would lend him that sum upon her joining him in the bond, whereupon she expressed her willingness to join in such a bond. On the following morning, being Sunday, he had another interview in private with her, and she having again expressed her consent to join in the bond as a security to the person who should lend him the £10,000, Mr. Charles Morgan was then called into the room, and desired by his father to read aloud the engrossment of the bond preparatory to the same being executed, and he accordingly proceeded to do so in the presence and hearing of both; and on his coming to the blanks in the engrossment which had been left for the name of the obligee, he stated to Mrs. Whitton, that these blanks were for the name of the person who was to lend Mr. Morgan the £10,000, and would be filled up with his name when the money was advanced, or to that effect; and on his coming to the other blank, he stated to her that the same was for the rate of interest to be made payable on the bond, and would also be afterwards filled up. After he had read the whole of the engrossment, he explained to her the nature of the liability she would incur by executing the same, and that if the amount to be secured by the bond was not paid [337] by Mr. W. Morgan, she would be liable for the same; and he made use of this expression, “The effect of which is, that if my father cannot pay, you must.” The bond was then executed with the blanks.

On the 12th of August, 1833, Mr. Beauchamp's reply to the application made to him on the 9th, was received in London by Mr. John Squire. It was as follows:—

“Walford House, 11th August, 1833.

“My dear Squire,—Your letter of the 9th has completely upset me. I am indeed grieved beyond measure. What a distressing circumstance for poor Mr. and Mrs. Morgan, who deserve a better fate. You say that you and Rothschild have agreed to lend him each £5000, and I will with much pleasure do the same, provided you take care to see me perfectly secure. You say his friend Mrs. Whitton will join in a bond, or give a mortgage, which I doubt not is quite good; but you must ascertain if the property is at her own disposal and unencumbered, and if so, I would even advance the £10,000, provided he cannot procure it through any other channel, first, on bond, because you say there is not time to prepare the mortgage, and afterwards on mortgage, at four and a half per cent. Recollect, I propose to lend stock, and not money, and for this reason, because I intend you to sell as much of the trust stock as you may require for this purpose. Of course the mortgage must be taken in your name and that of poor Morgan. Upon the first blush of the thing I had made up my mind to go to town, but I have had so much gout in my foot lately, that I do not feel quite equal to the journey, not being able to wear a boot. Do pray tell him this, and say how very much both Mrs. Beauchamp and myself feel for him and Mrs. Morgan. Recollect the trust stock stands in the joint names of yourself and Morgan. As a proof that Mrs. Beauchamp with myself is anxious to assist them at this critical moment, she will add her sig-[338]-nature to this letter, acquiescing in the sale of part of the trust stock, relying on your friendship and care in seeing the security is what it ought to be. Do pray let me hear from you very soon. I am so anxious, and feel so much for him, that I shall not be at rest until I know everything is made straight. With our united regards to all your circle, I remain yours, etc.,

“R. F. Beauchamp, Eliza. Beauchamp.”

The trust stock alluded to in this letter consisted of two sums of £10,000, £3 per cent. consols, comprised in the marriage settlement of Mr. and Mrs. Beauchamp, one of which sums was then standing in the bank books in the joint names of Richard Williams, deceased, the appellant John Squire, and the said William Morgan; and the other in the joint names of the same Morgan, Williams, and Squire, who were the trustees of the settlement.*

Mr. Squire, upon the receipt of the letter, directed so much of the stock to be sold as produced £10,000, and that sum [339] was paid to Mr. W. Morgan. This took place on the 14th of August, 1833. The money was raised by sale of the whole of one of the said sums of £10,000 consols, and of £1235 19s. 1d., part of the other sum. The bond, as executed by Mrs. Whitton, was on the receipt of the money handed over by Mr. W. Morgan to Mr. Squire, who afterwards filled up the blanks for the name of the obligee, by inserting the name of Robert Farthing Beauchamp. Mr. W. Morgan regularly paid the interest which accrued due thereon to the bankers of Mr. Beauchamp, to the credit of his account.

Mr. R. F. Beauchamp died in January 1841, having by his will appointed the appellants his executors, who shortly after his death proved the will, and in the month of August then next ensuing they applied to Mr. Wm. Morgan to repay the £10,000, and on discovering his inability to do so, application was made to Mrs. Whitton by letter from John Squire, dated Nov. 10th, 1841, saying:

“Mrs. Beauchamp having called on the trustees of her marriage settlement to reinstate, before the end of this month, the stock which is at present represented by your bond to her late husband for £10,000, I am under the necessity of applying to you for the discharge of the same, together with interest, from 5th of July last, up to which period it has been paid by Mr. Morgan; and you will oblige me by letting me know when it will be convenient for you to enable me to carry Mrs. Beauchamp's wishes into effect.”

* The trusts of the settlement were, as to one sum of £10,000 consols, settled by Mr. Beauchamp himself, to pay to him the dividends for his life, and after his death, if the wife should survive him, to her for life; and as to the second sum of £10,000 consols, settled by J. Westbrook, the lady's father, to pay the dividends according to her appointment, and in default of appointment, to her separate use for life; and after her death, if Mr. Beauchamp should survive her, to him for life. The trusts of the capital of both sums after the death of the survivor of Mr. and Mrs. Beauchamp, were for the benefit of the issue of the marriage; and in default of issue (which was the event), the £10,000 settled by Mr. Beauchamp was, after the death of the wife, to revert to him absolutely, and the other sum of £10,000 was to be held in trust for Mrs. Beauchamp absolutely, if she survived her husband, and if she died in his lifetime, then subject to a power of appointment, which she was thereby empowered to exercise by deed or will, and, in default of such appointment, in trust for Mr. Beauchamp absolutely.

In consequence of this application, Mrs. Whitton consulted Mr. Gregson, her solicitor, and in the correspondence which then took place between him and John Squire, the appellants were apprised of the legal invalidity of the bond. They then filed their bill against W. Morgan and Mrs. Whitton, praying "that it might be declared by the decree of the Court, that Mrs. Whitton, as well as W. Morgan, was liable to pay to the appellants, as [340] such executors as aforesaid, the said sum of £10,000, together with the interest due and to grow due thereon at the rate of £4 10s. per cent. per annum; and that it might be also in like manner declared that the said bond so executed as aforesaid was valid and ought to be enforced in equity against Mrs. Whitton, as well as W. Morgan, or otherwise that Mrs. Whitton, together with the said other defendant, might be decreed to execute to the appellants, as such executors as aforesaid, a good and valid joint and several bond for the said sum of £10,000, and interest thereof, at the rate aforesaid, in the place of the said other bond; and that at all events Mrs. Whitton, as well as the said W. Morgan, might be decreed to pay the appellants, as such executors as aforesaid, the sum of £10,000, together with the interest due and to grow due for the same, at the rate aforesaid, and that all necessary and proper accounts might be taken," etc.

Mrs. Whitton, by her answer to the bill, stated, among other things, that in August 1833, she, then being of the age of seventy years or thereabouts, and being upon terms of intimate friendship with, and having great confidence in, W. Morgan, who was a co-executor with her of the will of her late husband, and took an active part in the administration of his affairs, received from him a letter (the letter of the 7th of August, 1833, before set out); that her memory being somewhat impaired by age, she did not, at that distance of time, distinctly recollect whether she made any, or what answer, to the said letter, or what was the purport of such answer, if any; however, she believed that she (believing his representations contained in the said letter to be true, and that her compliance with his request was only a matter of temporary arrangement, and would not subject her to any real or permanent liability, and having entire confidence in him), did, in some manner, intimate to him that she would comply with his request; and she admitted, that W. Morgan, together with his son [341] Charles, came to her, at her house at Stonewall; and, from reference to a diary then kept by her, she believed that they so came to her on the 10th of August, 1833, and that they left her the succeeding day; and she stated, that in the course of such visit, the said bond, having such blanks therein as in the bill stated, was produced by W. Morgan, and presented to her for execution, but she could not, from failure of memory, speak positively as to the particular circumstances which took place on the occasion; she, however, believed that W. Morgan might, upon presenting the bond for execution, have told her that the blanks therein would be filled up, when the money (meaning the £10,000) was advanced; and, speaking to the best of her recollection, she believed and admitted, that in the course of the visit the bond was produced and presented to her for her execution by W. Morgan, and she did sign and seal, and, as her act and deed, deliver the same with such blanks therein as aforesaid; and she admitted that the bond, upon being so executed by her, was taken away by William and Charles Morgan, to London, for the purpose, as she supposed, of being handed over to the person who should advance the said sum of £10,000 to W. Morgan, as a security for that sum and the interest; she also admitted, that W. Morgan afterwards told her that Mr. Beauchamp had lent him the £10,000; that subsequently to the time when the bond was executed by her, and prior to the month of November 1841, she had many interviews with W. Morgan, and that in the course of such interviews she frequently adverted to the subject, and requested him to realise his securities, and to make the other arrangements alluded to in his letter of the 7th August, 1833, for the purpose of bearing her harmless, according to his promise, from whatever liability she might have incurred by joining in the bond, and she believed that in some of such conversations W. Morgan told her that he had paid the interest due on the £10,000 to Mr. Beauchamp, as the obligee in the bond, [342] and that no part of the principal sum had been paid by him; and she stated, that W. Morgan had been in the habit of representing to her, that some time in the year 1826 he had advanced the sum of £4000 on behalf of Richard Whitton, deceased, the son of her late husband William Whitton; in order to extricate him from difficulties in which he had been involved, and that she intended to make good such sum of £4000 to W. Morgan at her death; and she believed that she inquired of him whether, if she provided the said sum of £4000, it would enable him to pay the said alleged debt (meaning the said bond debt); but, except as aforesaid, she denied that she ever offered to pay any part of the principal sum to Mr. Beauchamp, or ever meant to admit her liability to pay it.

W. Morgan in his answer stated facts, to the effect before stated. Numerous witnesses were examined, the substance of whose evidence is comprised in the judgment of the Vice Chancellor of England, before whom the cause was heard in May 1844. when his Honour decreed that the bill should stand dismissed as against Mrs. Whitton, with costs; and that the defendant, W. Morgan, should pay to the appellants, as executors of Mr. Beauchamp, the sum of £10,000, together with interest thereon, from the 12th of August, 1841; and also the costs of the suit, together with what the appellants should pay to Mrs. Whitton for her costs.*

* The following are extracts from the short-hand writer's notes of the judgment, printed in a joint appendix to the appeal cases, and admitted on both sides to be correct:—

The Vice Chancellor.—I have considered this case very deliberately, and attended to all the evidence, and the statement in the bill and in the answers, and it does appear to me that it is much to be lamented the transaction originally was set on foot without the intervention and advice of Mr. Gregson; for my belief is, that if that gentleman had been advised with, what I will call the subsequent calamitous events would never have happened. It appears to me to be a very hard and cruel case on Mrs. Whitton. I cannot think that she has been quite fairly dealt with; and when I use that expression, I desire that it may be taken with every possible modification which may arise from this consideration, which I believe is founded in fact, that the parties who were dealing with her, one and all, were not exactly aware of what they were about, and that they did not understand the grounds on which they proceeded.

The opinion that I have formed on the case is quite irrespective of any question that may arise as to whether the bond being void at law might not, as an agreement, have operation in equity, because I apprehend such a general proposition cannot be disputed; and not only could a bond that was void at law have operation in equity as an agreement, but a bond good at law, and having a definite form at law, may nevertheless be taken in equity as evidence of an agreement for beyond what is expressed in the condition; and the case to which I alluded during the argument, and which afterwards went to the House of Lords (Logan v. Weinhold, 1 Clark and Finnelly, 611), is decisive on that point. But the circumstances of this case are very peculiar. (His Honour stated them as above, p. 334, et seq., and proceeded.) Now, there is a distinct statement made by Mr. Morgan, that if Mrs. Whitton would assist him in the way proposed, he would save her harmless; and what answer she wrote we do not know; probably she answered by return of post; in consequence of which letter, if it was written on the 8th, it would come to town on the 9th, and would therefore most probably give rise to that letter of the 9th which was written by Mr. Squire to Mr. Beauchamp, and which is noticed in Mr. Beauchamp's letter, by its allusion to the date. What the letter was, we do not know. Then Mr. Beauchamp writes the letter of the 11th of August to Mr. Squire. Now, with reference to that and to another circumstance that occurred in the cause, inasmuch as the cause turns mainly upon the deed of settlement, I requested that I might be furnished with that settlement, or a copy of it; and I have had an abstract of the settlement and the original itself. It appears that there was a settlement made, of what I will call the two sums of £10,000 consols, which in a given event, were to go in a different manner; (vide note supra, p. 338.) This is to be observed, that there was a power of sale of the stock given to the trustees, with the consent, in writing, of Mr. and Mrs. Beauchamp, and the trust for dealing with the proceeds was to invest them in either Government or real securities. Now, Mr. Beauchamp writes this letter, evidently adverting to that power in the settlement. (His Honour read the letter, supra, p. 337.) It is manifest to my mind that what Mr. Beauchamp meant was that there should be a mortgage security taken. This also is evident, that inasmuch as this letter was written on the 11th to Mr. Squire, and as Mr. Morgan, in pursuance of what passed between him and Mrs. Whitton, went with his son to her on the 10th. and was with her on the 11th, the contents of this letter could not have been communicated to him, and the reasonable presumption is, that though he might be aware of what had been passing in the mind of Mrs. Whitton, he did not on the 11th know the contents of this letter. What passed between Mr. Morgan and Mrs. Whitton it is impossible to tell; there is no evidence upon it, except so far as that may be considered evidence, which appears, not in a very satisfactory form, in the evidence of Mr. Charles Morgan, because it struck me that there was a slight inconsistency. The consequence therefore is, that the only representation that we have in evidence of what was stated by Mr. Morgan to Mrs. Whitton is his own letter of the 7th of August, in which he states, that he asked for assistance, that he wanted time to realise his securities, and that she might depend upon it he would save her harmless. Well, then, it appears that this bond did pass from the hands of Mr. Morgan to Mr. Squire; we have no evidence to show the time when it was transmitted, and how or what was the representation, if there was any, that accompanied the transmission of the bond; but it must have come to Mr. Squire's hands, because Mr. Squire himself filled up the blanks in his own handwriting; and the other part of the transaction is this, that though the bill proceeds to state that the stock was sold and the proceeds paid to Mr. Beauchamp, and that then Mr. Beauchamp advanced the money to Mr. Morgan; the real fact appears to have been, that the whole use of the money was effected without the personal intervention of Mr. Beauchamp at all. Mr. Morgan was the stock-broker, and the stock virtually stood in the names of Mr. Squire and Mr. Morgan, for the difference between the husband's stock and the wife's stock is determined by the position of the three names in which the stock stood. Well, therefore, no person was necessary for the actual making of the sale except Mr. Squire and Mr. Morgan; and a sufficient quantity of the stock was sold to produce the sum of £10,000, which, by the ordinary course of the transaction, as I presume, Mr. Morgan would have received.

[343] W. Morgan's circumstances making it impossible to have the benefit of the decree against him, the appeal was brought against so much of it as dismissed the bill with costs as against Mrs. Whitton.

[344] After the appeal was lodged, W. Morgan died intestate, and the suit in Chancery and the appeal were revived against his administrator, ad litem, who however did not appear to the appeal.

[345] Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Stuart (Mr. Toller was with them) for the appellants.

It appears that Mr. Morgan, from time to time, paid the interest into the bankers of Mr. Beauchamp, upon whose death his executors, the plaintiffs, conceiving that his estate was bound to the trustees, discharge the debt which they thought was so due from the estate of Mr. Beauchamp to the trustees, by purchasing in the names of the trustees a sum of stock equivalent to that which had been sold out, and then they file their bill. That bill represents the transaction as one in which the money was paid by the trustees to Mr. Beauchamp, and then by Mr. Beauchamp lent to Mr. Morgan; that is the statement on the bill.

It occurred to me that it was the duty of Mr. Squire, and, of course, of Mr. Morgan, to have taken care that they followed the authority given to them by Mr. Beauchamp, which clearly was an authority not to take, and rely on, a bond; but if they took a bond at all, to take it as the first thing, and then to obtain a mortgage security; but they do not do that, and it is perfectly true that the authority which was signed (that is, the letter of the 11th of August), by Mr. and Mrs. Beauchamp, would authorize the trustees to sell; in that there was no breach of trust, but the breach of trust was actually made in not doing the very thing which Mr. Beauchamp had directed Mr. Squire to do, namely, to see that the security was sufficient, to see that it was unencumbered, and to see that Mr. Beauchamp was made secure by a mortgage in their names; and when the executors thought proper to pay what they conceived to be the debt of Mr. Beauchamp to the trust fund, the question is rather, whether Mr. Squire was not in effect doing this, applying the fund which he and his co-executor had, as executors of Mr. Beauchamp, in shielding himself and Mr. Morgan from the consequences of their own breach of trust. As the fact now stands, there was no original debt from Mrs. Whitton to Mr. Beauchamp, because the real transaction was that the trust fund, as Mr. Beauchamp understood it, was to make the advance; but the trust fund was to be indemnified by the mortgage which Mr. Squire was to obtain.

There is distinct evidence, by the respondent's admissions in her answer, as well as by the recitals in the bond, [346] as executed by her, that she agreed to join Mr. Morgan in a bond to secure the re-payment of £10,000 with interest to the person, whosoever he might be, who should advance that sum to Morgan. Although she does not re-[347]-collect all that passed in the conversations between herself and Mr. Morgan on the 10th of August, 1833, she does not deny that she agreed to become surety for him. She admits that the instrument, signed and sealed by her, [348] was taken away by Mr. Morgan, for the purpose of being handed over to the person who should advance him the £10,000, as a security for that sum; and it is proved that it was so handed over, and that the money was advanced by Mr. Beauchamp on the faith of the instrument so executed by her, and on the faith of her agreement, to be surety for its repayment.

It appears to me that, inasmuch as this is a claim by means of the equity, which was obtained by having the bond filled up by Mr. Squire, which manifested the agreement, such as it was, that Mrs. Whitton had made; that those who take the agreement, take it affected by the equitable circumstances under which it was made; and one of the inducements of Mrs. Whitton to give the security, such as it was, unquestionably was the promise in the letter of the 7th of August, that Mr. Morgan would see her indemnified. Now, I should like to know whether, if it had been stated to Mr. Beauchamp that Mrs. Whitton never meant herself to be the person who should pay him, but that she relied on the representation made by Mr. Morgan, that he would indemnify her, whether the transaction, as far as Mr. Beauchamp or his executors were concerned, is not affected by the equitable notice of that indemnity, the promise of which was the sole inducement, as far as the evidence goes, to Mrs. Whitton, to give the security in the form in which we find it.

It seems to me that Mr. Squire and Mr. Morgan, cannot, as the executors of Mr. Beauchamp, claim a right to be indemnified, when, in point of fact, they have not fulfilled the instructions of Mr. Beauchamp, and the estate of Mr. Beauchamp has come into a situation that there may be a question whether the payment made by his executors to the trust fund is one that they can maintain against the parties entitled to his personal estate, of which I know nothing. It appears to me that Mrs. Whitton was not properly dealt with; for my opinion is, that she ought to have been told at the time that the bond was proposed to be executed, that it was, as it stood, waste paper, and that in order to make herself bound, without question, it would have been necessary that she should give some other security than that; instead of which she is allowed to do as she did, without the intervention of her solicitor; without a due explanation, as I take it; for C. Morgan, by the transaction as he represents it, shows that he was not capable of explaining the matter, and did not explain it.

I think the case has been mistaken on the pleadings. The case that is proved, is not the case that is alleged. You may argue about it, and say that it comes to the same thing; but then it is the argument that is to give the identity, and about the argument people may differ; the facts of the case are totally different; and I cannot but think that, without imputing moral blame to these parties (who are ignorant, as it appears, of law, who were ignorant of their duty as trustees, who seem not to have thought that to an aged lady it was at least due that she should be protected by the advice of her solicitor), that the whole thing was done in a hurry for the sole purpose of assisting Mr. Morgan, who made representations which turned out not to be true, and the assertion of which has given rise to the whole transaction; and it really does appear to me, that the only thing that I can do is to dismiss the bill with costs, as against Mrs. Whitton.

There is one thing which I wish to observe, in case this should go further, and that is this; on reading over that mass of letters which were handed up to me; in the letter No. 9, there certainly are statements made which lead one to infer that, supposing there had originally been a perfectly good liability on the part of Mrs. Whitton as surety, the liability was discharged by Mr. Beauchamp giving time to Mr. Morgan without her knowledge. That was a letter written by Mr. Squire, the 26th of November, 1841, to Mr. Gregson; it is not on the pleadings, but if this case is carried farther it might be a consideration whether some inquiry should not be directed in respect of it, and any one will read it and consider whether, if the statement be true, time was not given by Mr. Beauchamp to Mr. Morgan.

It appears quite clear from Mr. Beauchamp's letter of the 11th of August to Mr. John Squire, that he would not lend the money without the security of the respondent, by bond first, and mortgage afterwards. The circumstance, that no mortgage was obtained or asked from her, as originally contemplated by Mr. Beauchamp in that letter, cannot diminish her liability, if the money was advanced, as it certainly was, on the faith of her agreement to join as surety for its repayment, that agreement being admitted by her, and proved against her.

Although the bond turned out to be invalid at law, it is, nevertheless, as connected with the admissions and proofs in this case, a good agreement, under hand and seal, and such as a court of equity can enforce; Crosby v. Middleton (Prec. in Ch. 309), Nurse v. Frampton (1 Salk. 214). It was an agreement entered into by the respondent deliberately, as an act of friendship towards Mr. Morgan, and his failure to save her harmless, as he had promised, is no sufficient reason for absolving her from her act, on the faith of which another party advanced his money.

The Vice Chancellor's decree, proceeding on the view [349] that the respondent executed the instrument on the understanding that she would never be called upon for payment, is clearly a miscarriage, as that doctrine, if admitted, would put an end to suretyship altogether. It cannot be said that there was any misrepresentation, or any surprise practised on this lady: it is admitted that she was a woman of strong mind and conversant with business, having acted for several years as executrix of her husband. It would have been better, certainly, if her solicitor had been present or consulted on the occasion, if the urgency of Morgan's affairs could admit of delay; but no suspicion can arise from his absence, or from his not being consulted, to lessen or affect the binding obligation of the instrument executed by her. It is not quite certain that Mr. Gregson was then her solicitor: she had, some time before, employed another solicitor to draw her will. The answer of Mr. Morgan, and the evidence given by his son, shew that everything material for her to know was explained to her, and that she perfectly understood the nature and extent of the obligation—that if “Morgan could not pay, she must.” It never occurred to her that she was not liable, until apprised of the legal flaw in the bond; for she admits in her answer that she intended to leave Mr. Morgan £4000 by her will, to compensate him for losses he had sustained by assisting Mr. Whitton's son, and that she would pay him that sum in her lifetime if it would rid her of all liability in respect to the bond.

The defences set up to this claim on the Statute of Frauds and Statute of Limitations are not available. It is a sufficient answer to the first that this is an obligation or contract in writing; and being an instrument under seal, the second does not apply. In Crosby v. Middleton it was said, “forty-nine years was not sufficient time to ground presumption in equity;” and although Mrs. Whit[350]-ton was joined only as a surety with Morgan, she was severally liable; Rawstone v. Parr (3 Russ. 424, and 539).

It may also perhaps be argued on behalf of the respondent here, as it was in the Court below, that Mr. Beauchamp or his personal representatives were not the proper parties to sue, for that the money was advanced, not by Mr. Beauchamp, but by the trustees of his marriage settlement, Morgan himself, the borrower, being one of them. But the £10,000, although produced by the sale of the trust stock, was lent by and on behalf of Mr. Beauchamp, and not by the trustees, and the debt contracted by Morgan was contracted by him to Mr. Beauchamp, and not to the trustees. Mr. Beauchamp's letter shews that he was the lender, and that he and the trustees always considered him to be the creditor is further proved by Morgan's payments of the interest to his account at his bankers'.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Wigram (Mr. Baily and Mr. Jackson were with them) for the respondent:

The only agreement into which Mrs. Whitton entered was the agreement contained in the bond. The bond is void in law, there being no obligee; and it is void also as an agreement, there being no second contracting party. In Laythoarp v. Bryant (2 Bing. N.C., 742), Chief Justice Tindal states the law thus: “An agreement is not perfect unless in the body of it, or by necessary inference, it contains the names of the two contracting parties, etc.” That is a clear proposition: it is equally clear that a Court of Equity will not enforce a void instrument beyond its legal operation, especially against a mere surety, by construing it to be an instrument of a different nature, and binding on the party in another way; Sheffield v. Lord Castleton (2 Vern. 393), Simpson v. Field (2 Cas. in Ch. 22); there being no ground to infer mistake in the nature of the instrument, and no previous equity in the party seeking to enforce it; Sumner v. Powell (2 Mer. 30; Tur. and R. 423), Hebblewhite v. M'Morine (6 Mees. and W. 200), Clarke v. Bickers (14 Sim. 639). The alleged bond is also, both upon the principle of the authorities and the Statute of Frauds, void as a guarantie for the debt of Morgan, as not being complete at the time when it was executed; M'Iver v. Richardson (1 Mau. and S. 557).

The case of Crosby v. Middleton (Prec. in Chan. 309; and 2 Eq. Cas. Ab. 188), cited for the appellants, turns out, upon comparing the reports of it with the registrar's book, not to have any application to this case. There was fraud in that case, there is none in this.

The trustees of Mr. and Mrs. Beauchamp's settlement were themselves the parties who advanced the money to one of themselves; and this suit, though instituted in the name of Beauchamp's executors, was really for the purpose of protecting Squire, the surviving trustee of his settlement, against the breach of trust committed by him and Morgan in selling out the trust fund. That was the real object of the suit, and such was the view taken of it by the Vice Chancellor,—whose judgment in all its parts it is not necessary to defend. The suit, if maintainable at all against the respondent, ought to have been brought in the names of the trustees.

At the time when the bond was executed, the respondent had no reason to believe, either from the form of the instrument or the representations made to her, that the loan of money to Morgan was intended to be made by himself and his co-trustee, and therefore she was misled as [352] to the real nature of the intended transaction, and her position and liability as a surety.

The Courts would not enforce even a valid bond against a surety unless satisfied that all necessary explanations of the nature of the transaction had been given him before he entered into the bond. The non-communication of any fact within the knowledge of the party obtaining the bond, and material for the surety to be acquainted with, is undue concealment, and releases the surety; Pidcock v. Bishop (3 Barn. and C. 605), Stone v. Compton (5 Bing. N.C. 142), Railton v. Mathews (10 Clark and Fin. 934), Davidson v. Cooper (13 Mees. and W. 343).

If Mrs. Whitton had been informed that the money was to be advanced out of a trust fund by Morgan himself, one of the trustees, would she not naturally object that he would not, of course, enforce the bond against himself, the principal, but that she, the surety, would have to pay it? Again, if she had been informed that the security was to Mr. Beauchamp, would she not reasonably say, "Why should I be surety for Morgan to Beauchamp who is more the friend of Morgan than I am?" She, on the other hand, did no act to enable Morgan to deceive his co-trustee or Beauchamp. They knew that the bond was imperfect: they were not misled by any one, but had full knowledge of all the circumstances.

Mr. Kindersley in reply:

The truth and honour of the case are with the appellants, while on the other side, an ingenious argument is raised upon the technicalities of the law. It was impossible to inform Mrs. Whitton of the name of the obligee at the time of executing the bond, because it was not then known by whom the money would be advanced. It was proposed to her to be surety for Morgan, and to that pro-[353]-posal she agreed. It was immaterial to her to know by whom or out of what fund the money was to be advanced; and therefore the cases cited upon the non-communication of all the circumstances are not applicable to this case, which must be governed by the principle of Crosby v. Middleton, a case not in the least invalidated by Sheffield v. Lord Castleton (2 Vern. 393), or the other cases referred to on the other side (ante, pp. 350, 351).

The Lord Chancellor.—The object of this appeal is to reverse a decree of the Vice Chancellor of England, dismissing the appellants' bill, he being of opinion that they had not made out such a case against Mrs. Whitton as would justify him in granting the relief prayed.

The case set up by the bill was that Mrs. Whitton was indebted in the sum of £10,000 to the representatives of Mr. Beauchamp, with interest thereon at four and a half per cent., in consequence of a bond executed by her, as security for Mr. William Morgan, to enable him to raise money under circumstances of pressing necessity, which sum was advanced by Mr. Beauchamp on that security. The bill prayed that, etc. (His Lordship read the prayer).

Now this sum of £10,000 was never a legal debt from the defendant, Mrs. Whitton, to the plaintiffs; it is not pretended that it was; but the question is, whether the circumstances which are detailed in this suit are such as make her liable to pay this sum of £10,000.

It appears that Mr. William Morgan, who, unfortunately for Mrs. Whitton, was on terms of great intimacy with her, and had been a friend of her husband's, had got into great difficulties, and was under the necessity of borrowing a sum of money to make good his engagements. [354] Mr. Morgan, it appears, and Mr. Squire were the surviving trustees of Mr. Beauchamp's marriage settlement, and in that character had invested, in their names, sums of money, of which the £10,000 formed a part. Being pressed by the exigencies of his affairs, Mr. Morgan applied to Mrs. Whitton by a letter (which I do not find stated in the bill, although it is alluded to, but which is printed in the appellants' case), in which he represents to her his situation, and states that he had to make up a sum of money in seven days, and says, "in order to give me time to realise other securities, may I ask the favour of you to join me in a bond for £10,000, which will give me time to make arrangements."

No one reading this letter could possibly avoid understanding what the meaning of it was; that his object was to borrow £10,000, and that he wished the signature of Mrs. Whitton to a bond for £10,000, in order to facilitate the raising of that sum of money. What Mrs. Whitton's answer was, does not appear: she could not recall to her recollection the circumstances, in consequence of the failure of her memory, she being seventy-nine years of age when she put in her answer to this bill. Whether a letter in reply was returned she does not know, but her statement in her answer is, that she in some way or other expressed her wish to comply with the application that had been made.

It happened that Mrs. Whitton had for her solicitor a respectable gentleman (Mr. Gregson), who had been a great friend of her husband's, and who managed her concerns after her husband's death; and it happened, unfortunately for her, that a son of Mr. Morgan was a clerk in that gentleman's office, and that instead of Mr. Morgan desiring her to consult her solicitor, he sent his own son, a clerk in that solicitor's office, down to Mrs. Whitton for [355] the purpose of carrying the transaction into effect, for his own individual benefit. As to what passed between them on this occasion we have only the information given us by his son. The result, however, was, that in the very office of Mr. Gregson, and without his knowledge, was prepared this document by young Mr. Morgan, not as Mr. Gregson's clerk, on which the plaintiffs seek to recover this money, but which was wholly and entirely inoperative,—because, though in the form of a bond executed by Mrs. Whitton, it is a document in which she covenants with some person, whose name is not mentioned, as the obligee of the bond, to make good and pay the £10,000. The very foundation of the plaintiffs coming to a Court of Equity is that the instrument is invalid at law, as being a contract under seal, to which there is only one party, that is the party contracting to pay, but with blanks for the name of the person with whom the contract is made; therefore it is an instrument entirely void at law. This bond so made, got, as naturally it would, into the hands of Mr. Morgan, with blanks in it for the name of the obligee and the rate of interest on the principal sum.

The next transaction we find passing is, not a letter from Mr. Morgan to Mr. Beauchamp, but the answer of Mr. Beauchamp to a letter of Mr. Squire, which letter is not produced. As the bill was filed by the executors of Mr. Beauchamp, Mr. Squire, who is one of them, would naturally be in possession of any letter written to Beauchamp by Morgan; but there is no such letter produced, although the transaction was one which, as appears by the answer, had much engaged his attention. We have that answer, to the letter of Mr. Squire by Mr. Beauchamp, dated the 11th of August; the bond bearing date the 12th. It is said, though it was actually executed on the 11th, being Sunday, it bears date on the 12th, Monday. I think [356] much importance is attached to that date in this way:—Beauchamp wrote the letter on the 11th; he could not, therefore, have had a knowledge of the document which Morgan had obtained from Mrs. Whitton the same day. In this letter of Mr. Beauchamp, dated the 11th of August, from Somersetshire, he says, "Recollect, I propose to lend stock, and not money, and for this reason, because I intend you to sell as much of the trust stock as you may require for this purpose," which proves to demonstrate that the cestui que trust of the settlement must have been entirely ignorant of Mrs. Whitton's having put her hand and seal to an instrument for the purpose of inducing him or any one else to advance the money, because he speaks prospectively of what may hereafter take place, and not of a transaction that had already taken place. "Recollect the trust stock stands in the joint names of yourself and Morgan. As a proof that Mrs. Beauchamp with myself is anxious to assist them at this critical moment, she will add her signature to this letter, acquiescing in the sale of part of the trust stock, relying on your friendship and care in seeing the security is what it ought to be." [His Lordship read the letter, ante, p. 337.]

Now this has been relied on by Mr. Kindersley, as proving that the original proposal by Mr. Morgan was that Mr. Beauchamp himself should advance the money. It appears to me to prove very strongly the contrary. There is not any allusion in his letter to the effect that he was personally to advance the money. If he had been asked to advance the money, he would have said, "You ask me to advance the money, I have not got it, but there is another mode in which it may be raised out of the trust fund." The plaintiffs ought to have been in possession of the letter of the 9th, to which this is an answer on the 11th, which does not allude to any advance by Beauchamp [357] personally, but proposes to sell a part of the trust fund in order to raise the £10,000; and therefore the natural inference is, that in the letter to which this is an answer, the proposition of Mr. Morgan was merely to do what is suggested, and not that Mr. Beauchamp himself should advance the money. It is not unlikely that Mr. Morgan who had no scruples in committing a breach of trust in selling the trust property, the moment Mr. Beauchamp consented, should himself have been the author of the suggestion, as a ready means of furnishing the money of which he was in want, and he was not likely to meet with any great impediment from his colleague Mr. Squire; he indeed also consented, and the stock was sold, and I conceive so far from its being proved that it was the intention of Mr. Beauchamp to advance this money himself, and himself only to be a creditor, there is every reason to suppose (though it is not proved, except so far as there is an inference from the letter) that from the beginning to the end there was no intention of raising the money except by a breach of trust so to be committed by Mr. Morgan and Mr. Squire.

However, this breach of trust was committed, and it does not appear that any communication on the subject was made to Mrs. Whitton; but the money was obtained, as the evidence proved, from the trustees of the settlement, of whom Mr. Morgan was one, and in order to give it a better appearance than it would have had if Mr. Morgan had appeared both as the borrower and as the lender; and that it might not be easily detected that the whole transaction was founded on a breach of trust, machinery was resorted to for making it appear that the loan came from Mr. Beauchamp. But the transaction, so far as a legal obligation was created, whether the trustees were to advance the money directly to Morgan or to Beauchamp for the [358] purpose of advancing it to Morgan, is not very material. Morgan was the person who prepared the plan, and Mrs. Whitton was to be made liable to the very man who was the principal obligor and debtor, as the evidence proves; and we have reason to suppose he had not any intention but to give himself the trust money, and with Mr. Squire's approbation to apply the fund at once to his own particular purposes.

It appears that nothing more was done, and no farther security was obtained. This instrument is executed; Mr. Morgan obtains the money, the whole of which is lost by his inability to pay, and then the plaintiffs come and ask a Court of Equity as against Mrs. Whitton to direct that she shall be ordered to pay the £10,000, or substitute for this admitted invalid bond some other security on which she may be made liable.

The first question which the House has to consider is, what is the plaintiff's right to sue Mrs. Whitton? Have they any right to sue her? The second is, have they a right to say she is liable to the demand? Now the House will ascertain what is the plaintiffs' right, either of suing on the contract, or on any equity arising out of the nature of the transaction under which the defendant became responsible. The House will not give effect to this, which is an inoperative instrument, not only proved, but admitted to be inoperative as a bond; because there is no contract made with any person, and if there be an infirmity in the instrument as a bond, it equally applies to it as an agreement. For a party cannot have an agreement with the whole world; he must have some person with whom the contract is made. If that is so, the document is equally invalid as an agreement as it is as a bond; and the document therefore, as it stands, is perfectly inoperative, not [359] amounting to any contract between the defendant sought to be affected by the demand of £10,000, and the plaintiffs by whom the claim is made.

Then it is said, though this is not a perfect instrument or a contract as between the plaintiffs and Mrs. Whitton, yet there are circumstances in the case which would raise an equity against her, which would make her responsible to the party advancing the money. If he never did advance the money, if it never came out of his pocket at all, but came from the trust fund by a manifest breach of trust, the plaintiffs cannot come to a court of equity to ask for its interference against Mrs. Whitton, for they have shown no contract, and no equity as against her; no privity between the plaintiffs and Mrs. Whitton has been shewn; for the bond, which, it is said, was the inducement for advancing the money, was not made till after the letter had been written proposing the sale of the stock, which was afterwards carried into effect.

This case cannot be compared to the case of The Duke of Beaufort v. Neeld (12 Clark and Fennelly, 248). [His Lordship stated the principle of that decision.] Here it is clear that this document was not the inducement for Mr. Beauchamp to advance the money, for his letter shows that he did not know of this document at the time he gave the power to advance the money. In point of fact the parties advancing the money, beyond all doubt, were Mr. Morgan and Mr. Squire; but if Mr. Morgan was Mr. Beauchamp's agent for that purpose, it is clear that having given directions to carry that into effect, he being his agent, he knew at the moment that Mr. Beauchamp was to be the obligee of the bond, and he knew that Mrs. Whitton was not bound by anything the document contained. Such being the contract, can he call on Mrs. Whitton to pay the money on such a docu-[360]-ment, which is actually void, and which he well knew was not the inducement to Mr. Beauchamp to advance the money, and the effect of which he well knew at the time of preparing it?

There are reasons to believe that the transfer of the stock by Mr. Beauchamp's executors, was done in order to enable them to file this bill.

It is said that Mr. Gregson at a subsequent time had seen this bond in the hands of Mr. Beauchamp. The fact is not material. We are entirely without any evidence as to the time when Mr. Beauchamp's name was inserted; it is admitted that the mode in which his name was introduced is such that it did not give any validity or force to the document, which was before inoperative. There is a blank left for the name of the obligee, and that, in the absence of any proof of his having advanced the money, is quite sufficient to dispose of this case, and of the right of the plaintiffs to sue in a Court of Equity. But, independently of that, the respondent has a good defence upon her own case, for upon the face of the instrument, as well as upon the whole transaction, it appears that she intended only to be a surety. That is not disputed—it is in terms admitted—Mr. Morgan was the principal obligor, and it is now asked that Mrs. Whitton should pay the whole amount as if upon a legal contract. If the bond is liable to be impeached as a legal contract, it is for the same reason invalid as an agreement. But it is possible that the bond may be supported by some parol agreement: then the parol agreement must be made out. There is no doubt that Mr. Morgan at that time calculated upon the expectation of raising the money by a sale of the trust fund, and not by borrowing money from a third person. No doubt, when he ultimately did that, he was bound to state the fact to Mrs. Whitton. The letters show that Mr. Morgan had been entertaining the notion of sel-[361]-ling the trust fund at that time. Nobody can read the letters and suppose that he intended to borrow the money—and, beyond all doubt, if ever that was his intention, he did not subsequently act upon it—he no longer intended to borrow the money and to give a bond as a security for repayment of it. The liability which he was under as a trustee, making those advances, was of a totally different nature from that which had been represented to Mrs. Whitton. If the bond had been valid he would no longer have been a party in that obligation—he was no longer the party bound as the principal debtor for the payment of the debt. Nobody could suppose that that would not destroy the act of the surety. It might have been that if Mr. Beauchamp had been alive and had to pay the money, it would have been a different thing, whether the party had a claim against his estate on the bond for the money which had been advanced by him as money coming from his estate, or for the money which had been advanced by the trustees.

It remains for your Lordships to say whether there is not an end of this case upon this ground, that the bill asserts as a fact that the defendant acted upon the representation made to her, and the representation made to her was contrary to the facts of the case, and that that is quite sufficient to disentitle the plaintiffs to the relief which is prayed against her. The case of Crosby v. Middleton (Prec. in Chan. 309; 2 Eq. Cas. Ab. 188), which was cited to your Lordships, is not at all analogous to the present case, the facts of that case being not at all similar to the present. There was an obligor and an obligee named in that case. There were parties to the deed, and the parties' hands and seals were affixed to it. That case was very different from this, and we must know more of the facts of that case, before we can come to the conclusion sought to be [362] drawn from it in favour of the plaintiffs in this case. Here there is an absence of the name of the obligee, which is quite sufficient of itself to invalidate the instrument. There is nothing in the contract—independently of the question of fraud—there is nothing in the position in which this matter stands that would make the defendant liable to the demand made by the plaintiffs. This case must be disposed of according to the strict rules of law. This is a claim to have a payment of the sum of £10,000, advanced to Mr. Morgan, arising out of a breach of trust, the £10,000 being a fund over which he exercised a power which he was not justified in doing—a fact which the defendant, Mrs. Whitton, was not made acquainted with, and it is clear there is nothing in the transaction to attach a liability to her. Therefore I advise your Lordships to dismiss the appeal with costs.

The appeal was accordingly dismissed, and the decree affirmed, with costs.

Libel—Interdict—Practice—Costs.

The register of protests for non-acceptance and non-payment of bills of exchange and promissory notes, established by the Scotch acts of 1681 and 1696, and the 12 Geo. 3, c. 72, and 23 Geo. 3, c. 18, is a public document, to which every body has a right of access, and the publication of which in a printed paper does not constitute a libellous publication.

A person whose name was upon this register, applied to the Court of Session for an interim interdict to prevent, so far as his own name was concerned, the publication of a copy of the register. The Court decreed for the application: Held by the Lords, reversing that decree, that the interdict ought not to have been granted, and also that the costs in the court below should be given.

An interdict, though in form ad interim only, must be treated as a final judgment, and may be the subject of appeal to this House.

This was an appeal against a decree of the Court of Session, by which suspension and interdict had been granted against the appellants under the following circumstances. The appellants were the directors of the Scottish Mercantile Society, and the printer to that society. The Society had been formed of merchants and traders, and its object was declared to be "to concentrate and bring together, from time to time, a body of information for the exclusive use of the members, relating to the mercantile credit of the trading community, with the view of diminishing the hazards to which mercantile men were exposed." The third rule of the society was to the following effect:—"The secretary shall collect from the general records of protests, hornings, and other records of diligences kept for Scotland at Edinburgh, the names and designations of debtors in trade, and otherwise, appearing in these records. The secretary shall likewise excerpt [364] from the Edinburgh Gazette the names and descriptions of sequestered bankrupts, and all notices of applications for cessio bonorum. The whole information so collected shall be printed and forwarded monthly, or oftener, as the general committee of directors shall think proper, to each member of the society respectively." The 5th rule declared that "the information contained in the printed record, so forwarded to members, shall be confined to themselves for business purposes, and no member shall communicate or use such information for other purposes, under the penalty of deprivation of membership." The society printed the information thus obtained in a book called "The Scottish Mercantile Society's Record." This book was known among the trading community as the "Black List." The respondent had dishonoured two promissory notes for £48 and for £100, and Andrew Miller, the payee of the same, had had them duly protested and the protests registered according to the Laws of Scotland.

By the act of 1681, c. 20,* it was directed, "that in case of any foreign bill of exchange from or to this realm, duly protested for not acceptance, or for not payment, the said protest having the bill of exchange prefixed, shall be registrable within six months after the date of the said bill in case of non-acceptance, or, after the falling due thereof in case of non-payment, in the books of Council and Session, or other competent judicature, at the instance of the person to whom the same is made payable, or his order, either against the drawer or indorser in case of a protest for non-acceptance, or against the acceptor in case of a protest for non-payment, to the effect it may have the authority of [365] the judges thereof interposed thereto, that letters of horning on a simple charge of six days and other executorials necessary may pass thereupon, for the whole sums contained in the bill, as well exchange as principal, in form as effairs."

By an act of 1696, c. 36, the statute of 1681 was extended to inland as well as foreign bills, but no registration was provided for by these statutes except as against the acceptor. By the 12 Geo. III., c. 72, ss. 42, 43, the provisions of the previously existing Scotch acts were extended to notes as well as bills, and to drawer and indorser as well as to acceptor; and by the 23 Geo. III., c. 18, s. 55, the previous statute was made perpetual. An act of 1617, which established the Register of Sasines, had directed that such Register "shall be patent to all the lieges," and the "act of regulations" (Art. 12, printed Acts of Sederunt, 1695, p. 211) declared "that the Registers immediately under the clerk register's keeping, in the lower Parliament House, or any where else, be patent to all the lieges;" and then it settled the fees for searching and taking minutes. The 55 Geo. III., c. 70, regulated the keeping of the various public registers in Scotland, and the 1 and 2 Geo. IV., c. 38, providing for making indexes to them for the purpose of easy reference.

The society had in the usual manner taken a copy of the Register in which the protests for non-payment of the respondent's bills had appeared, and his name was about to be published, together with those of other persons, in the society's book, which was a mere copy of the Registers, when he applied to the Court of Session for an interim interdict to prevent the publication. The case came before Lord Robertson as Lord Ordinary, when his Lordship granted the interim interdict, and ordered the case to be reported for the opinions of the Lords of the second division of the Court of Session. The other judges were con-[366]sulted, and six of them, the Lord President, and Lords Fullerton, Cunningham, Ivory, Wood, and Robertson, thought that the interdict ought to be granted; Lords Jeffery, Mackenzie, and Murray were of a different opinion. When the Judges of the Second Division decided the case, the Lord Justice Clerk and Lord Moncreiff concurred in opinion with the majority of the consulted judges; Lord Cockburn agreed with the minority, and Lord Medwyn declined giving an opinion. Under these circumstances the Court decreed for the respondent. The present appeal was entered against this decree.

Sir F. Kelly and Mr. Wortley (Mr. Gordon was with them) for the appellants. In the statement of the facts there is no allegation of malice on the part of the appellants, nor of injury sustained by the respondent. There is, on the other hand, evidence which rebuts the presumption of malice. The extract complained of is taken from a public record, and was made for a limited purpose, and for the use of a body of persons having an interest in the contents, and for the purpose of their protection. Under such circumstances the case of Goldstein v. Foss (6 Barn. and Cress. 156; 4 Bing. 489) shows that no action is maintainable, and consequently no injunction can be maintained.

The law of Scotland gives a peculiar character to bills of exchange and promissory notes. A protest for non-payment is nearly equivalent to a judgment in the Scotch Courts, and a summary execution may issue thereon. But in order that a protest should have that effect, it must be registered under the provisions of several acts of Parliament. In Erskine's Institutes (Bk. 2, tit. 5, s. 54), it is said, "It is a general rule that no creditor can use diligence on his obligation without the previous sentence of a judge. But because it was thought unnecessary where the obligation was [367] clear, to have a formal warrant, in order to diligence, the expedient was fallen upon that most deeds should bear a clause, by which the granter consents to their registration in the books of any competent court. This registration, in consequence of the granter's consent, is in the judgment of the law a decree, as to the special effect of execution, and indeed it carries the essential character of a decree, for the deed bears to be registered by the authority of that judge in whose court it is recorded; the extract is signed by the clerk of Court, and mentions the appearance of the granter's procurator or advocate consenting to the decree. Bills of exchange and inland bills are registered by stat. 1681, c. 20 (see note, ante p. 364); 1696, c. 36 (c); though their style admits of no clause of registration." The first of these acts is that of 1681, which relates in terms to foreign bills only; its operation was extended by the act of 1696 to inland bills. Both these acts apply to the acceptor only; but the 72 Geo. III., c. 18, s. 42, extends the same provisions to the drawer and acceptor. This registration therefore is authorized by statute, and the publication complained of is merely the publication of a judicial record. It is impossible to contend that that which is publicly registered under the authority of a statute can be a libellous publication, and if not, it cannot become so by being repeated by a private individual, especially as the law of Scotland expressly makes all these registers "patent to all the lieges." The law itself intended them to be public.

But assuming the publication to be libellous, still a proceeding by way of interdict is not valid in law. This point may fairly be tried by reference to an injunction in this country. No injunction could be granted here to prevent the publication of a libel. An injunction is granted to prevent an interference with property. The well-known case in which an injunction was issued to prevent the [368] publication of certain private letters, was one in which that publication was sought to be prevented, on the ground that it was an interference with property. Such an injunction as that which is now asked is wholly without precedent. The granting of an injunction under such circumstances would be a usurpation of the authority of a jury and a court of law. Libel or no libel is a question of law, and the assumption of the authority to decide such a question by a court of equity would be the assumption of a new jurisdiction. Within these few days an application by Sir James Clark to prevent the continued publication of advertisements that certain pills were approved of and recommended by him, has been refused, on the ground that no question of property was involved, and the Court said that the application was, in substance, an application to prevent by injunction the publication of a libel, and must, therefore, be refused. The same reason applies here with greater force. The publication here is sought to be prevented, because the matter is alleged to be injurious to the reputation of the applicant. But that only shews that the publication may subject the publisher to an action for damages. That is the proper remedy and not a proceeding by way of interdict. Such a proceeding is prejudging the case, and prejudging it too in a manner contrary to law; for, admitting the publication to be injurious to character, no damages could be obtained in respect of it if it was true, for the defence of truth is an answer to a claim for damages. Now, it is clear, that equity would only interfere where the matter published was actionable. Equity, since truth is a defence to such an action, would, therefore, first enquire if the matter was true. But that implies an inquiry of fact—one which is not to be made upon affidavit, but by an issue. A court of equity could not exercise the functions of a jury, nor will it set up to be a court for the trial of questions of libel, nor to decide questions of fact, which can only be properly decided by an issue.

[369] This argument supposes (and the supposition is made in favour of the respondent), that this publication could not bear the character of a libellous publication. Even then the proceeding by interdict would be incompetent. But the publication cannot be treated as libellous. There was no personal motive hostile to the respondent in making it; no selection of a particular individual's name was made; no malice against him was proved; but there was a publication of all the names found in a certain Register, and that Register was itself a judicial document. The Register is a public document, created by the law, in which, by the terms of two acts of Parliament, these protests for non-acceptance or non-payment are to be entered; it is open for the inspection of every body; it is therefore essentially public, and the printing it in this list could not divest it of its public character, nor make it the subject of a private action.

In whatever way therefore this case is viewed, the want of authority to grant the interdict is manifest, and the judgment of the Court below must be reversed.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Anderson for the respondent.—It is necessary, in the first place, to call attention to the stage of the proceedings where the question arose, and to consider first whether there is not on the face of the application itself sufficient to justify the Court in entertaining it? and next, whether, as the decree of the Court below is not a final decree, this appeal is not incompetent? The interlocutor is an interim, and not a final interlocutor. It merely suspends the case till the time of trial. Bell's Dictionary (Tit. Bill Chamber) fully explains this proceeding. After granting the interdict, the questions raised between the parties remain for further consideration. Erskine, in his Institutes of the Law of Scotland (Book 4, tit. 3, s. 20), shows that to be the case. It is there said, "Where there is no decree, there [370] may be suspension, though not in the strict acceptation of that word; for suspension is a process authorised by law for putting a stop, not only to the execution of iniquitous decrees, but to all encroachments either on property or possession, and in general to every unlawful proceeding." The Court of Session acted on this principle in the case of Müller v. Mitchell (13 Shaw and D. 644), where the dismissed cashier of a bank printed a statement of the bank's accounts, which he said he intended only as instructions for his own counsel in a suit in which he was engaged against the bank, but copies of which got into other hands, and the numbers printed exceeded those which he could have required for the use of counsel. The Court there granted the interdict, and made him pay all the costs, on the ground that the publication was an unlawful proceeding. That case is precisely in point with the present. The Court, by granting the interdict, merely declares that there is enough to raise a serious ground for judicial consideration.

Under such circumstances can this House treat the proceeding as other than merely interlocutory? If so the appeal is not competent. But suppose the appeal to be competent, then it is impossible for this House to say that there is no ground for further consideration. If not, then the judgment of the Court below cannot be reversed.

The facts of the case show that there was a good ground for making the application, so far as those facts were concerned, and no one judge in the Court below doubted the existence of the jurisdiction of the Court of Session. That jurisdiction is not now denied in direct terms, but it is contended that no injunction would be granted in such a case by the Court of Chancery in England, and therefore that it ought not to be granted by the [371] Court of Session. But that argument cannot be maintained; for all the Judges of the Court of Session speak of such a proceeding as one familiar to them. Lord Fullerton says, "This is a case in which the party is entitled to claim the protection of the Court. He is not bound to await the threatened injury by the publication, but has a manifest interest, and a legal right to take the competent measures to prevent it. It is one of the cases in which interdict is most appropriate and least objectionable. The one party may be materially injured by that which is threatened to be done, while the other can specify no possible injury which he can sustain from the prevention." These are the principles which govern the Courts in cases of applications for injunction, and where they occur the injunction is never refused. The Lord Justice Clerk says, "I am not of opinion that an intention to injure another, or as we call it in law, express or direct malice, or even constructive malice, is in any degree necessary in order to make the act complained of the proper subject for the cognizance and interference of a court of law, whether for the redress or for the prevention of the injury which may arise from that act."

[The Lord Chancellor.—Is not that asking the Court to exercise the powers of a censor?]

It may be that that argument of the Lord Justice Clerk carries the law to an extreme point, but the principle on which he proceeds is correct. The test of recovering damages is not a proper test by which to decide whether an interdict is maintainable. Suppose a man writes a letter, a jury might not give the writer one farthing damages, though a person wrongfully published that letter, but still the Court might grant an interdict to prevent the publication. The Lord Justice Clerk speaks positively as to that being the law of Scotland. He says, "An application for interdict against any act which may [372] injure or prejudice, or seriously wound the feelings, or affect the interests of another, is not at all to be judged or disposed of by the consideration whether the act if done will give rise to a claim of damages." The case of the publication of a private letter is a case in point.

[The Lord Chancellor.—But there the right of property in the letter is involved.]

Still that is a case where damages could not be afterwards recovered. And then again the observation arises that that is a case taken from the law of England. Now it is clear that this appeal is not to be decided on the law of England, but on the law of Scotland; and not one of the Judges of the Court below felt the slightest doubt about the jurisdiction of the Court in such a matter. And the case of bankruptcy furnishes an analogy in favour of the respondent; for the publication of an advertisement will be restrained where it appears to the Court that the publication would be improper.

The only question remaining is the question whether that jurisdiction can, in this case, be properly exercised. In the first place this publication is attempted to be justified, because it is said that the Register is a public record. Secondly, it is said that the publication was without malice, and that it was made for a legitimate purpose.

As to the first of these points:—Is this a publication of a sentence or decree of a court of justice? It cannot be assimilated to a fair and impartial report of the proceedings of a court of justice, for here this is but an ex parte proceeding in a matter which has not terminated. Such a publication is never held to be protected. This is not like an argument in foro contentioso, where the statements on both sides are set forth. How can the public know the reasons (and there may be very good and sufficient reasons), why these notes were not paid when due? The thing published is the statement of one party only, which may convey a very erroneous impression as to [373] the fact. If a record of the Court of Chancery had been used in this way, that Court would interfere. The ground of that interference might be that such a dealing with a record of the Court was a contempt of Court. But the ground of interference is immaterial, if the Court would interfere. The publication of writs issued against a man, or of a declaration in an action, would not be justifiable, for both, though parts of a judicial proceeding, would be merely ex parte statements. The purpose of these Registers was to give a legal right to judgment in favor of certain parties who had proved a title thereto, not to make known to all the world what had been done with regard to a particular bill of exchange or promissory note.

The Registers were only meant for the use of the parties directly concerned in the transaction.

The next point made by the appellants is, that the publication was without malice, and was for a legitimate purpose. But the motive of the act is immaterial, if the act is one which must of necessity be detrimental to another person. The person who makes the publication must, in law, be answerable for the consequences of it, and if those consequences are injurious, he must be supposed to have known that they would be so. The only exception to this rule is in the case of an act done in the execution of a legitimate authority. That was not the case here. The fact that the parties claimed to be interested in the matter did not give them authority to make the publication. The case of Goldstein v. Foss (6 Barn. and Cr. 154; 4 Bing. 489), as reported in Barnewall and Cresswell's Reports, is not in point to justify the publication, for that case was decided on the form of the pleadings alone, and left the right of publication untouched. But there is another report (2 Carr. and Payne, 252) of that case when it occurred at Nisi Prius, which shews that a publication of this sort was held to be libellous.

[374] The facts were these:—A Society had been formed, called "The Society for the Protection of Bankers and others." By its rules all fair traders were admissible. The secretary sent round a circular to the members, in which he said that he was directed to inform them that the plaintiff (and two other persons whom he named), were not deemed eligible to be members of that Society. It was proved that that form of writing was understood to mean that he pointed out the plaintiff as a swindler. Lord Tenterden told the jury that there could be no doubt that such a publication was libellous, and the plaintiff obtained a verdict for £150 damages. That case is an authority to shew that this publication is not one which is justified by law, but is one that may be the subject of a claim for damages. If so, the publication cannot be justified as one made under the authority of the law.

Then it is said that this publication might be shewn to be true, and that the proof of truth would be a complete defence for publishing it. But that argument, even if correctly stated, can only apply to English cases, for in Scotland the truth of a defamatory publication is not an answer to the right of action by the party injured.

Mr. Wortley replied.—The Registers are meant for the information of every body else; no directions would be given to make indexes to them for the purpose of facilitating searches. Such a labour would be quite unnecessary, if they were merely intended as records of judgments for the benefit of the parties making them. Then as to a decree of interdict and suspension being merely an interlocutory and not a final proceeding, the case of Fleming v. Dunlop (7 Clark and F. 43.; M'Lean and R. 547) establishes that it is a final decree, and as such may be made the subject of appeal to this House. The case of Goldstein v. Foss, as reported in Carrington and [375] Payne (vol. 2, p. 252), shews that the jury considered the publication there to be libellous; but that case either does not affect the present, or is an authority in favour of the argument for the appellants; for the question of libel or no libel is one which is peculiarly for the decision of a jury, and which cannot be decided by a court of equity. Nor can a court of equity anticipate the verdict of a jury on such an issue. The law of Scotland does not differ from the law of England on the subject of the truth being an answer to an action of libel; Bell's Principles (page 759, s. 2057). The case of Miller v. Mitchell (13 Shaw and D. 644), does not establish that an interdict would lie in a case like the present. There the thing published was not a public document, but a private statement, and the subsequent report of the same case, under the name of Smith v. Mitchell (14 Dunl. B. and M. 172), shews that the proceeding was one for contempt of Court, and that the question of the right to issue an interdict was never discussed. The same case, reported in another book (8 Scottish Jurist, 105), is reported under the title "Contempt of Court."

Mr. Bethell, in reply on the case of Fleming v. Dunlop, now first cited:—That case furnishes no analogy to the present. The remedy there sought by the interdict was final in its nature. It was the decision of a right to a seat in a corporation, the proceeding being the same as our quo warranto. Here the Court is not asked to decide anything, but merely to stop something till a certain matter has been decided upon. That is clearly an interlocutory proceeding.

The Lord Chancellor (Feb. 17).—If it was necessary to lay down a rule respecting the jurisdiction which has been exer-[376]-cised in this cause by the Court of Session in granting interdict against the publication of libels, this cause would be one of the highest importance, and, in the present state of information submitted to this House, of the greatest difficulty; for it is impossible to read the observations of the learned Judges in the Court below without seeing that there is much want of precision in their observations upon the subject. But being, as I am, of opinion that the general question is not necessarily involved in the consideration of this appeal, I think it expedient, under the circumstances, to avoid giving any opinion upon that general question. I cannot, however, avoid expressing an earnest hope that, if this question should arise and require a decision in the Court of Session, and no distinct rule should be found already to exist upon the subject, the consequences of any rule to be established for the first time will be most carefully considered before such a rule is laid down; and particularly that it may be considered how the exercise of such a jurisdiction can be reconciled with the trial of matters of libel and defamation by juries under the 55 George III., cap. 42, or indeed with the liberty of the press. That act appoints a jury as the proper tribunal for trial of injuries to the person by libel or defamation; and the liberty of the press consists in the unrestricted right of publishing, subject to the responsibilities attached to the publication of libels, public or private. But if the publication is to be anticipated and prevented by the intervention of the Court of Session, the jurisdiction over libels is taken from the jury, and the right of unrestricted publication is destroyed. And I must add, that, according to the doctrine attributed to the Lord Justice Clerk, in the printed report of his judgment, the exercise of this power would be quite arbitrary; for he considers that the right to claim damages, if the act had been committed, is not the test according to which the interdict must be granted or refused.

[377] I do not pursue this question further because, assuming the jurisdiction of the Court in matters of interdict to be as extensive as it is claimed, I think that in this particular case it has been improperly exercised.

Bills and notes dishonoured and protested are by certain acts of Parliament to be registered. From this register the appellants are in the practice of publishing lists, copy, or excerpts, and the object of the interdict is to restrain the appellants from printing in such lists the name of the respondent: that is, he, admitting the fact that the two notes in question have been dishonoured by him, prays that that fact may not be published. He himself, by the application for the interdict, not only admits the fact, but gives to that fact a greater degree of publicity than would have attended it if his name had been inserted in the list.

If the publication intended had been a narrative or statement injurious to the party complaining, and which he had a right to prevent, the observation might not apply; but in this particular case, the jurisdiction by interdict being to prevent a wrong, we find it exercised in a case in which it could not possibly have any such effect. I found my opinion upon this, that the publication of the fact proposed to be inserted in the appellants' lists, has been made by the act of Parliament in certain Registers, the contents of which are public property, and the publication of them authorised.

The act of 1681, chapter 20, enacts that foreign bills, shall be registrable in the books of Council and Session "to the effect that it may have the authority of the judges for the process to issue in like and in the same manner as upon registered bonds and decret of registration proceeding upon consent of parties." Subsequent acts extended these provisions to inland bills and promissory notes. The result of them all is to give this registration the effect of a decree or judgment of the Court of Session. It is [378] equivalent to what, in this country, we call a judgment upon a warrant of attorney. In neither case does the Court interfere, but in both, as in cases of judgment by default and decret in absence, the party having a right to the authority of the Court to confirm his claim, obtains the judgment as of course. Whether that judgment is obtained by authority of Parliament, or by the consent of parties, or by the practice of the Court, appears to me to be immaterial. It is for all purposes a judgment of the Court until altered or reversed, and entitled to all the attributes of any judgment after the longest and most contested litigations.

This indeed is not in dispute. The Lord Justice Clerk says in his judgment, "I hold the Register to be a proper record of Court, as much as the actual book of procedure now on the table, and entered up from day to day by the clerks. The party appears with his protest, and asks the Court for a certain decree upon it; which decree is not obtained by deliverance which leaves the Court, but by an entry in the book of Court."

Is it then unlawful to state or publish the decrees or judgment of Courts of justice? If their proceedings are public, so must be the result of such proceedings, namely, the judgment. For although the steps preliminary to the judgment are not transacted in open Court (the whole being incontestable in that stage), yet the whole is supposed to be the result of regular proceedings in court. The Register, therefore, is in its nature public; but it is especially made so for purposes distinct from the object of giving effect to the right of the party. So Lord Bankton states in the passage referred to, 4, 4, 18. The Act of Registration of 1696 provides that the Register under the clerk register's keeping, "shall be patent to all the lieges." This includes the books of council and session in which the entry of protests is kept. The 55th Geo. III., c. 70, regulates the keeping of registers of deeds and instruments [379] of protest; section 27 of the 1 and 2 Geo. IV., c. 38, provides for making indexes to certain and divers registers, and amongst others, to adjudications recorded in the books of council and session for the purpose of easy reference, and that they may be made accessible to the public. It appears that in fact no index was made of the Register of Protests, but by the table of fees a different fee is payable for searches where there is and where there is not an index; so that the contents of all the registers, whether with indexes or not, are open to the public upon payment of a certain fee.

So far are any proceedings of the Court from being considered shut against the public, that by the 1 and 2 Vict., c. 118, s. 22, it is provided that the minute book of the Court of Session Teind Court, the record of edictal citations, the weekly calling list of causes, and the weekly printed roll of outer house and teind causes, shall be printed by the respective keepers thereof, and shall be sold to the public at the lowest rate which will repay the necessary expense of printing the same.

From these references it appears to me clear that the legislature has thought that the public at large ought to be able to have recourse to this Register, and of all the public the appellants have the highest interests in the knowledge of its contents. They are engaged in mercantile affairs, in which their security and success must greatly depend upon a knowledge of the pecuniary transactions and credit of others. That each of them might go or send to the office and search the Register is not disputed, and that they might communicate to each other what they had found there is equally certain. What they have done is only doing this by a common agent, and giving the information by means of printing. No doubt, if the matter be a libel, this is a publication of it, but the transaction disproves any malice, and shews a legitimate object for the act done.

[380] I think, therefore, that upon this view of the case alone the respondent has failed to establish any title to the interdict, which, though ad interim only, must be discharged, unless shown to rest upon some tenable ground. Now, it must be admitted that no case can be produced in which such an interdict as the present has been supported. The proceeding is in its nature, much in the discretion of the Court, and most so when the case is perfectly new. In the exercise of that discretion I think the Court of Session ought to have refused the interdict; and, therefore, I advise your Lordships to reverse this interlocutor.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly.—I am humbly to ask for judgment that the interdict be recalled, with costs below.

Mr. Anderson.—The costs of the consultation of the judges ought not to be included. Lord Cunningham referred the bill and answer to the whole of the judges, as considering it a difficult question, and all the judges are with us upon the competency, and eight out of twelve are so upon the merits.

The Lord Chancellor.—Unless there has been some course of practice in the Court of Session to the contrary, no doubt the party who succeeds here is entitled to his costs below.

Mr. Anderson.—It is quite discretionary.

The Lord Chancellor.—Then I am quite sure that the interlocutor ought to be reversed with costs below.

Interlocutor reversed; the cause to be remitted with directions, to the court below to recall the interdict, and to refuse the note of suspension and interdict; and the costs in the Court below directed to be paid to the appellants.

Contract—Acceptance by Post Letter—Damages.

A letter offering a contract does not bind the party to whom it is addressed to return an answer by the very next post after its delivery, or to lose the benefit of the contract; an answer, posted on the day of receiving the offer, is sufficient.

A contract is accepted by the posting of a letter declaring its acceptance.

A person putting into the post a letter declaring his acceptance of a contract offered, has done all that is necessary for him to do, and is not answerable for casualties occurring at the Post Office.

In an action for damages for breach of contract in the sale of goods, the measure of damages is not merely the amount of the difference between the contract price, and the price at which such goods could be bought at the moment when the contract was broken; but likewise a compensation for such profit as might have been made by the purchaser had the contract been duly performed.

This was an appeal against a decree of the Court of Session, made under the following circumstances:—Messrs. Dunlop and Co. were iron masters in Glasgow, and Messrs. Higgins and Co. were iron merchants in Liverpool. Messrs. Higgins had written to Messrs. Dunlop respecting the price of iron, and received the following answer:—"Glasgow, 22nd January, 1845. We shall be glad to supply you with 2000 tons, pigs, at 65 shillings per ton, net, delivered here." Messrs. Higgins wrote the following reply:—"Liverpool, 25th January, 1845. You [382] say 65s. net, for 2000 tons pigs. Does this mean for our usual four months bill? Please give us this information in course of post, as we have to decide with other parties on Wednesday next." On the 28th Messrs. Dunlop wrote,—"Our quotation meant 65s. net, and not a four months bill." This letter was received by Messrs. Higgins on the 30th of January, and on the same day, and by post, but not by the first post of that day, they dispatched an answer in these terms.—"We will take the 2000 tons pigs, you offer us. Your letter crossed ours of yesterday, but we shall be glad to have your answer respecting the additional 1000 tons. In your first letter you omitted to state any terms; hence the delay." This letter was dated "31st January." It was not delivered in Glasgow until two o'clock, p.m., on the 1st of February, and, on the same day, Messrs. Dunlop sent the following reply:—"Glasgow, 1st February, 1845. We have your letter of yesterday, but are sorry that we cannot now enter the 2000 tons pig iron, our offer of the 28th not having been accepted in course." Messrs. Higgins wrote on the 2d February to say that they had erroneously dated their letter on the 31st January, that it was really written and posted on the 30th, in proof of which they referred to the post mark. They did not, however, explain the delay which had taken place in its delivery. The iron was not furnished to them, and iron having risen very rapidly in the market, the question whether there had been a complete contract between these parties was brought before a court of law. Messrs. Higgins instituted a suit in the Court of Session for damages, as for breach of contract. The defence of Messrs. Dunlop was, that their letter of the 28th, offering the contract, not having been answered in due time, there had been no such acceptance as would convert that offer into a lawful and binding contract; that their letter having been delivered at Liverpool before eight o'clock in the morning of the 30th of January, Messrs. [383] Higgins ought, according to the usual practice of merchants, to have answered it by the first post, which left Liverpool at three o'clock p.m. on that day. A letter so dispatched would be due in Glasgow at two o'clock, p.m., on the 31st of January; another post left Liverpool for Glasgow every day at one o'clock, a.m., and letters to be dispatched by that post must be put into the office during the preceding evening, and if any letter had been sent by that post on the morning of the 31st, it must have been delivered in Glasgow in the regular course of post at eight o'clock in the morning of the 1st of February. As no communication from Messrs. Higgins arrived by either of these posts, Messrs. Dunlop contended that they were entitled to treat their offer as not accepted, and that they were not bound to wait until the third post delivered in Glasgow at two o'clock p.m., of Saturday the 1st of February (at which time Messrs. Higgins' letter did actually arrive), before they entered into other contracts, the taking of which would disable them from performing the contract they had offered to Messrs. Higgins.

The cause came before Lord Ivory, as Lord Ordinary, who directed an issue, which he settled in the following terms:—

"Whether, about the end of January, 1845, Messrs. Higgins purchased from Messrs. Dunlop 2000 tons of pig iron, at the price of 65s. per ton, and whether Messrs. Dunlop wrongfully failed to deliver the same, to the damage, loss, and injury of the pursuers? Damages laid at £6000." This issue was tried before the Lord Justice General, when it appeared that the letter of Messrs. Higgins, accepting the offer, was written on the 30th; that it was posted a short time after the closing of the bags for the dispatch at three o'clock, p.m., on that day, and consequently did not leave Liverpool till the dispatch at one o'clock in the morning of the 31st; that in consequence of [384] the slippery state of the roads, the bag then sent did not arrive at Warrington till after the departure of the down train that ought to have conveyed it, and that this circumstance occasioned it to be delayed beyond the ordinary hour of delivery. The Lord Justice General told the jury, "that he adopted the law as duly expounded in the case of Adams v. Lindsell (1 Barn. and Ald. 681), and which is as follows:—A., by a letter, offers to sell to B. certain specified goods, receiving an answer by return of post; the letter being misdirected, the answer notifying the acceptance of the offer arrived two days later than it ought to have done; on the day following that when it would have arrived, if the original letter had been properly directed, A. sold the goods to a third person," and in which it was held "that there was a contract binding the parties from the moment the offer was accepted, and that B. was entitled to recover against A. in an action for not completing his contract."

The counsel for Messrs. Dunlop tendered the following exceptions:—The first exception related to evidence, and alleged "that no evidence to shew that the letter, purporting to be dated on the 31st, was really written on the 30th of January, ought to have been admitted." The other exceptions related to the charge, and were as follow:

2. In so far as his Lordship directed the jury, in point of law, that if Messrs. Higgins posted their acceptance of the offer in due time, according to the usage of trade, they are not responsible for any casualties in the Post Office establishment.

3. In so far as his Lordship did not direct the jury, in point of law, that if a merchant makes an offer to a party at a distance, by post-letter, requiring to be answered within a certain time, and no answer arrives within such time as it should arrive, if the party had written and [385] posted his letter within the time allowed, the offerer is free, though the answer may have been actually written and posted in due time, if he is not proved to be aware of accidental circumstances preventing the due arrival of the answer.

4. In so far as his Lordship did not direct the jury, in point of law, that in the case above supposed, if an answer arrives, bearing a date beyond the time limited as above for making answer, and arrives by a mail, and is delivered at a time corresponding to such date, the offerer is entitled to consider himself free to deal with the goods as his own, either to sell or to hold, if he be not in the knowledge that the answer received was truly written of an earlier date, and delayed in its arrival by accident.

5. In so far as his Lordship did not direct the jury, in point of law, that in case of failure to deliver goods sold at a stipulated price, and immediately deliverable, the true measure of damage is the difference between the stipulated price and the market price, on or about the day the contract is broken, or at or about the time when the purchaser might have supplied himself.

These exceptions were afterwards argued before the judges of the First Division, who pronounced an interlocutor, disallowing the exceptions; and that interlocutor was the subject of the present appeal.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Anderson for the appellants.

The question raised in this case is one of considerable importance, and the decision of it in accordance with the judgment of the Court below, will have the effect of rendering the acceptance of contracts a matter of doubt and uncertainty. If the decision of the Judges of the Court of Session is right, a contract is complete when the acceptance of the offer to enter into it is posted, although such acceptance may not reach the person who made the offer till long after the time at which, by the usage of trade, he is entitled to expect it. Such a decision, if [386] unreversed, will leave the person making an offer under the necessity of waiting for an indefinite time in order to know whether his offer has been accepted. During all this time he will be restrained from freely dealing with his own property.

The exceptions here ought to have been sustained by the Court. The first of them relates to the evidence offered at the trial. That evidence was improperly admitted. The Court ought not to have received evidence to contradict a written document. When a letter is sent to a party, he has a right to assume that it is properly written, and is entitled to rely on its contents. He is at least entitled to do so as against the writer of the letter. The writer is not at liberty to shew those contents to be erroneous: at all events he is not at liberty to do so after the person receiving it has acted upon it, and thus to affect the rights of that party, and to give himself rights to which, if the letter had been correctly written, he would not have been entitled. To admit such evidence is to unsettle all the rules of business, and to prevent commercial men acting with that certainty and confidence which are necessary for the proper conduct of commercial affairs.

[The Lord Chancellor.—When a party sends a letter, actually sent on the 30th, but dated by mistake on the 31st, may he not shew that that date has been put in by mistake?]

It might be difficult to maintain the simple negative of that question, but in considering the admissibility of such evidence, all the circumstances of the case must be referred to. In the present case, for instance, as the letter was received on a day after that of its date, and when, therefore, the person receiving it had no reason to suspect that the date was erroneously given, his rights ought not to be affected by a subsequent explanation; and the evidence intended to afford that explanation ought not therefore to have been admitted.

[387] Then as to the second exception: if a letter sent is posted in due time, but is not received in due time, who is to bear the loss consequent upon its non-delivery? Certainly not the person to whom it is sent. The fact that it is sent by the Post Office makes no difference in the matter.* It is the same as if the letter was sent by a special messenger, in which case it is plain that the person sending the messenger would be responsible for any accident or delay. The appellants are not to be made responsible for the casualties of the Post Office, and surely they cannot be made so in a case in which the persons sending an answer to an offer which they had made, totally disregarded the ordinary usages of commercial houses as to the time of sending such answer.

The clear principle, set forth in the third objection, is that which ought to be adopted in all cases of this kind. Where an individual makes an offer by post, stipulating for, or, by the nature of the business, having the right to expect, an answer by return of post, the offer can only endure for a limited time, and the making of it is accompanied by an implied stipulation that the answer shall be sent by return of post. If that implied stipulation is not satisfied, the person making the offer is released from it. When a person seeks to acquire a right, he is bound to act with a degree of strictness, such as may not be required where he is only endeavouring to excuse himself from a liability. The question of reasonableness of notice, which may be admitted in cases of bills of exchange, cannot be introduced in a case where one party seeks to enforce on [388] another the acceptance of a contract. A bill of exchange is already a binding contract; no new right is acquired by notice; it is merely a necessary proceeding to enable the party giving it to enforce a right previously created.

* But see Kufh v. Weston, 3 Esp. 54. There a letter, containing a bill of exchange, drawn on a house at Genoa, was put into the London Post Office on the first Italian post day, but, from the disturbed state of Italy, did not arrive at Genoa till a month after the bill became due. Lord Kenyon held that sufficient notice had been given, for that the parties could not foresee that the post would be interrupted.

Then as to the exception. In the case of a contract, the acceptance of the offer creates the contract; the acceptance implies that both parties have knowledge of all the circumstances. On principle, it is plain that the acceptance should be immediate, and that if there is a delay in making that acceptance known, the offerer is free. In order to make the contract perfect, there ought to have been a co-existing assent. Countess of Dunmore v. Alexander (9 Shaw and Dunl. 190). There, a lady having written to another to engage a servant for her, and then sent a second letter to countermand the first, and the two letters having been delivered to the servant simultaneously, it was held that there was not a complete contract, and that the servant was not entitled to wages. The Court of King's Bench, in Head v. Diggon (3 Man. and Ryl. 97), acted upon the same principle. There, A. and B. being together, B. offered goods to A. at a certain price, and gave A. three days to make up his mind. The Court held that this was not an absolute bargain, and that within the three days B. had a right to retract.

Such are the principles which ought to govern this case. Then as to authority. It is curious enough that this exact question seems never to have arisen. That circumstance is some proof of the clearness of the principle which is applicable to such transactions, for had there been any question as to that principle—had it been doubtful whether delay might be excused, and whether, in spite of delay, a party guilty of it might not still insist on a contract being complete, cases must have arisen as to the degree of laxity permitted by the law in the acceptance of contracts. None such is to be found. The case of Adams v. [389] Lindsell (1 Barn. and Ald. 681), was the authority adopted by the Lord Justice General in his direction to the jury: but that case does not justify his ruling. [The Lord Chancellor.—If the letter of acceptance is sent in the usual way, is the sender still responsible for its due delivery?] If not, then both parties are free. One cannot be bound while the other is free. Each party takes an equal risk. But supposing delay is to be permitted, to what extent is it to be allowed? May the delay last one, two, or three days, or a week, or a fortnight, or a month? If any delay is to be permitted, the extent of it must be defined. Otherwise, all commercial matters will be in a state of perpetual uncertainty. But, in fact, no delay is allowed. Each party is bound to write by return of post, and each is liable to the consequences of his own letter arriving in time. Such appears to be the mercantile usage on the subject. When an offer is made by one merchant to send to another a particular commodity which varies in price, that offer is made subject to the obligation of its being answered by return of post. It is therefore an offer subject to a condition. It is conditional, in point both of time and manner of acceptance. As to time, the offer enures till it can be answered by return of post. If it is made on a condition, then it is clearly not binding till that condition shall be accepted. Here, too, the condition is a condition precedent. Nothing, therefore, can be substituted for it.

[The Lord Chancellor.—Where is this condition imposed?]

In mercantile usage, founded on law. The legal condition is to return an answer in a particular time. Mercantile usage has fixed that time as the return of post. No decision has ruled, as a point of legal principle, that, if an individual addressed fails in performing this condition, still that the person making the offer is bound. The [390] principle of the Scotch law, as stated in M'Douall's Institutes, is the other way. It is there said (Bk. 1, tit. 4, p. 98, fol. ed.), "conditional obligations, properly so termed, are presently binding and irrevocable, and only the effect is suspended, but sometimes the obligation is only to be contracted upon a condition which affects the very substance of it. Thus an offer has an implied condition of acceptance, whereby, alone the consent of the other party accedes and converts the offer into a contract; so that it is not binding, but ambulatory or revocable, till it is accepted, and therefore either revocation by the offerer, or death of either party before acceptance, voids it. The same rule holds in mutual contracts—the one party subscribing is not bound till the other subscribe likewise." The law of England is in conformity with the principle of the Scotch law.

As the revocation by either party before acceptance makes the offer void, the acceptance of the other side must be notified within a definite period of time; Stair's Institutes (Tit. 2, s. 8). This rule of notification is a condition precedent in the English as well as the Scotch law. This principle was acted on by the Court of King's Bench in the case of Davison v. Mure (3 Doug. 28). That was the case of a ship which was captured by the Americans while under convoy. The condition there was that the master should make the best defence, and without it appeared to a court-martial that he had done so, he was not to be allowed to recover. It was held that this condition was a condition precedent. The same doctrine was applied by that Court to the condition in a policy of insurance against fire, that the party should obtain a certificate from the rector of his parish, and a certain number of the inhabitants, before entitling himself to payment of his claim for loss; Worsley v. Wood (6 Term Rep. 710). If this is a condition precedent, then it [391] must be exactly performed, and nothing can be substituted for it. In this respect there is a difference between a condition precedent and a condition subsequent. The former must be performed before an estate can vest; while the performance of the latter, which is intended to defeat an existing estate, may be dispensed with. The act of God, the king's enemies, or the impossibility of performance, will furnish an excuse as to a condition subsequent. This is a settled principle of our law, and the case of Brodie v. Todd (17 Fac. Col. Dec. 20, May 1814) shows that the law of Scotland recognises the same rule. In that case, Arnot, a merchant of Leith, agreed to purchase from Todd and Co. of Hull, goods which were to be paid for by his acceptance. They put the goods on board a vessel at Hull; enclosed a bill of lading and a draft for the price, in a letter, advising Arnot of the shipment, and requesting him to return the draft accepted "in course." This letter was received by Arnot on the morning of the 24th of April, and if answered by him by return of post, the answer might have been received by Todd and Co. on the morning of the 26th. Arnot, however, did not answer it till that day, when he sent back the draft accepted. In the course of the 26th, Todd and Co. not having received the draft as expected, re-landed the goods. Arnot brought an action; and the question was, whether the request to return "in course," meant a return by the earliest post, and constituted a condition precedent. The Lords held that the words meant by return of post, and did constitute a condition precedent, and consequently that no action was maintainable by Arnot, since he had not complied with the condition on which the bargain was made. That case is completely decisive as to what is the doctrine of the Scotch Law, and must govern the decision here.

(The Lord Chancellor.—Is it not a question of fact, [392] whether the posting of the letter, in this case, on the 30th of January, was not a compliance with the duty of the party? Here is no distinct stipulation—it is all matter of inference. The question is, whether putting in the post is not a virtual acceptance, though by the accident of the post it does not arrive. In the case quoted, one whole day was allowed to intervene. But in this case, if putting the letter in the post is a compliance with the condition, there is an end of the question.)

That would be so, if it was a condition subsequent, for then something could be substituted for actual performance. But this is a condition precedent, and must be literally performed.

In considering this question, Lord Jeffrey observed,—“The party here only says, ‘If I do not hear by return of post.’ I have yet to learn that the return of post is like the return of the sun to the meridian at a particular time. I do not think that the use of such a phrase is equivalent to the stipulation of a particular time. I am inclined to hold that the return of post means the actual return of the post. And the species facti here was, the letter accepting the offer having been sent in due time to the Post Office, that it did come to hand at the hour at which, according to the usual time required for its transmission, it should have come. But the actual course of that post was not till the morning of the 1st February.” And the learned judge justifies his doctrine by referring to the case of the post coming by sea, where a general average time is fixed, but where return of post is not calculated by that average, but by the actual arrival of the post; and then he supposes a universal snow storm affecting the delivery by land, and argues that if matter of that general notoriety would affect the question, so does any other accident to the post although not so generally known. But surely this is giving an entirely new interpretation to mercantile contracts, and is making accidental circumstances or natural [393] delays, always counted upon, furnish ground for the construction of a delay occasioned by an accident which neither party anticipated. Besides, it is clear on the facts here, that had the letter been put into the early post of the 30th January, this accident would not have befallen it; so that the accidental delay in the Post Office was really the consequence of the delay in posting the letter, and was so far attributable to the respondents.

They cannot, therefore, claim any advantage, from their acceptance of the contract, which acceptance they did not notify, nor condemn the other parties for non-performance of a contract, the acceptance of which they did not know. It is the acceptance which completes the contract. The agreement is not suspended till the offerer has actually received notice of the acceptance, but only until he might have received notice, had that notice been forwarded at the earliest moment. This is the rule declared in Bell's Principles of the Law of Scotland (page 35, s. 78), and this rule must be applied to, and must govern the decision of the present case.

Then as to the question of damages: There was no proof that there had been one shilling of special damage arising from the non-performance of the contract by the appellants; the damages must therefore be calculated in the ordinary way. The fifth exception shows that there was a complete breach of the agreement on the 2nd of February, and the damages should have been calculated on the price of pig iron at that time.

(The Lord Chancellor.—But was not that simply a question for the jury, and not ground for a bill of exceptions?)

It was not. It was a question on which the jury should have received a direction as to the law; Watt v. Mitchell (1 Dunl., Bell, and M. 1157). The cases of Gainsford v. Carroll (2 Barn. and Cres. 624), and Shaw [394] v. Holland (4 Railway Cas., 150; 15 Mee. and Wels., 136), clearly show what is the law on this subject, namely, that in an action for the non-delivery of goods on a given day, pursuant to contract, the proper measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the market price on the day when the contract was broken, allowing the purchaser however a reasonable time to purchase the article for which he had contracted.

Mr. Stuart Wortley and Mr. Hugh Hill for the respondents, were not called on.

The Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, everything which learning or ingenuity can suggest on the part of the appellants, has undoubtedly been suggested on the part of the learned counsel who have just addressed the House; and if your Lordships concur in my view, that they have failed in making out their case, you will have the satisfaction of knowing that you have come to that conclusion after having had everything suggested to you that by possibility could be advanced in favour of this appeal.

The case certainly appears to me one which requires great ingenuity on the part of the appellants, because I do not think that, in the facts of the case, there is anything to warrant the appeal. The contest arises from an order sent from Liverpool to Glasgow, or rather a proposition sent from Glasgow to Liverpool, and accepted by the house at Liverpool. It is unnecessary to go earlier into the history of the case than the letter sent from Liverpool by Higgins, bearing date the 31st of January. A proposition had been made by the Glasgow house of Dunlop, Wilson, and Co., to sell 2000 tons of pig iron. The answer is of that date of the 31st of January:—"Gentlemen, we will take the 2000 tons, pigs, you offer us." Another part of the letter refers to other arrangements; but there is a dis-[395]-tinct and positive offer to take the 2000 tons of pigs. To that letter there is annexed a postscript in which they say, "We have accepted your offer unconditionally; but we hope you will accede to our request as to delivery and mode of payment by two months' bill."

That, my Lords, therefore, is an unconditional acceptance, by the letter dated the 31st of January, which was proved to have been put into the post office at Liverpool on the 30th; but it was not delivered, owing to the state of severe frost at that time, which delayed the mail from reaching Glasgow at the time at which, in the ordinary course, it would have arrived there. The letter having been put in on the 30th of January, it ought to have arrived at Glasgow on the following day, but it did not arrive till the 1st of February.

It appears that between the time of writing the offer and the 1st of February, the parties making the offer had changed their minds; and instead of being willing to sell 2000 tons of pig iron on the terms proposed, they were anxious to be relieved from that stipulation, and on that day, the 1st of February, they say, "We have yours of yesterday, but are sorry that we cannot enter the 2000 tons of pig iron, our offer of the 28th not having been accepted in course."

Under these circumstances, the parties wishing to buy, and by their letter accepting the offer, instituted proceedings in the Court of Session for damages sustained by the non-performance of the contract. And the first question raised by the first exception applies not to the summing up of the learned Judge, but to the admission of evidence by him; for connected with that admission of evidence is the first exception. I need hardly say but little on this point, but as it formed part of the proceedings on which the judgment must ultimately be pronounced, I will very shortly call your Lordships' attention to the proposition presented for your decision by that first exception.

My Lords, the exception states, "that the pursuers [396] having admitted that they were bound to answer the defenders' offer of the 28th, by letter written and posted on the 30th, and the only answer received by the defenders, being admitted to be dated on the 31st of January, and received in Glasgow by the mail, which in due course ought to bring the Liverpool letters of the 31st, but not Liverpool letters of the 30th, it is not competent in a question as to the right of the defenders to withdraw or fall from the offer, to prove that the letter bearing date the 31st of January, was written and dispatched from Liverpool on the 30th, and prevented by accident from reaching Glasgow in due course, especially as it is not alleged that the defenders were aware (previous to the 3rd of February) of any such accident having occurred."

The counsel for the pursuer answered, that nothing had been stated, but that the pursuers were bound instantly to answer the defenders' offer of the 28th of January, and that according to the practice of merchants, it was sufficient if that letter was answered on that day on which it was received.

The Lord Justice General did overrule the objection, and admitted the evidence.

The exception is that the learned Judge was wrong in permitting the pursuer to explain his mistake. The proposition is, that if a man is bound to answer a letter on a particular day, and by mistake puts a date in advance, he is to be bound by his error, whether it produces mischief to the other party or not. It is unnecessary to do more than state this proposition in order to induce you to assent to the view I take of the objection, and to come to the conclusion that the learned Judge was right in allowing the pursuer to go into evidence to show the mistake.

I pass on then to the fourth exception which is connected with this point, and which states that his Lordship did not direct the jury in point of law; that in the case above supposed, if an answer arrives, bearing a date beyond the time limited as above for making answer, and [397] arrives by a mail, and is delivered at a time corresponding to such date, the offerer is entitled to consider himself free to deal with the goods as his own, either to sell or to hold, if he was not in the knowledge that the answer received was duly written at an earlier date, and delayed in its arrival by accident; that is to say, that if a letter bears a date which, on the face of it, shows that it was written erroneously, nevertheless the party is bound by the date so written on the face of the letter, and you cannot go into the circumstances to explain how it happened that the letter did not arrive in time, but that you are bound to assume that it arrived on the day mentioned, and the party cannot give any evidence in explanation.

My Lords, that falls with the other exception, and the two together go for nothing. I merely state it for the purpose of asking your Lordships to concur in the opinion that I have formed—that the learned Judge was correct in the mode in which he left the question to the jury, and consequently that on that point the bill of exceptions cannot be supported.

The next exception to be considered is the second, and that raises a more important question, though not one attended with much difficulty. The exception is, that his Lordship did direct the jury in point of law, that if the pursuers posted their acceptance of the offer in due time, according to the usage of trade, they are not responsible for any casualties in the Post Office establishment.

Now, there may be some little ambiguity in the construction of that proposition. It proceeds on the assumption that, by the usage of trade, an answer ought to have been returned by the post, and that the 30th was the right day on which that answer ought to have been notified. Then comes the question, whether, under those circumstances, that being the usage of trade, the fact of the letter being delayed, not by the act of the party sending it, but by an accident connected with the post, the party so [398] putting the letter in on the right day is to lose the benefit which would have belonged to him if the letter had arrived in due course?

I cannot conceive, if that is the right construction of the direction of the learned Judge, how any doubt can exist on the point. If a party does all that he can do, that is all that is called for. If there is a usage of trade to accept such an offer, and to return an answer to such an offer, and to forward it by means of the post, and if the party accepting the offer puts his letter into the post on the correct day, has he not done every thing he was bound to do? How can he be responsible for that over which he has no control? It is not the same as if the date of the party's acceptance of the offer had been the subject of a special contract: as if the contract had been, "I make you this offer, but you must return me an answer on the 30th, and on the earliest post of that day." The usage of trade would require an answer on the day on which the offer was received, and Messrs. Higgins, therefore, did on the 30th, in proper time, return an answer by the right conveyance—the Post Office.

If that was not correct, and if you were to have reference now to any usage constituting the contract between the parties a specific contract, it is quite clear to me that the rule of law would necessarily be that which has been obtained by the usage of trade. It has been so decided in cases in England, and none has been cited from Scotland which controverts that proposition; but the cases in England put it beyond all doubt. It is not disputed—it is a very frequent occurrence, that a party having a bill of exchange, which he tenders for payment to the acceptor, and payment is refused, is bound to give the earliest notice to the drawer. That person may be resident many miles distant from him; if he puts a letter into the post at the right time, it has been held quite sufficient; he has done all that he is expected to do as far as he is concerned; he [399] has put the letter into the post, and whether that letter be delivered, or not, is a matter quite immaterial, because, for accidents happening at the Post Office he is not responsible.

My Lords, the case of Stocken v. Collen (7 Mee. and Wels. 515), is precisely a case of that nature, where the letter did not arrive in time. In that case Mr. Baron Parke says, "It was a question for the jury whether the letter was put into the Post Office in time for delivery on the 28th. The Post Office mark certainly raised a presumption to the contrary, but it was not conclusive. The jurors have believed the testimony of the witness who posted the letter, and the verdict was therefore right. If a party puts a notice of dishonor into the post, so that in due course of delivery it would arrive in time, he has done all that can be required of him, and it is no fault of his if delay occurs in the delivery." Mr. Baron Alderson says, "The party who sends the notice is not answerable for the blunder of the Post Office. I remember to have held so in a case on the Norfolk circuit, where a notice addressed to Norwich had been sent to Warwick. If the doctrine that the Post Office is only the agent for the delivery of the notice, was correct, no one could safely avail himself of that mode of transmission. The real question is whether the party has been guilty of laches."

There is also the other case which has been referred to, which declares the same doctrine, the case of Adams v. Lindsell (1 Barn. and Ald. 681). That is a case where the letter went, by the error of the party sending it, to the wrong place, but the party receiving it answered it, so far as he was concerned, in proper time. The party, however, who originally sent the offer not receiving the answer in proper time, thought he was discharged, and entered into a contract and sold the goods to somebody else. The question [400] was, whether the party making the offer had a right to withdraw after notice of acceptance. He sold the goods after the party had written the letter of acceptance, but before it arrived he said, "I withdraw my offer."

Therefore he said, "before I received your acceptance of my offer I had withdrawn it." And that raised the question when the acceptance took place, and what constituted the acceptance. It was argued, that "till the plaintiff's answer was actually received, there could be no binding contract between the parties, and that before then the defendants had retracted their offer by selling the wool to other persons." But the Court said, "If that was so, no contract could ever be completed by the post, for if the defendants were not bound by their offer when accepted by the plaintiffs till the answer was received, then the plaintiffs ought not to be bound till after they had received the notification that the defendants had received their answer and assented to it. And so it might go on ad infinitum. The defendants must be considered, in law, as making, during every instant of the time their letter was travelling, the same identical offer to the plaintiffs, and then the contract is completed by the acceptance of it by the latter."

Those two cases leave no doubt at all on the subject. Common sense tells us that transactions cannot go on without such a rule, and these cases seem to be the leading cases on the subject; and we have heard no authority cited which in the least degree affects the principle on which they proceed. The law of Scotland appears to be the same as the law of England, for Mr. Bell's Commentary lays down the same rule as existing in Scotland, and nothing has been stated to us in contradiction of his opinion.

Now whether I take that proposition as conclusive upon the objection, or whether I consider it as a question entirely open, whether the putting the letter into the post was, or not, in time to constitute a valid acceptance, it appears to me that the learned judge was right in the conclusion to which he came, that he was right in the mode in which he left the question to the jury, and that he was not bound to lay down the law in the manner alleged in the bill of exceptions.

The next exception is the third, which says, "In so far as his Lordship did not direct the jury in point of law, that if a merchant makes an offer to a party at a distance, by post letter, requiring to be answered within a certain time, and no answer arrives within such time as it should arrive, if the party had written and posted his letter within the time allowed, the offerer is free, though the answer may have actually been written and posted in due time, if he is not proved to be aware of accidental circumstances preventing the due arrival of the answer."

That, my Lords, raises first of all a proposition that does not arise in this case at all. It assumes a contract that requires an answer within a certain stipulated time, and it assumes (which is already disposed of by what I have said in answer to the second exception) that the putting a letter into the post is not a compliance with the requisition of the offer. But there is no special contract here, and therefore this exception cannot be maintained.

We have now come to the fourth exception, which I have already disposed of; and it therefore only remains to call your Lordships' attention to the fifth exception: that exception is, "in so far as his Lordship did not direct the jury in point of law, that in case of failure to deliver goods sold at a stipulated price and immediately deliverable, the true measure of damage is the difference between the stipulated price and the market price, on or about the day when the contract is broken, or at or about the time when the purchaser might have supplied himself."

That exception raises the proposition generally, and not, as the learned counsel have put it at the bar, on the absence of any proof of special damage. If that was the law, [402] as almost every case must differ as to the amount of damage, and the circumstances which gave rise to that damage, no certainty could ever exist as to the law. The proposition here is, that if a party proposed to deliver goods at a certain time, the damage against him by a party who suffers by his default, is to be measured by the market price at or about the time of the failure of the contract. They say you are to take it within the time of the failure, or at the time when the failure takes place and the contract is broken. It is asserted as the rule of law, that that is the measure of damage that the party is to receive.

Now, in the action and the proceedings here for damage, the party comes to receive compensation for the damage that he has sustained. If there is a rule established that in a certain case a certain measure of damage alone ought to be given, the jury ought not to be permitted to go out of that general rule; but if it is a question in the breasts of the jurors, I do not understand how you can tell them that whether they give £1000 or £10,000, they have not done what is proper. The learned counsel for the appellants felt the force of that difficulty. What does the party come into Court for? To obtain compensation for the other party not having performed his contract. What was there for the pursuers to shew here? That they had, by the contract between themselves and the defenders, become entitled to 2000 tons of pig iron, and that the defenders had subjected themselves to make compensation for the damage sustained by their breaking that contract. It is said that the judge should have told the jury that when the pursuers first heard that the defendants would not perform their contract, the pursuers might by their own activity have put themselves into a situation to sustain a smaller amount of loss than they have sustained here, and that they are not entitled to recover more than that smaller amount. But were the pursuers bound to do this? They had entitled themselves to 2000 tons of pig [403] iron; the jurors had to ascertain the damage that had arisen from the non-fulfilment of this contract, and, in my opinion, they have properly performed the duty that belonged to them in ascertaining the amount of that damage. Suppose, for instance, a party who has agreed to purchase 2000 tons of pig iron on a particular day, has himself entered into a contract with somebody else, conditioned for the supply of 2000 tons of pig iron to be delivered on that day, and that he, not being able to obtain those 2000 tons of pig iron on that particular day, loses the benefit arising from that contract. If pig iron had only risen a shilling a ton in the market, but the pursuers had lost £1000 upon a contract with a railway company, in my opinion they ought not only to recover the damage which would have arisen if they had gone into the market and bought the pig iron at that increased price, but also that profit which would have been received if the party had performed his contract. No other rule is reconcilable with justice, nor with the duty which the jury had to perform—that of deciding the amount of damage which the party has suffered by the breach of his contract. Most cases of contract vary from each other, and whatever general rules there may be as to awarding damages, they must be modified by the particular cases to which they come to be applied.

We have nothing to do here but to look to the law of Scotland, and by the case of Watt v. Mitchell (Cas. in Ct. of Session (1839), 1157), no doubt is left as to what is the rule of law in Scotland, namely, that the measure of damages is a question for the jury upon the circumstances of each particular case. Lord Medwin, in that case, goes very laboriously through all the early authorities in Scotland on the subject, and after having done so, draws this result from those early authorities; he says (id. 1163), "these are all the Scots cases referred to, and I certainly deduce from this that our Court rejects [404] the plea of the defenders, that the price at the time of the delivery, as the time when the breach of contract takes place, should be the measure of the damages due, where the defender has failed to implement." He, therefore, in terms, on the authority of the many cases he refers to, ultimately lays down, that that is not the law of Scotland; that the law of Scotland is to look into all the circumstances; that the law of Scotland will do what now a jury is called on to do there, or what a jury is called on to do here, to effectuate and sanction the reimbursing of the party who has sustained loss by the original contract, and that without reference to what the price of the article at the particular time will produce.

In what I have now said I have wished to confine myself to the law of Scotland; I have not had an opportunity of saying anything on the subject of the law of England. I am contemplating now what I find to be the established law of Scotland, and the question is, whether in the face of that law, and in defiance of all the authorities referred to in the law of Scotland, and in the absence of any authorities in the law of Scotland raising a contrary proposition, your Lordships are to adopt a principle which would go to destroy that rule, and to lay down another, which, according to my opinion, is less calculated to do justice to all parties than the one upon which the Court has proceeded. It is very desirable, no doubt, that the law between the two countries should be assimilated. But that is no ground why your Lordships should introduce into the law of Scotland a rule, which, if your Lordships were to introduce, would do great violence to the law of Scotland, and which you do not altogether approve of here. My Lords, I think that the learned judge most properly, at the trial, decided that he was not bound to put the questions in the way the defenders suggested, and that there was sufficient to lead him to the [406] conclusion at which he arrived, that the jurors were at liberty to look into all the circumstances for the purpose of measuring the damage.

I believe that in these remarks I have exhausted the whole of the objections made, and my advice to your Lordships is to affirm the judgment of the Court from which this is appealed.

It was ordered that the interlocutor complained of should be affirmed, with costs.

Will—Construction—Remoteness—Personal estate the primary fund for legacies.

A testator, after devising and bequeathing all his real and personal estates to trustees, on trust, from time to time to receive the rents and profits, and therewith to pay various legacies and annuities, directed that they should invest the surplus rents and profits at interest, and suffer the same to accumulate: and he declared that they should stand seised of his said trust estate and the accumulations, upon trust, that when and as soon as any son of either of his nephews, A. and B., should have attained the age of twenty-five years, a valuation of his said trust estate should be made, and that the same should then be divided into as many equal lots as there should be sons of his said nephews then living, and thenceforth separate accounts should be kept of the respective portions; and that each of his said nephews' sons, when and as they should re-[407-spectively arrive at the age of twenty-five years, should choose one of such portions as the share to be allotted to him and his children, and that thenceforth the said portion or share should be held by trustees, upon trust for the person so selecting the same for his life, and after his decease upon trust, as to one equal moiety, for his eldest son, and his heirs, executors, etc.; and as to the other moiety for the rest of his children, and their heirs, executors, etc., in equal proportions, and if but one child, both moieties for such child absolutely; but if any or either of his said nephews' sons should die under their respective ages of twenty-five years, or having attained that age should afterwards die without leaving issue, the share or shares intended for the person or persons so dying should go to the others and other of the said nephews' sons; and if all but one should die without leaving issue, the trustees should stand seised and possessed of the whole trust estate, in trust for such one surviving nephew's son for his life, and for his children and child as aforesaid; but if all the testator's said nephews' sons should depart this life without leaving issue, then upon trust for such person as should at that time be the testator's heir. At the time of the testator's death, A. and B. had several sons living, and B. had another son born afterwards:—

Held, upon the construction of the will, that the trusts for accumulation and division of the property comprised all the sons of the nephews, who should be living when the first of them should attain twenty-five; and as the son who should first attain that age might not be born until after the testator's death, the gifts were too remote, and therefore void: And the testator's real estates upon his death became vested in his heir.

Held secondly, that under a bequest of real and personal estates, upon trust to receive the rents and profits, and to pay legacies and annuities, and vest the surplus rents, etc., for other purposes, the personal estate is the primary fund liable to the payments, there being no direction to discharge it, or to sell the real estate, so as to constitute a mixed fund.

The suit, which gave rise to these appeals, was instituted by the respondent, William Boughton, as the heir-at-law [408] and customary heir of the Rev. William Boughton, claiming his real estates, on the ground that the trusts declared thereof by his will were void for remoteness.

The testator, by his will, dated the 1st of July, 1831, devised and bequeathed unto John James the elder, and John James the younger, their heirs, executors, etc., all his messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments real, and all other his personal estate and effects, upon the trusts and subject to the annuities and charges after in his will or any codicil thereto, bequeathed, "that is to say, upon trust from time to time to receive the rents, issues, interests, dividends, and profits thereof, and to retain thereout every year the sum of £10 as some remuneration for their trouble."

The testator, after declaring trusts for the investment and payment of the legacies in the will mentioned, and, in particular, a legacy of £1500 for the benefit of his niece, Elizabeth Prosser, and her husband, the Rev. John Prosser, and their children; and a legacy of £1500 for his niece, Susannah, wife of Henry K. Whithorn, for her separate use, proceeded to declare further trusts as follows:—

"And also upon further trust to pay to and for the use, education, and maintenance of each of the daughters of my two nephews, John Boughton and Joseph Boughton, whether born in my lifetime or afterwards, the yearly sum of £40 a-piece, until they shall respectively attain the age of twenty-five years, or be married with the consent of their respective parents or surviving parent, and on their respectively attaining that age or being previously married with such consent as aforesaid, in trust to pay each of them the sum of £1500 for their respective uses and benefit."

The testator then, after declaring trusts for the payment of six life annuities, amounting together to £1180, and for payment out of his personal estate of a legacy of £100 to [409] the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, £100 to the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts, and £100 to the treasurer of the Gloucester Infirmary, proceeded thus:—"And I do direct that my said trustees or the survivor, etc., do and shall, out of the rents and profits of my said trust estate and premises, pay the following sums for the education, maintenance, or benefit of each of the sons of my said nephews, John Boughton and Joseph Boughton; that is, the sum of £30 a-piece per annum, till they respectively attain the age of ten years; the sum of £50 a-piece per annum from that age, till they respectively attain the age of fifteen years; the sum of £80 a-piece per annum from that age, till they respectively attain the age of eighteen years; and from that age the sum of £150 a-piece per annum, till they respectively attain the age of twenty-five years; but in the event of the death of any or either of them under such respective ages, the provision intended for such one, etc., shall no longer be paid or payable."

"And I direct my said trustees to invest all and singular the surplus of the rents, issues, and profits of my said trust estate and premises (if any), after payment of the several annuities, legacies and charges hereinbefore expressed, at interest, in the name or names of my said trustees or trustee for the time being, in or upon Government security, and to suffer the same to accumulate: And I declare my will and mind to be, that they do and shall stand seised of my said trust estate, and the accumulations thereof, subject as aforesaid, upon the further following trusts (that is to say): upon trust, when and so soon as that any son of either of my said nephews, John Boughton and Joseph Boughton, shall have attained the age of twenty-five years, a valuation of my said trust estate, subject as aforesaid, shall be made " (by the trustees, or such persons as they should appoint) " and that the same shall be then divided into as many equal lots or shares as [410] there shall be sons of my said two nephews then living, and that thenceforth distinct and separate accounts shall be kept of the respective portions; and that each of my two nephews' sons, subject to the proviso hereinafter contained, when and as they shall respectively arrive at the age of twenty-five years, shall choose one of such portions as the share or property to be allotted for him and his children as hereinafter mentioned, and that thenceforth the said portion or share shall be held by my said trustees or trustee for the time being, or shall be by him or them, by good and effectual conveyances and assurances in the law, conveyed and transferred to two or more proper trustees " (to be nominated by the nephews' sons, respectively, and approved of by the trustees), " upon trust for the person so selecting the same for his life; and from and after his decease, upon trust, as to one equal moiety, for his eldest son and his heirs, executors, and administrators; and the other moiety for the rest of his children and their heirs, etc., in equal shares and proportions; and if but one, both moieties for such child, his or her heirs, executors, or administrators absolutely."

Then followed a declaration that if any of the nephews' sons should die under twenty-five, or after that age, without leaving issue, their shares should go to the survivors equally, in addition to their original shares, and subject to the same contingency and accruer; and if all the nephews' sons but one should die without leaving lawful issue, then the trustees should stand seised and possessed of the whole of the trust estate and premises, subject as aforesaid, in trust for such one surviving nephew's son for his life, and for his children or child as aforesaid; but if all the nephews' sons should die without leaving lawful issue, then upon trust for such person or persons as should at that time be the testator's heir at law, and to whom, in such event, he devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate and the accumulations thereof, absolutely.

[411] The testator, after directing that in the apportionment of the trust estates, the eldest son of his nephew John, and the eldest son of his nephew Joseph, who should respectively attain the age of twenty-five, should have the option of choosing certain estates (which he named) to be conveyed to them respectively, upon the trusts aforesaid, and in case these estates should exceed in value their equal portions, that the difference should be respectively charged on them, appointed the said James the elder, and James the younger, executors of his will.

The testator afterwards, on the same 1st of July, 1831, made a codicil, and thereby, —after reciting that by his will he had, after bequeathing certain legacies and annuities, directed his trustees to divide his real and personal estate, in the event in his will mentioned, into as many equal lots or shares as there should be sons of his two nephews then living, in order that each such son should, for his life, have the rents, issues, and profits of one lot or share of his real and personal estate,—he directed the trustees in his will named, or the trustees to whom the several and respective shares of his trust estate should be conveyed, or transferred, as in his will mentioned, to pay out of the interest or dividends of the personal estate, which should be payable to each of the sons of his nephews for the first year after they should severally attain the age of twenty-five years, the sum of £50 to the treasurer of the Gloucester Infirmary, for the benefit of that institution, such payment to be made on account of the sons of his nephews, and to the end that they might thereby be and become governors of the said institution.

The testator died, without issue, in August 1831, leaving his said two nephews, his sister, Ann Boughton, and three nieces, Mrs. Prosser, Mrs. Whithorn, and Mrs. Wintle, his only next of kin.

At the time of the testator's death, his nephew, John [412] Boughton, who was then his heir at law and customary heir, had two sons and three daughters, and no more, then living, namely, William Boughton, the respondent in the first appeal (born the 15th of September, 1814), John Boughton, another of the respondents (born the 17th of June, 1819), Ann Boughton, since deceased, and the respondent, Jane Boughton, and Elizabeth, since deceased. Their father died in January 1834, intestate, without having had any other child.

At the time of the testator's death, his second nephew, Joseph Boughton, had four sons and two daughters then living, namely, the three appellants (born respectively in September 1822, June 1824, and March 1831), and Joseph Boughton (born in 1827, and since deceased), and the respondents, Lucy, wife of Mr. Hough, and Mary Boughton. He, the said Joseph, had, after the testator's death, another son and two daughters, namely, the respondents, Edward Vaughan Boughton (born in June 1835), and Elizabeth and Ellen Boughton, and died intestate in September 1839.

On the death of the nephew, John Boughton, the respondent, William Boughton, became his heir at law and customary heir, and also the heir at law and customary heir of the testator. In October 1839, he filed his bill in Chancery against the other respondents (including the said trustees and executors) and the appellants, and also against Mrs. Prosser and Mrs. Wintle, since deceased, stating, among other things, as or to the effect hereinbefore stated, and praying a declaration that the trusts declared by the said will of the testator's real and personal estates, and the surplus rents, issues, and profits thereof, after paying the annuities, legacies, and charges by the will created, were void, as being too remote; and that such real estates (subject to a proper proportion of the said annuities, legacies, and charges, in case, and to [413] the extent only, of a deficiency of the personal estate to satisfy the same), and the investments and accumulations made from the surplus rents, issues, and profits thereof, since the death of John Boughton, the nephew, had become vested in the respondent, William Boughton, as the heir at law and customary heir of the testator; and that the investments and accumulations of such surplus rents and profits might be ascertained, and so much thereof as should be found to have been derived from the testator's real estates since the decease of his nephew, John Boughton, might be ordered to be paid to the said respondent; and that the real estates, subject to so much, if any, of the several subsisting annuities, legacies, etc., charged by the will on the testator's real and personal estates, as the personal estate might be insufficient to satisfy, might be conveyed to the respondent; and that it might be ascertained whether the testator's real estates or the rents and profits thereof had been applied in payment of the said several annuities, legacies, and charges in relief of the personal estate; and if it should so appear, then that the real estate might be recouped out of the personal estate of the testator, etc.

The several defendants to the bill put in their answers thereto, and the appellants (who are the surviving sons of the nephew, Joseph Boughton, born in the testator's lifetime), being infants, put in the usual answer, submitting their rights and interests to the care and protection of the Court.

There were afterwards bills of revivor and supplement by reason of the deaths of parties. The causes coming on to be heard in December 1841, before Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, a decree was made referring it to the Master to make the usual preliminary inquiries.

The Master made his report in July 1843, and thereby found the facts as to the next of kin, the heirship and [414] customary heirship of the testator, and the deaths of his two nephews and who were their sons and daughters to the effect before stated; and he found that, of the next of kin, all except Mrs. Whithorn were dead, and that the respondent, James, the younger, was the personal representative of Ann Boughton and of Mrs. Wintle; that the respondents, Alicia Joyce Boughton, Lucy Boughton, and John Prosser were the respective legal personal representatives of John Boughton, Joseph Boughton, and Mrs. Prosser.

The causes came on to be heard before Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, for further directions, and on the Master's report, on the 28th of February, 1844 (1 Collyer, p. 26), when his Honor made a decree by which it was declared; 1st, "That the trusts declared by the said will of and concerning the real, copyhold, customary, and personal estates, thereby devised and bequeathed, and the surplus rents, issues, and profits and accumulations thereof, subject to and after paying the several annuities, legacies, and charges by the will given or created, were void, as being too remote."

2dly. "That the trust or bequest in the will, to pay to each of the daughters of the testator's two nephews, John Boughton and Joseph Boughton, whether born in the testator's lifetime or afterwards, the sum of £1500, for their respective uses and benefit, on their respectively attaining the age of twenty-five years, or being previously married with such consent as therein mentioned was void, as being too remote, with respect only to such of the daughters of the testator's said nephews respectively as came into existence after his death."

3dly. "That the trust or bequest in the said will to pay to and for the use, education, and maintenance of each of the daughters of the testator's said two nephews, whether [415] born in the testator's lifetime or afterwards, the yearly sum of £40 a-piece, until they should respectively attain the age of twenty-five years or be married with the consent therein mentioned; and the trust or bequest to pay the various sums in the will mentioned for the education, maintenance, and benefit of each of the sons of his said nephews, at and from the different periods therein mentioned, are valid trusts or bequests, and ought to be carried into execution; and that this last trust or bequest extends to, and comprises sons of the nephews, whether born in the testator's lifetime or afterwards."

4thly. It was declared "that, according to the true construction of the said will, the annuities and legacies thereby given, except the legacies directed to be paid out of the personal estate, were thereby charged upon the testator's personal estate and his freehold, copyhold, and customary estates; and that such legacies and annuities, except the legacies directed to be paid out of the personal estate, and also except the legacies given for the benefit of the poor of the parishes of Blockley and of Westbury respectively, ought to be paid out of the said personal estate, and the freehold, copyhold, and customary estates, pari passu, according to their respective values."

And, 5thly, It was declared "that the real copyhold and customary estates, subject to a proper proportion of such of the annuities and legacies as, according to the last declaration, ought to be paid out of the testator's personal estate and his freehold, copyhold, and customary estates, pari passu (such proportion to be ascertained as after directed), and also so much of the surplus rents, issues, and profits as accrued from the real copyhold and customary estates since the death of the testator's nephew, John Boughton, and the investments and accumulations thereof (subject to the rateable contribution, which, according to the declaration aforesaid, ought to be paid thereout in respect of the said annuities and legacies, the amount of such contribu- [416]-tion to be ascertained as after directed), had descended to and become vested in the plaintiff (the respondent, William Boughton), as heir-at-law and customary heir of the testator. And it was declared that the surplus rents, issues, and profits of the freehold, copyhold, and customary estates, which accrued in the lifetime of John Boughton, the nephew (subject to such rateable contribution as aforesaid), and the investments and accumulations thereof, belonged to and formed part of his personal estate."

The decree proceeded to give various directions to the executors, and to direct further inquiries before the Master, consequential on the said declarations.

The first appeal was brought by the surviving sons of the testator's nephew, Joseph Boughton, born in the testator's lifetime, against so much of the decree as declared that the trusts declared by the will of the real and copyhold and personal estates, and the surplus rents, issues, and profits, and accumulations thereof, subject as in the decree mentioned, were void as being too remote, and against the directions consequential on such declarations; and against so much thereof as declared that the trust or bequest for the maintenance of the sons of the two nephews extended to sons, whether born in the testator's lifetime or afterwards; and as declared that the legacies and annuities ought to be paid out of the personal estate and the freehold, copyhold, and customary estates, pari passu (which is the subject of the second appeal); and as declared that the real copyhold and customary estates, and also so much of the surplus rents, etc., as were in the decree in that behalf mentioned, and the investments and accumulations of such rents and profits since the death of the nephew, John Boughton, subject as therein mentioned, had descended to and become vested in the respondent William Boughton, as heir-at-law and cus- [417]-tomary heir of the testator, and that the surplus rents, issues, etc., and the investments and accumulations thereof, before the death of the said John Boughton, formed part of his personal estate, etc.; and against the directions consequential on those declarations.

The second appeal was brought by William Boughton, the heir-at-law of the testator, and first respondent in the first appeal, against so much of the decree as declared that the testator's real and copyhold estates were subject to the payment of his legacies and annuities, pari passu, with the personal estate, and against the directions consequential thereon (as in the fourth declaration, ante, p. 415).

Mr. Hodgson and Mr. Bethell (Mr. Chandless was with them), for the appellants :

The declarations contained in the Vice Chancellor's decree, first, that the trusts of the real and personal estates, and of the surplus rents and profits, and the accumulations thereof, are void for remoteness ; and thirdly, that the bequests for the education and maintenance of the sons of the two nephews of the testator extended to sons, whether born in the testator's lifetime or afterwards, are erroneous. It is clear, upon the true construction of the will, that such sons only of the nephews as were in existence at the testator's death, would be entitled to the bequests " for the education, maintenance, and benefit of each of the sons of my said nephews." That construction, plainly arising from these words taken by themselves, is confirmed by the circumstance, that, in this bequest, the words of futurity contained in the bequest for the education and maintenance of the daughters of the nephews, " whether born in my lifetime or afterwards," are omitted. That distinction between the two bequests is decisive, that after-born sons were not contemplated, and are not comprised in this bequest, and therefore the Vice Chancellor's declaration on that point must be varied.

[418] If then, as it is confidently submitted, the trust for the education and maintenance of the sons of the nephews extend only to those sons who were born in the testator's lifetime, they must be the same sons, and not a different and larger class, to whom shares are given in the real and personal estates, and the accumulations of the rents and profits under the subsequent trust, " when and so soon as that any son " of either of the nephews should have attained the age of twenty-five years (vide supra, p. 409). No expression is found in the whole of this trust concerning the residue of the real and personal estates and the accumulations of them, nor in any other part of the will, affording any ground for the Vice Chancellor's declaration that the trust comprised sons born after the testator's death.

But independently of the reasons and inferences derived from the different manner, in which the several bequests for the maintenance and education of the sons and of the daughters of the nephews are expressed in this will, it is a general rule of construction that a gift to a class vests in such persons only as constitute the class at the time of the testator's death ; Dodson v. Hay (3 Bro. C. C. 404) ; Farmer v. Francis (2 Bing. 151 ; S. C., 2 Sim. and Stu. 505) ; Kevern v. Williams (5 Sim. 171). But here, it is said, there is no prior particular estate, and the words " each of the sons of my said nephews " are ambiguous expressions, and must be held to include all the sons, not only those whom the nephews had at the time of the will, but those also whom they might afterwards have, as in Bateman v. Roach (9 Mod. 104), and other cases of that class. The rule against perpetuities is not questioned here ; that is too well established to contend against it ; and its validity and stringency were enforced in recent decisions of this House ; Cadell v. Palmer (1 Clark and F. 372) ; Lord Dungan—[419]—non v. Smith (12 Clark and F. 546) ; but restriction, and not extension, of the rule is the practice in equity, while the courts of law try to escape from it altogether.

The trusts in this case depend on the vesting of the gifts ; the rule applicable to them is pointed out by Chief Justice Best in communicating to this House the opinions of the judges in Duffield v. Duffield (1 Dow and Clark, 310-11) ; " Until these estates become vested, they and the rents derived from them pass to the heir-at-law of the testator as estates not disposed of by the will. Whilst estates remain contingent, those in whom they are at a future time to be vested have no interest in them or the rents and profits. Such estates must descend to the heir, if they are not given to any person to hold until the events happen, on which they are to become vested," etc. " Testators that create contingent estates often forget to make any provisions for the preservation of them, and for the disposition of the rents and profits in the intermediate period between their deaths and the vesting of their estates. In such cases the estates descend to the heirs," etc. " If the parents attaining a certain age, be a condition precedent to the vesting the estates, the children, by the death of these parents before they are of that age, lose estates which were intended for them," etc. " In consideration of these circumstances, the judges, from the earliest times, were always inclined to decide that estates devised were vested ; and it is the established rule in construing devises that all estates are to be holden to be vested, except when there is a condition precedent to the vesting, so clearly expressed, that the courts cannot hold the estates to be vested without deciding in direct opposition to the tenor of the will; but if there be the least doubt, advantage is to be taken of the circumstances," etc. There is a class of cases in support of that doctrine, as Whitbread v. Lord St. John (10 Ves. 152).

[420] By holding in this case, that the gifts vested in the children that were living at the time the eldest of them attained twenty-five, the House will give effect to the testator's intention, and save his will. That construction is certainly opposed to the case of Leake v. Robinson (2 Meriv. 363), which has never been impeached, but is not inconsistent with Mogg v. Mogg (1 Meriv. 654), a prior decision by the same judge. There are numerous decisions on this point, besides Dodson v. Hay (3 Bro. C. C. 404) and Farmer v. Francis (2 Bingh. 151); Murray v. Addenbrook (4 Russ. 407), Bingley v. Broadhead (8 Ves. 415), and Bland v. Williams (3 Myl. and K. 411), are very strong cases in favor of vesting, and against failure for remoteness; but there is a still stronger case of Doe v. Ward (9 Adol. and E. 582), with which, as well as the last mentioned cases, the judgment, which is the subject of this appeal, is wholly irreconcilable. The rules of construction stated by Mr. Jarman, in his edition of Powell on Devises (2 vol. p. 8, et seq.), "words occurring more than once in a will shall be presumed to be used in the same sense, unless a contrary intention appear by the context, or unless the words be applied to a different subject," etc., are to be applied here; and the word "sons" in the trust of the accumulations, and division of them among sons attaining twenty-five, must be read the "said sons," or "such sons," as were before mentioned in the gift of the annuities, meaning the same and not a different class; Trickey v. Trickey (3 Myl. and K. 560); and Ellicombe v. Gompertz (3 Myl. and C. 127; see other cases there cited). These cases were not referred to in the argument before the Vice Chancellor. There, as here also, the argument was (1 Col. 39, 40) that the testator, in the gift of annuities and legacies to the daughters [421] of his nephews, expressly mentioned daughters "then born or afterwards to be born," but omitted the latter words in the gift of annuities for the education and maintenance of the sons: and from that omission the legitimate inference was, that in the subsequent trust for the accumulations and division of the property among the sons who should attain twenty-five, the testator meant the same sons for whom he had before provided the annuities, and who were the sons born at his death. That argument was supported by the citation from Jarman on Wills (vol. 2, p. 74, et seq.), and by the cases of Singleton v. Gilbert (1 Cox, 68) and Love v. L'Estrange (5 Bro. P. C. 59), to which is now added the late case of Kevern v. Williams (5 Sim. 171), between which and the present case there is no material distinction.

But whether the class of sons be confined to such only as were living at the death of the testator, or be considered as comprehending such only as might come into esse before the first should attain the age of twenty-five years, it is submitted that according to the true construction of the will, regard being had especially to the gift over to the testator's heir-at-law, each individual of either class would, immediately on the testator's death, or on his own birth, take an estate vested in interest, though postponed with respect to the period of enjoyment. And as the testator declared his intention that his heir-at-law should take an interest in his real and personal estates, only in the event of all his nephews' sons departing this life without leaving lawful issue them surviving, the sons of the nephews take, by implication, interests if not absolute, at least for life, in such real and personal estates, and the accumulations of them.

The appellants, assuming that so much of the Vice [422] Chancellor's decree as declared that the trusts of the will concerning the real and personal estates and the accumulations of them are void for remoteness, is erroneous and must be reversed, further, and in that event, complain of his Honor's declaration that the annuities and legacies ought to be paid out of the real and personal estates, pari passu, according to their respective values, and of the directions consequential on that declaration. But they submit that, unless the first declaration be reversed, the latter, against which the respondent William Boughton also has appealed, ought to be affirmed.

Mr. J. Parker and Mr. Lloyd, for W. Boughton, the heir-at-law, the principal respondent in the first appeal, and sole appellant in the second:

The Vice Chancellor stopped the argument against the validity of the trusts of the accumulations, observing that Hunter v. Judd (4 Simons, 455), decided the point; and though his Honor afterwards heard it argued, he repeated, in his judgment, that he entertained no doubt on it. There can be no difference of opinion on the general principles applicable to this case, that in gifts to a class, if the period of vesting exceeds twenty-one years from the death of one or more persons living at the death of the testator, the gifts are void for remoteness. It was the express intention of this testator, that his gifts to the grand-nephews should not come into their enjoyment until the first attained the age of twenty-five years. The grand-nephew first attaining that age might not be born at the testator's death. In Leake v. Robinson (2 Meriv. 382), in which the same question arose, Sir W. Grant says, "the first point to be determined is, who are included in the description of brothers and sisters of W. R. Robinson and of children of Mrs. Robinson; whether those only who were in being at [423] the time of the testator's death, or all who might come in esse, during the lives of the respective tenants for life. Upon that point I do not see how a question can possibly be raised." "Indeed, I believe wherever a testator gives to a parent for life, with remainder to his children, he does mean to include all the children such parent may at any time have." According to the plain grammatical interpretation of this testator's will, from which there is neither necessity nor reason to deviate, the trust or bequest declared of his real and personal estates, and the surplus rents and profits thereof, comprehends sons of his two nephews, whether born in his own lifetime or afterwards. There are numerous decisions establishing that construction, besides Hunter v. Judd. There is no conflict between that case and the previous decision of the Vice Chancellor in Titcomb v. Butler (3 Sim. 417).

Even if the testator's intention was clear in this case, that all his grand-nephews should take shares, that would have no weight with a court of construction, which, in applying the rules of construction, disclaims all regard to the intentions of testators. In Jee v. Lord Audley (1 Cox, 324), Lord Kenyon, after stating the settled principle, says he would not "strain it to serve an intention, at the expense of removing the landmarks of the law." The judgment in that case is in all respects applicable to this. The cases of Farmer v. Francis (2 Bing. 151), and Kevern v. Williams (5 Sim. 171), cited for the appellants, are of doubtful authority; no reasons are given for the judgment in the latter; and as to Dodson v. Hay (3 Bro. C. C. 404), Murray v. Addenbrook (4 Russ. 407), and Lord Dungannon v. Smith (12 Clark and F. 546), they are all distinguishable from this case. The judgment of Sir J. Leach, in Bland v. Williams (3 Myl. and K. 411), also cited for the appellants, is [424] not generally approved of, as it clashes with Lord Gifford's judgment in Bull v. Pritchard (1 Russ. 213), which has been upheld by Vice Chancellor Wigram upon a new bill (5 Hare, 567) with reasons applicable to this case. He says (id. p. 571) "there are two classes of cases, one, where the devise is to a party at a given age, and the property is given over if the devisee dies under that age; the other where the description of the devisee is such as to make the given age part of the description, etc. In the second class the court has held the devise contingent upon the ground that no one could claim who was not of the age required, that otherwise he did not answer the description." And his Honor adds, that a clause for maintenance and education cannot be allowed to have any effect upon the description of the devisee, the devisee not being "to the children at, in, when, or if, but in effect to such only as attain the age of twenty-three years." In Doe v. Ward (9 Adol. and E. 582), which is much relied on by the appellants' counsel, it was held that under a devise to S. for life, and after her death to such of her children as she had or might have, if a son or sons, at his or their age or ages of twenty-three, the rents to be applied in the mean time to their maintenance and education, the surviving children of S. took vested interests at her death, and the devise was not void for remoteness. That case is cited in Newman v. Newman (10 Simons, 51) and the Vice Chancellor said it fell within the terms of Boraston's Case (3 Co. Rep. 19), and the other cases of the same class, in which there was a gift to a party "at, when, or if" that party should attain a particular age; those words being held to be used to point out the time at which the devisee was to take in possession, whereas in the case then before him there was no gift except to such of the testator's grandchildren as should attain the age of twenty-four, and his Honour held that gift void [425] for remoteness. That case resembled this, but Doe v. Ward does not. In a later case, Watson v. Hayes (5 Myl. and C. 125), a testator devised his estate to trustees to sell the same, and vest the proceeds in real securities, to be disposed of as follows:—That his executors should pay £25 a-year for the maintenance of his daughter till she should attain twenty-one, or be married, “when” they were required to pay her £500. The legatee died before twenty-one or marriage, and the Lord Chancellor, reversing part of the Vice Chancellor’s decree, declaring the £500 to have vested in the legatee, said “there was no gift of the £500, except in the direction to pay that sum to the daughter when she shall attain twenty-one, or be married. ‘When,’ applied to the gift itself, and not to the time of payment, to which Sir W. Grant’s judgment in Hanson v. Graham (6 Ves. 235), is directly applicable; and there is also the absence of any terms of gift, except in the direction to pay at a time which never arrived, or in an event which never took place, to which Sir W. Grant’s observations in Leake v. Robinson (2 Meriv. 387) directly apply, and which doctrine has been frequently recognised as a settled rule.” His Lordship then discusses the effect of the gift of £25 a-year for maintenance on the vesting of the £500, and comes to the conclusion that the £25 a-year was not a gift of the interest of the legacy of £500, which would effect the vesting of the legacy according to the last mentioned cases, and the case of Vawdry v. Geddes (1 Russ. and M. 208), but a distinct gift for maintenance, which therefore had no effect upon the vesting of the gift of £500.

These cases govern the construction of the trusts of the will in the present case, where an accumulation of the surplus rents and profits of real and personal estate is directed to be made, until some son of the testator’s nephews [426] should attain the age of twenty-five years. Until that event, which might not happen until the expiration of the lives in being at the testator’s death and twenty-five years afterwards, nothing is given, either to be vested or enjoyed. The will contains no provisions, which can either expressly or by implication confer a vested interest in the residuary estates, or the accumulations of the surplus rents, until the time when the accumulations are directed to cease, and until then, the class of persons among whom the division is to be made is not ascertainable.

With reference to that passage of the will preceding the trust for the testator’s heir-at-law, (viz., “And if all such nephews’ sons but one should die, without respectively leaving lawful issue them surviving, then the trustees should stand seised and possessed of the whole of the trust estate, for such surviving nephew’s son, for his life and for his children; but if all the nephew’s sons should die without leaving lawful issue surviving, then upon trust for such person as should at that time be the testator’s heir at law,”) upon which the counsel for the appellants contended that they take life estates by implication; it is confidently submitted that such an interpretation is inconsistent with the general scope of the will, and is therefore inadmissible. The ultimate gift is not to the heir-at-law of the testator, but to the person who should be his heir at the time when the ultimate gift should take effect. The whole series and order of limitations, relating to the testator’s real and personal estate, and the surplus rents and profits, is postponed for a period which, in the event, might have transgressed the limits permitted by law.

The question in the second appeal is, whether the testator’s personal estate is not the fund primarily liable to the payment of the annuities and other legacies given by his will, to the exemption, in the first instance, of his real estate, which the decree adjudged to belong to this appeal-[427]-lanc. This question, like that in the first appeal, is a question of construction. The general rule in the administration of assets in courts of equity is that, in the absence of express declaration or necessary inference, the personal estate shall be first applied in satisfaction of those charges which are thrown by the will on both the real and personal estates; Harewood v. Child (Cas. temp. Talb. 204), Lord Inchiquin v. French (1 Cox, 1; 1 Amb. 33), Samuel v. Wake (1 Bro. C. C. 144; Dick. 597), Boote v. Blundell (19 Ves. 517; 1 Mer. 193), Rhodes v. Rudge (1 Sim. 79), Roberts v. Roberts (13 Sim. 336, 349). This rule is properly applicable to all cases in which a testator making his real and personal estate the fund out of which debts and legacies or annuities are to be paid, is silent as to the order in which they shall be applied; for, although the question to be determined in cases of this kind is a question of intention, yet the intention is to be collected, not merely from the language of the will, but from its language in connection with the general rule that determines the order of application of real and personal assets.

Several legacies given for charities by this will are directed to be paid out of the personal estate, because the testator knew the real estate could not be properly charged with them. No inference can be drawn from that direction to exempt the personalty from the other legacies. No directions being given as to the order in which the real and personal estates should be applied in discharging the other legacies, the fair legal inference is, that it was not the testator's intention to exclude the application of the general rule.

The rule was first departed from in Roberts v. Walker (1 Russ. and M. 752), by Sir J. Leach admitting, that "in order to throw upon the real estate any part of the burthen, to which the personal estate is primarily liable, the intention of the testator must be manifest," but deciding for apportionment of [428] the burthens, in that case, upon the real and personal estates, according to their respective values, on the grounds that the testator directed a conversion of the real estate, and created out of the proceeds thereof and the personalty a mixed and general fund charged with debts and legacies. On the same ground proceeded the decisions in the subsequent cases of Dunk v. Fenner (2 Russ and M. 557, 567), Foudrin v. Gowdey (3 Myl. and K. 383), Johnson v. Woods (2 Beav. 409), and the Attorney General v. Southgate (12 Sim. 77: see p. 83, and 12 Law Jour., N.S., 147).

Those decisions have not received general approbation (see 12 Sim. p. 82), and the grounds on which they proceeded do not exist in this case. There is here no direction to sell or mortgage the real estates to form with the personalty a mixed fund; on the contrary, there are manifest traces of intention to preserve them in specie, so that the personalty is the first available fund, and it is sufficient. In Robinson v. Taylor (1 Ves., jun., 44), where the real estate was directed by the will to be sold, and the money to arise therefrom and the personal estate were given to trustees to discharge debts and legacies, Lord Thurlow held, that as the personal estate alone was sufficient, and the residue was undisposed of, there was a resulting trust, as to the real estate, for the heir-at-law. Had that case and Digby v. Legard (3 P. Wms. 22 n.) been cited before Sir J. Leach, in Roberts v. Walker, he would not have decided as he did in that case, which is inconsistent with the prior authorities.

Mr. Turner (with whom was Mr. Wickens) and Mr. Anderdon, for several of the representatives of the testator's next of kin, respondents in both appeals; but having conflicting interests with the heir-at-law and among themselves, supported the decree on both the disputed points.

[429] As to the first appeal, the terms of the codicil, reciting that the testator had by his will directed his trustees "to divide his real and personal estate in the event therein mentioned into as many equal shares as there should be sons of his two nephews then living," etc., left no room to doubt that the trusts so referred to comprised all sons of the nephews, whether born before or after the testator's death; Hughes v. Hughes (3 Bro. C. C. 352, 434; and 14 Ves. 256). As it was possible that the first son who should attain the age of twenty-five years, the event on which the division of the property was to be made, might be an after-born son, the limitations were too remote, and therefore void. There was no previous estate given, and no gift at all to the grand-nephews, except in the direction to the trustees to divide and convey the shares among such of them, including those born after the testator's death, as should be living at the period named, so that there could be no vesting of interest before that period, notwithstanding the provision for maintenance and education; Batsford v. Kebbell (3 Ves., jun., 363), Watson v. Hayes (5 Myl. and Cr. 125).

As to the second appeal, the question is, whether, upon the construction of the will, it can be ascertained to have been the testator's intention to create, from the real and personal property, a common fund for payment of his legacies and annuities, which he charged upon both estates. He by one and the same clause gave his trustees his real and personal estate, subject to the annuities and legacies; he treated the rents, interest, and produce arising from the trust estate, as a mixed and common fund, out of which he, by various successive provisions, directed the annuities and legacies to be paid, except the charity legacies, which he directed to be paid out of the personal estate, thereby manifesting an intention that, with that exception, both estates should be [430] charged with them, without any direction, express or implied, to make one part of the common fund applicable before the other, and there being no gift of the legacies and annuities, distinct from the declaration, affixing the trust on the general body of the property. The necessary presumption therefore is, that he intended the two estates to be applied in payment of them, pari passu, and in proportions to be determined by their respective values; Bootle v. Blundell (19 Ves. 494, 517); Young v. Hassard (1 Dr. and W. 638); Roberts v. Walker (1 Russ. and M. 752); Attorney General v. Southgate (12 L. Jour., N. S., 147); Christian v. Foster (2 Phillips, 161); Sturge v. Dimsdale (6 Beav. 462).

Mr. J. Parker, for the heir-at-law, in reply to the arguments for the representatives of the next of kin of the testator, said they all agreed that he died intestate as to so much of the real and personal estate as was comprised in the trusts for the grand-nephews (which failed for remoteness), but they differed as to the application of the real estate to the payment of the legacies and annuities until the personal estate should be exhausted. The difficulty was caused by Sir J. Leach's decision in Roberts v. Walker, and other cases which followed it, including the Attorney General v. Southgate. These cases are supposed to have broken in upon the rule, which had always governed the administration of assets in courts of equity—first applying the personal estate in payment of debts and legacies, and resorting to the real estate only in case of deficiency of the personalty.

Mr. Bethell, in reply for the appellants in the first appeal, referred to the state of the families of the testator and of his nephews at the date of the will. He would not rely solely on the clause for maintenance and education of the nephews' sons in favor of the vesting of their shares of [481] the trust estate, however acceptable to his clients such a decision would be; but he contended that as those sons only who were born in the testator's lifetime were included in that clause, no other sons were comprehended in the direction for the division of the trust estate among "the sons" of the two nephews then living. These words must have reference to the same sons that were referred to in the preceding clause, and were equivalent to "the said" or "such sons;" Wild's Case (6 Co. Rep. 16); Ellicombe v. Gompertz (3 Myl. and Cr. 127). That is the rational construction of the two clauses, and is well illustrated by the rules of construction and cases stated in Mr. Jarman's Treatise on Wills (Vol. 2, p. 74, etc.); Butler v. Lowe (10 Sim. 317); and not varied or affected by the cases cited on the other side, of Morse v. Lord Ormonde (5 Madd. 99; and 1 Russ. 382); Tidcomb v. Butler (3 Sim. 417); Eyre v. Marsden (2 Keen, 564). The nature and effect of these cases are stated most clearly in the same Treatise of Mr. Jarman, and the conclusion which they, and especially Ellicombe v. Gompertz, support, is, that the words "any son" and "the sons then living of my said nephews," mean the sons before referred to in the clause providing annuities for maintenance and education. In Langston v. Langston (3 Clark and Fin. 194, see p. 317), this House applied the universal rule of giving effect to a deed or other instrument, and, with that view, supplied by implication, from the whole context of a will, a devise to the first son, who was not at all mentioned in it. The expressions, attributed to Lord Kenyon in the case of Jee v. Lord Audley (1 Cox, 325), must be taken to apply to the facts of that case, and do not support the argument for the respondent in this. Here the sons of the nephews are provided [432] with maintenance until they attain the age of twenty-five; until then the trustees were to invest the surplus rents and profits of both estates for accumulation upon trust, "when and so soon as any son" attain that age, there was to be a valuation and division. All that was required to preserve this clause and the whole will from being destroyed, was to read "any son," as "any such son," or "any of the said sons," before spoken of, which would be equivalent to any son living at the testator's death. The numerous cases, from Wild's Case down to Tidcomb v. Butler, and Ellicombe v. Gompertz, shew how readily the courts adopt liberal interpretations of instruments for the purpose of giving full effect to them. If the House agree in the decision of the Vice Chancellor, that the gifts of the annuities for maintenance of the sons, until they attain twenty-five, are good—and there is no appeal from that decision—the same construction ought to be put on the gifts of the accumulations of the surplus rents and interest. If a strict adherence to the words of the clause would defeat it, then the House ought not to adhere to them, but give them a liberal interpretation according to the established canons of construction (2 Jarm. Pow. on Dev. p. 7, etc.).

The Lord Chancellor (Feb. 28).—Two questions are raised by these appeals: first, whether the gift of the trust property in favor of the sons of the testator's nephews be void as too remote, as declared by the decree; and, secondly, whether the decree be correct in declaring that the testator's real and copyhold estates are subject to the payment of his debts, legacies, and annuities, equally with and in the same degree as his personal estate.

Upon the first point there is no doubt as to the rule of law; the question, if any, is as to the application of the [433] rule to the facts of this case. If the gift to the sons of the nephews include sons who might be born after the testator's death, then the gift to them is too remote. The rule is so clearly expounded by Sir William Grant in Leake v. Robinson (2 Meriv. 363), that it is sufficient to refer to that case. The only question, therefore, is as to the construction of the will. The gift to the sons of the testator's nephews is in the direction that the trustees shall hold the surplus of the trust property upon trust, "when and so soon as that any son of either of his nephews, John and Joseph Boughton, shall have attained the age of twenty-five years, a valuation should be made, and that the same should be divided into as many equal lots or shares as there should be sons of his two nephews then living; and that each of his nephews' sons, as they should respectively arrive at the age of twenty-five years, should choose one of such shares;" which was to be conveyed and transferred as directed by the will.

There cannot, I think, be any doubt as to the construction of this gift. The parties to take are sons of the two nephews, who should be living when the first of them should attain twenty-five; but such son, who should first attain twenty-five, might not be born until after the testator's death; and the case would therefore fall directly within the rule as expounded by Sir W. Grant in Leake v. Robinson.

But it was argued that this obvious construction of the gift is controlled by other parts of the will, and that upon the true construction of the whole together the shares were given to sons living at the testator's death, and vested in them before twenty-five, though the payment or enjoyment was intended to be postponed till that age.

[434] It cannot be said that any words can be so strong in a will as to preclude the qualification of them by other parts of it; but it would be very hazardous to permit terms, perfectly unambiguous in themselves, to be so qualified by anything short of a very clear exposition of the testator's meaning.

It was first said that the gift of annuities for the maintenance of the sons of the nephews was evidence of an intention to vest those shares. These annuities are given without reference to the amount of the shares; and in Leake v. Robinson Sir W. Grant says, that although the gift of the whole interest had always been held to furnish a strong presumption of an intention to vest the capital, such a presumption was not afforded by a direction for maintenance out of the interest. There is nothing in the gift over to the heir to affect the obvious meaning of the terms of the gift; for the testator is obviously and in terms speaking of the sons to whom he had before given the property, and the attempt to introduce the words "such" or "the said" into the description of the parties to take the surplus, upon the authority of Ellicombe v. Gompertz (3 Myl. and C. 127), is, I think, hopeless. In that case the event upon which the gift over was to take effect, was clearly within the legal period; but the time at which it was, according to the terms used, to come into operation might be too remote; and to reconcile these inconsistencies, I thought that the word "such" or "the said" might be understood. In this case there is no such inconsistency. I am therefore of opinion that there is nothing in the other parts of the will to affect the obvious meaning of the words used in the gift, and that the direction is to divide the property amongst such of the sons of the two nephews as may be living, when the first of such sons shall attain twenty-[435]-five; and that such gift is too remote and therefore void, and that therefore the decree in that respect is correct.

The next question is, whether the decree is right in declaring that the real estate ought to be applied in payment of the legacies and annuities, pari passu with the personal estate; that is, whether it ought, pro tanto, to be applied in exoneration of the personal estate, the primary fund for such payment.

Upon this subject the earlier cases are very numerous and very contradictory. It is, therefore, satisfactory to be relieved from the necessity of investigating them by looking for the rule, as properly extracted from these earlier authorities, and as correctly laid down by Lord Eldon in Boottle v. Blundell (19 Ves. 518). Lord Eldon there lays down the rule in these words:—"It is clear that it is not enough that the real estate is charged with, or devoted in any form to, the payment of the debts; but the construction must be one that aims at finding, not that the real estate is charged, but that the personal estate is discharged:" which in substance comes to this, that the onus probandi lies upon those who contend that the real estate is to be applied in exoneration of the personal estate, the rule of law prevailing unless a contrary course be directed by the will.

In this case the testator devises and bequeaths all his real and personal estate to the same persons whom he afterwards appoints executors; and, there being no direction to sell, he directs his trustees to hold such real and personal estate upon the trust, and for the ends, intents, and purposes, and subject to the several annuities and charges thereafter given; that is to say, upon trust to receive the rents, interest and profits thereof, and thereout to retain £10 per annum for their trouble, and upon [436] further trust to pay certain legacies and certain annuities, and to invest all and singular the surplus of the rents, issues, and profits of his said trust estate and premises, if any, after payment of the several annuities, legacies, and charges before expressed, and to stand possessed of the trust estate, and the accumulations thereof, for the sons of his nephews, and by good and effective conveyance and assurance in the law, to convey and assure for each of them such share as they should become entitled to. And he provided that, in the apportionment and division of his trust estates, the eldest son of his nephew John should have the option of choosing a particular estate to be conveyed for him, and, if the value should exceed his share, that the difference should be charged upon the same for the benefit of the others. And there was a similar provision for the eldest son of his nephew Joseph, with respect to another estate.

By a codicil he recites that he had, by his will, after bequeathing certain legacies and annuities, directed his trustees to divide his real and personal estate, so that each of the sons of his nephews should for his life have the rents, issues, or profits of one lot or share of his said real and personal estate.

There is no charge of debts upon the real estate. The question, therefore, applies only to legacies and annuities. It was argued that the testator must have intended that the £10 to the trustees, who were also executors, should be paid out of the joint income, because the trouble was incident to both descriptions of property. That is only a conjecture as to the motive, which, according to the rule laid down in Boottle v. Blundell, is inadmissible in the consideration of this subject. It was then contended that the direction for payment of the charity legacies out of the personal estate was indicative of the intention that all other legacies should be payable in part out of the real [437] estate. It is only indicative of a proper precaution that no part of such legacies should fail in the event of the contemplated necessity of calling in the real in aid of the personal estate. It is a provision therefore inapplicable to either construction, and inoperative for the purpose.

The result, therefore, is, that this is simply a case in which both the real and personal estates are vested in the same persons, who are directed to pay certain annuities, and to invest certain legacies, and to divide the surplus of the whole, without any direction to sell any part of the real estate. I cannot find in this disposition, or in any expression in the will, any direction or evidence of intention that the ordinary rule of administration should be departed from and the real estate applied in payment of the legacies and annuities, pari passu with the personalty. It is indeed incredible that he should have entertained any such intention. His intention was that the surplus of the whole property, real and personal, should go to the same persons. It is clear that he did not contemplate the sale of his real estate; but, on the contrary, the appropriating particular estates to the eldest sons of his nephews, proves that he contemplated their continuing in their integrity; and it appears that he intended, in any event, to charge the rents and income of his estates. Could he therefore have intended, there being a fund of the personalty, that the rents of his lands should be applied in preference to the unemployed personalty, both funds being destined for the same persons? The judgment of the Vice Chancellor (1 Collyer, 36) seems to have proceeded upon the ground that the testator had intended that the whole of his property should form one mass for the purpose of paying rateably the annuities and legacies; but I do not find anything in the will indicating such an intention, except the vesting of both descriptions of pro-[438]perty in the same persons, and directing them to pay the legacies and annuities, without saying how or out of what part of the funds in their hands such payment should be made.

I cannot infer from the vesting of both funds in the same persons, any intention that they should apply them otherwise than according to the course of law; and indeed, as is observed by Lord Eldon in Bootle v. Blundell, that circumstance has been much relied upon as negating an intention to exonerate the personal estate.

The Vice Chancellor does not refer to the case of Roberts v. Walker (1 Russ. and Myl. 752), and others which followed it, but they were relied upon in the argument; and the expression of "making one mass" seems to imply that his judgment was influenced by those cases. Those decisions, whether right or wrong, are not at present under consideration; for the ground upon which they all proceeded, and which was new, does not exist in the present case. In all those cases there was a direction to sell the real estate, and to make the payments out of the mixed fund so created, and the Master of the Rolls founded his judgment upon that fact in Roberts v. Walker.

The same occurred in Dunk v. Fenner (2 Russ. and Myl. 557), although the disposition was more complicated. Fourdrin v. Gowdey (3 Myl. and K. 383) was the same, and so was Johnson v. Woods (2 Beav. 409). In those cases the testators made one mass of property, by directing the sale of the realty and the application of the proceeds, together with the personalty. In the present case no alteration is made in the character of the funds; each part retains its original character, and, as I conceive, its original liabilities, in the absence of any direction to the contrary. The land, so far as the will has charged it, is [439] made chargeable with the legacies and annuities; but it has never been held that a mere charge of legacies upon the real estate is a discharge of the personalty. The question is, as Lord Eldon puts it in Bootle v. Blundell, not whether the real estate is charged, but whether the personal estate is discharged. The present case does not, in my opinion, fall within the principle of those decisions; leaving them therefore untouched by any observations I have made, or by the course I shall advise your Lordships to adopt, and looking to the rule as it existed before those decisions, and as expounded by Lord Eldon in Bootle v. Blundell, I am of opinion that there is nothing in this will to exonerate the personal estate from its ordinary legal liability to pay the legacies and annuities given by the will; and I advise your Lordships therefore to make the necessary alteration in the decree to effect that purpose.

Ordered, that the first appeal be dismissed, and that so much of the decree of February 1848 as was therein complained of be affirmed; and that the appellants pay to the respondents who appeared to the appeal the costs incurred by them.

And, as to the second appeal, it was declared and adjudged that the legacies and annuities given by the will, and not expressly directed to be paid out of the personal estate, are primarily chargeable on and payable out of such estate, and that the decree be in that respect varied by omitting all such parts thereof as are inconsistent with this declaration, or which exempt such personal estate from the ordinary legal liability of personal estate to pay such legacies and annuities; and also by omitting all such directions to the Master as are inconsistent with this declaration; and that, subject to such variations, the said decree be affirmed; and that the costs of the applicant W. Boughton, and of certain of the respondents, be paid out of the fund in the Court of Chancery; And that with these variations, the cause be remitted to the Court below. (See the Lords' Journals for 28th of February 1848).

Information—Jurisdiction—Pleading—Costs.

The Attorney General (after the passing of the statute 5 Vict., c. 5), filed an information in Chancery against the Mayor and Commonalty of London, alleging that the Crown was seised of the bed and soil of the river Thames; that the defendants were conservators thereof, and in breach of their duty as such conservators, had granted to divers persons (also made defendants) licences to embank parts of the river, and had received fines for such licences, and that such embankments were nuisances; and the information prayed that the rights of the parties might be ascertained, that the licences might be declared void, and that injunctions might issue to prevent the completion of the embankments. The defendants denied that the embankments were nuisances, and demurred to the rest of the bill for want of equity:

Held, affirming an order of the Master of the Rolls, that, upon these pleadings, the information was maintainable.

If a bill or information discloses, upon the facts stated in any part of it, ground for a decree in equity, it is maintainable. Per the Lord Chancellor, pp. 464—6—7.

A bill, which raises a legal question, may be so framed as not to be open to demurrer on that account, but, on the real nature of the question appearing at the hearing, the court of equity will refuse to interfere. Per the Lord Chancellor, p. 468.

As the Crown would not be liable to costs in this case, the judgment of the Court below was affirmed without costs.

Quære: Whether, when an act of Parliament transfers jurisdiction from one Court to another, or grants an extension of the jurisdiction of an existing Court, it is necessary, in order to make the act binding on the Crown, that the Crown should be named therein?

On the 15th day of February, 1844, Sir Frederick Pollock, as Attorney General, filed an information in the Court [441] of Chancery, which information was afterwards amended and stated as follows:—

That by the royal prerogative, the ground and soil of the coast and shores of the sea round this kingdom, and of every port, haven, and arm of the sea, creek, pool, and navigable river thereof into which the sea ebbs and flows, and also the shore lying between the high water mark and low water mark, at ordinary tides, belonged to her Majesty, who had also a right of empire or government over the navigable rivers of this kingdom; and that her Majesty was seised, in right of the Crown of England, of and in the port and haven of London, and of the river Thames, the same being an arm of the sea, into which the sea always flowed and reflowed; and that the said river was and had been an ancient royal and navigable river and king's highway for all persons, with their ships, vessels, boats, and crafts to pass, repass, and navigate at their free will and pleasure, and to moor their vessels in convenient parts of the river, not impeding the navigation thereof: that the Mayor or the Corporation of the City of London had for a long period, either by prescription or under some grant from the Crown, held and exercised the office of bailiff or conservator of the river Thames, the said office being exercised by the Mayor for the time being or his sufficient deputies, from time to time for ever, in, upon, or about the Thames, from a short distance above the bridge of Staines to the bridge of London, and thence to a certain place called Yantleet, towards the sea and in the port of London; and that the duty of the said mayor, bailiff, or conservator, was to see to the navigation of the river Thames, and to prevent the erection of obstructions and nuisances in the said river, and also to regulate the fishing thereof; but the said Mayor did not, in virtue of such office, take or acquire any estate or interest in the ground and soil of the bed or shores between high and low water mark of the said river.

[442] The information then alleged that the Mayor, Commonalty, and Citizens of the City of London, had of late claimed to be seized or entitled of or to the freehold of the ground, bed, and soil of the said river, and of the shores thereof between high and low water mark, within the same limits in which the Mayor exercised the office of bailiff or conservator, and had assumed to exercise such acts of ownership over the soil and shores of the river as were beyond the power and authority of the bailiff and conservator; and that in particular the said Mayor, Commonalty, and Citizens, had lately taken upon themselves to make grants to parties possessed of wharves or land on the banks of the river, or to such other persons as they thought fit, to licence them to embank the strand and soil of the said river, and build thereon between high and low water mark.

That in particular the said Mayor, Commonalty, and Citizens had granted such licence or authority to embank to William Cubitt, one of the defendants thereafter named, by an indenture made the third day of May, in the year of our Lord 1843, between the Mayor and Commonalty and Citizens of the City of London, of the one part, and William Cubitt, of Gray's Inn Road, in the county of Middlesex, builder, of the other part, by which in consideration of the sum of two pounds to the Mayor, Commonalty, and Citizens, paid by Cubitt, they granted unto Cubitt, for the benefit of himself and all other the persons (if any) who then were and who might for the time being be entitled to or interested in the wharf and premises thereafter described as adjoining the river Thames, and in the occupation of Cubitt, full and free permission, licence, and authority to embank so much of the strand or soil of the said river as lay between the high and low water mark thereof, situate, etc., on the north side of the river, opposite the Isle of Dogs; and it was provided that this licence was granted upon the express condition that the embankment should be completed within the [443] space of eighteen calendar months from the date thereof, under the superintendence and to the satisfaction of the said Mayor, Commonalty, and Citizens, or of an officer to be appointed by them for that purpose; and that the front or river wall, and the side walls of the said embankment, should at all times be kept in good and substantial repair.

The information, after stating covenants by Cubitt in accordance with these provisions, and that he was preparing to execute the embankment according to the terms of the indenture, further stated that the said Mayor and Citizens had also granted to other persons therein named a licence to embank part of the shore of the river Thames, between high and low water mark, in front of a wharf called Durrand's wharf, in the parish of Rotherhithe, in the county of Surrey. It then set out the licence, and alleged that the parties to whom this licence had been granted had already begun to erect the embankment upon the soil of the river, between high and low water mark, and were proceeding to complete the embankment, in order to make use of the land so taken from the shore or bed of the river as a wharf; that this embankment would be detrimental to the river Thames, and a nuisance and injury to her Majesty's subjects navigating the same, inasmuch as it would not only narrow the water-way, but would also produce an eddy at each end of such embankment, and an increased deposit of mud in the parts adjacent, and would produce shoals in some parts of the river below the embankment, by excluding a quantity of tidal water essential to the scour or preservation of the depth of the said river.

The information set forth other grants (in consideration of fines) made by the Mayor and Corporation, particularly to one J. Park, at Battersea, and repeated the allegations of injury to the bed of the river and to its navigation by the making of the embankments in pursuance of such grants. It traversed the right of the grantees to make such [444] embankments, and denied that any charter granted by the Crown had given the Mayor and Citizens any title to the soil or bed of the river, or had recognised any immemorial right as vested in them. It then specially referred to a charter of the 23 Hen. VI., and denied that it gave to, or recognised such a right as existing in, the Mayor and Citizens, and alleged that no evidence of the exercise of any such right was sufficient to establish such right by immemorial usage. The information traversed the right of the Mayor and Citizens to make or to authorize the making of any embankments on the river, and charged that it was the duty of the Mayor to prevent the same, that even if the bed and soil of the river were vested in the Mayor and Citizens, still the embankments at Battersea and Rotherhithe were common nuisances, and as such ought to be abated; and that the Mayor and Citizens, or their town clerk (the defendant Merewether) had documents in their possession relating to these matters, and ought to make discovery thereof. The information prayed that the rights of her Majesty and of the Mayor, etc., might be declared, that issues might be granted if necessary, that if the rights claimed by the Mayor and Citizens should be found to be null and void, an injunction might be granted, that the embankments already executed might be abated, that the Mayor, etc., might be ordered to be accountable, and that the right of the Crown to the bed and soil of the river might be for ever established.

The Mayor, and Citizens, and the other persons, defendants in the information, appeared, and to all the parts of the information, except those which charged that the embankments were nuisances, and were injurious to the bed and soil of the river, and to the navigation thereof, demurred, for want of equity; and as to these excepted parts, they answered, denying that the embankments had occasioned, or would occasion, any injury to the river, or to its naviga-[445]-tion; and they said, that in the case of the Rotherhithe embankment, the plan had been laid down by Mr. Walker, the civil engineer (who was perfectly acquainted with the river), together with the harbour masters and Captain Bullock, hydrographer to the Admiralty, and that such embankment had there improved the navigation of the river, by enlarging the tidal scour thereof. The defendants then denied that the embankment at Battersea would be injurious; they denied that either of the embankments was a nuisance; and denied that the mayor and citizens then claimed, or ever had claimed, to create a nuisance to or upon the said navigable river, or to the injury of the Queen's subjects navigating the same.

The case was argued before the Master of the Rolls, who, by an order of the 4th June, 1845, overruled the demurrer (8 Beav. 270; 14 Law Jour., Ch. 305). The appeal was against this order.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Serjeant Channell (Mr. Randell and Mr. James Wilde were with them), for the appellants:

The Master of the Rolls laid down the broad proposition, that all the jurisdiction in these matters was, by the 5 Vict., c. 5, transferred to the Court of Chancery. Such a proposition cannot be supported. Since this decision has taken place, two cases have occurred in the Exchequer, in which that Court has held that it still retains its equitable jurisdiction in matters of revenue (the cases referred to are The Attorney General v. Hallett, 15 Law J. (Ex.) 155, and 15 Mee. and W. 97; and the Attorney General v. Halling, 16 Law J. (Ex.) 304, and 15 Mee. and W. 687). In the latter of those cases the question of jurisdiction was directly in issue, and the judgment, which was very elaborately considered, is therefore of very high authority. If they are right, the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in this case cannot be sustained. Those decisions and the present are inconsistent with [446] each other. It is submitted that they are right, and that the Master of the Rolls was wrong, and consequently that his order in this case must be reversed. That is the first objection. The next is as to the form of the information, which could not be maintained in any court of equity whatever.

The shores of the river appear to have been granted to the Corporation, yet the Attorney General says that that grant is without any effect. Usage is, however, in favor of the Corporation, but usage is treated as of no value; and it is charged that the ground and soil of the river are in the Crown, and that the Corporation has no power to permit building of any sort on the shores of the river, but that if there are embankments in any way obstructing the navigation of the river, it is the duty of the Corporation to prevent them. And this restriction as to the powers of the Corporation is extended to the soil between the high and low water marks.

Such being alleged to be the extent of the legal rights of the Corporation, the information then proceeds to charge that all the embankments authorized by the Corporation are in fact nuisances, for that they do obstruct the navigation and deprive the Queen's subjects of their rights thereon. But it is plain that nothing of that sort can affect the question of right to the soil, for if the embankments actually made, or in progress, are in fact nuisances (which is however positively denied), still the right to authorise embankments, which are not nuisances, cannot be thereby affected. The Attorney General may have a good right to come and demand that nuisances should be removed, but a judgment in his favor, on that point, will not determine the question as to the title to the soil or bed of the river, nor shew that the Corporation cannot grant to any one whatever a licence to embank any part of the river. The case here set up on the part of the Crown is not that of a purpresture, but of a nuisance. There is a great distinction [447] between purprestures, which are private encroachments on the property of the Crown, and nuisances, which are matters of public concern. The former may be proceeded against in equity, the latter must be proceeded against at law. The charge here is of a nuisance, and not of a purpresture, and the demurrer is therefore a general demurrer, on the ground that this is not a case in which the Crown can ask a court of equity for a discovery and general relief.

The real question in this case is, whether the point in dispute between the Crown and the Corporation shall be determined in a legal and constitutional manner, or by what is in effect an inquisitorial process. This question depends upon the construction to be given to the statute 5 Vic. c. 5. To decide what is the proper construction of that statute, it is necessary to consider what the Court of Exchequer was before the passing of that act. The Exchequer was a court of revenue, and, as such, exercised a jurisdiction in equity as well as at law; the Attorney General v. Halling (15 Mee. and W. 694. By Lord Chief Baron Pollock, in judgment). It cannot be denied that this court of revenue is a court of equity for the purposes of the revenue. By the 5 Vict., c. 5, the equity jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer, as between subject and subject, was transferred to the Court of Chancery; but its jurisdiction as a court of revenue, and a court of equity incident to revenue, is not transferred. So far as the Crown is concerned, the powers of the Court of Exchequer are untouched by the statute. They would still be untouched to that extent, even if they were in all other respects taken away; for the statute does not name the Crown; and it is a universal rule of construction, that the Crown is not bound nor affected by the provisions of an act of Parliament, unless named therein. The two cases above cited (in [448] the latter of which especially it is to be regretted that the arguments are not given), shew, that for the purposes of the public service, it is desirable that the law officers of the Crown should preserve these rights of the Crown in the Court of Exchequer.

[The Lord Chancellor.—The statute effects a transfer of the jurisdiction from one court to another, or the extension of the jurisdiction of one court. In such a case the argument as to the naming of the Crown in an act of Parliament does not seem to apply.]

The first clause of the statute manifests the intention of the legislature to exempt some part of the revenue jurisdiction of the Crown from being affected by its provisions. The Barons of the Exchequer agree in saying that this exempted jurisdiction does not comprehend the ordinary equity jurisdiction between subject and subject, which is equivalent to saying that the other part of the equity jurisdiction is untouched by the statute. What are the exemptions in the statute? The first is of all the powers possessed by the Court, such as are exercised by the courts of law; the second is of all such as are exercised by it as a court of revenue, and not heretofore exercised by it as a court of equity. The equity jurisdiction in matters where the Crown is concerned, is within the second exception; for that jurisdiction was one of a peculiar nature, specially appropriated to itself, and did not belong to it in its ordinary capacity as a court of equity. Though some of the officers of the Court are taken away, the peculiar officers who belong to it as a court of revenue remain.

This case raises this important constitutional question, whether it is competent to the Crown to bring into a court of equity a case for adjudication, which is a pure case of legal title, and to have that case argued on and adjudged, with this peculiar advantage ensured to the Crown, that it shall have the power to compel discovery and a disclosure of the title on the part of the defendants [449] who are sued. The course now taken is also subject to this objection, that it deprives the private party of the benefit intended by the 21 Jac. I., c. 14, to be conferred on all the subjects of the realm, namely, to plead the general issue, and thus throw on the party claiming the right of possession the necessity of recovering by the strength of his own title.

[The Lord Chancellor.—The consequence here would have been the same had this been an information in the Equity Exchequer.]

But it is contended on that very ground that an information there would not have been a proper mode of proceeding.

[The Lord Chancellor.—I do not understand what the Lord Chief Baron means, when he says (15 Mee. and W. 696), "The first exception is of all powers possessed by or incident to it as a court of common law. It has all the powers, legal and equitable, which, by statute or common law, belong to the other courts of common law." What are the equitable powers belonging to the courts of common law?]

Perhaps they are the powers under the statutes of interpleader. The subject is very involved, but the probable meaning of the Lord Chief Baron is, that there are two kinds of equitable jurisdiction attributable to the Court of Exchequer: its original equitable jurisdiction, as between the Crown and the subject, and its usurped equitable jurisdiction, as between subject and subject. The statute intended to transfer to the Court of Chancery the usurped jurisdiction.

[The Lord Chancellor.—Can you distinguish between them?]

No, for the jurisdiction is in all cases said to be exercised jure coronae, in virtue of a party being a debtor to the Crown.

[450] It is a recognized principle, that where legal rights are involved, a party has no occasion to go into a court of equity, if the courts of common law can give him full relief. The Attorney General v. St. Aubyn (1 Wightw. 180; see also Walsingham v. The Attorney General, Hard. 49-51), where Mr. Baron Wood says, that "if the Crown can come here, and by filing a bill, compel a person to disclose his title, there will be an end to the Statute of James, and the subject will be deprived of his trial by jury.

[Lord Campbell.—Do you mean to say that this information could not have been filed in Chancery before the statute?]

Certainly—For it does not contain any matter of Equity.

[The Lord Chancellor.—But do these questions of jurisdiction properly arise here? There is not, on the face of these proceedings, any adverse claim of the soil. The information states that the present appellants are conservators of the river under the Crown, but that they have no right to the soil thereof. That is admitted on the face of the pleadings, and the appellants are charged with having created a nuisance, by their violation of their powers and duties as conservators of the river.]

The information itself raises the question of title, for it expressly negatives that any charters or letters patent, granted by the Crown, "contain any grant of the soil, or bed of the river Thames, or of the shores thereof, between high and low water mark, to the mayor, commonalty and citizens of London." And then this question being thus raised in the information, the demurrer is addressed to the jurisdiction; because, admitting that to be a question raised, the demurrer alleges that the Court of Chancery is not the proper Court to try it. As to the question of nuisance, the appellants are not the parties to try that—

[451] [The Lord Chancellor.—Yes, they are; for the embankments alleged to be nuisances, are alleged to have been made under your license.]

That is not quite so. The appellants have granted licenses to embank; but it is not alleged that the embankments are made as authorised in the licenses, and a license to embank may be rightly granted, and yet the mode adopted for effecting the embankment may be a nuisance.

[The Lord Chancellor.—There is a part of the information which alleges that the appellants have of late assumed to exercise acts of ownership over the soil and shores of the river, such as are beyond the powers of bailiffs and conservators. That part is not demurred to. The Crown puts the matter in the alternative, and claims to be the owner of the soil; but also alleges that, if not owner, still the appellants are but bailiffs, and that they have exceeded their powers as such. This resembles a bill, where it is charged that a man cuts down timber, he not being the owner of the field, but merely tenant for life. No demurrer would lie to such a bill.]

It would not; but the allegation that the mayor and commonalty have taken on themselves to grant licenses, does not say that they have done so as conservators, and therefore it must be taken that they have done so as owners. The question of title to the freehold, is, therefore, directly raised. Suppose a bill by a remainder-man, alleging that the tenant for life sets up a right as tenant in fee, and that he has granted leases as such, and praying the Court of Chancery to determine to whom the fee belongs; it is clear that no such bill could be sustained.—

[The Lord Chancellor.—But that is not the form adopted here.]

Yet all the prayer for the interposition of the Court is founded upon such a hypothesis. The purpose of the prayer of a bill is to explain and amend what might be ambiguous in the bill itself; and here, after an allegation in the information that the Crown has the right and title [452] to the bed and soil of the river, and that the mayor and commonalty have set up a claim thereto, the prayer is, “that the right to the freehold and inheritance of and in the ground and soil of the bed of the river, and of the shores thereof between high and low water-mark, may be deemed and established to be in her Majesty, to the end that multiplicity of suits may be avoided, and that the validity of such grants from the mayor and commonalty may be determined.” The Court is here not asked to annul these grants, except after an examination of title. In the Attorney General v. Johnson and Earl Grosvenor (2 John Wils. Rep. 87); upon an information of this kind, Lord Eldon held, that it was quite immaterial to whom the soil of the river belonged, it not being competent, either to the Crown or a subject, to use it for any purposes amounting to a nuisance. But it is in explaining that doctrine that his Lordship’s judgment becomes most material. He says (id. 101), “I consider it to be quite immaterial whether the title to the soil between high and low water-mark is in the Crown, or in the city of London, or whether the city of London has the right of conservancy, operating as a check upon the improper use of the soil, the title being in the Crown, or whether Mr. Johnson or Earl Grosvenor has any derivative title by grant from any one having the power to grant.” The case itself is not applicable as an authority here, for there the only prayer was for an injunction to abate the nuisance, and nothing was said as to declaring the right to the soil and bed of the river; but the observations in it are material.

[The Lord Chancellor.—This is the same as a bill by the remainder man, against the person whom the bill states to be only tenant for life, but who pretends to be the owner of the fee, and in such character to make deeds; and the bill prays that he may be declared not to be so, and that his deeds may be set aside. Can it be said, that if the whole statement of fact was admitted by [453] a general demurrer for want of equity, the admission would not shew the fee to be as alleged in the bill?]

Whatever may be the allegations in a bill, if they are introduced for the purpose of calling on the Court to try and to determine a claim which the court has no jurisdiction to try or to determine, they will not maintain the bill.

[The Lord Chancellor.—There is another view of the question. An information for a nuisance in a harbour may be maintained, though the soil is alleged to be in the Crown.]

There is no doubt of that: and if the Crown had thought fit to allege this to be a purpresture, this information might have been maintained; the Attorney General v. Burbidge (10 Price, 350). But that has not been done here. The title to the soil is the question raised.

But then it is said that this bill may be maintained, according to its prayer, to prevent multiplicity of suits. There is no ground for maintaining it. You cannot prevent an action of ejectment against each of one hundred tenants by filing a bill against one or other of them, asking for a determination of their rights in that suit. If you will take the whole of the information, and observe to what it is addressed, the issue it raises, the mode of trial it proposes, and the manner of making the subsequent relief depend on this subsequent enquiry, it is impossible to avoid seeing that the object of the information is the trial of the right of ownership over the soil and bed of the river. That question cannot be tried in a court of equity. The proper remedy here would have been by a proceeding as for an intrusion.

[Lord Campbell.—That is only where a party is in possession of that which the Crown claims.]

Intrusion is in the nature of an ejectment by the [454] Crown, and would bring this question of soil and freehold directly before the court. The information here raises no matter of equity, but purely a question of law.

[Lord Campbell.—Do you lay it down as a general rule, that where the Crown can proceed by information for an intrusion, it must do so, and cannot be allowed to proceed in any other way?]

Not quite so; but that where boundaries are in question, as they are here, the proceeding by way of intrusion is the proper remedy. And such is plainly the opinion of Mr. Baron Wood, in the Attorney General v. Sir John St. Aubyn (Wightw. 167). If the subject-matter of the information is sufficient, according to ordinary rules, to found the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, then that court cannot want a transferred jurisdiction; but if that subject-matter is not of that kind, and such the Master of the Rolls seems to consider it, then the jurisdiction properly belongs to the Court of Exchequer, and has not been transferred to the Court of Chancery. But it is further submitted that the matter is one which relates entirely to legal title, and therefore cannot be made the subject of an equitable suit in any court.

The Attorney General and Mr. Turner (Mr. Maule was with them) for the respondent.

The question here resolves itself into one of form, and there can be no doubt that the demurrer is defective in form, and was properly overruled. In the first place, there is ample ground to assert the jurisdiction of a court of equity; but if not, then it may be contended that there has been under the statute a transfer of all the equitable jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer to the Court of Chancery, and that an information of this description would have been perfectly well maintainable in the Exchequer or Equity prior to the passing of the statute.

[455] What is the information here? It is one which charges an abuse of the powers confided to the mayor and commonalty, and complains that they have been guilty of that which is in substance a purpresture. All the allegations, with reference to the proposed embankments at any of the places mentioned in the information, set forth a case of breach of duty as bailiffs, as well as of injury to the public use of the river. Such being the state of the information, what is the demurrer? It is applied to every thing but those allegations which allege the injury to the public, and on them issue is joined. The defendants admit that there is an issue between them and the Attorney General on the question of nuisance. They admit the possession of the documents which will prove the facts alleged, and they demur to the discovery of those documents. According to this representation of the pleadings, if the case was one between subject and subject, there can be no doubt that it might be made matter of inquiry in a court of equity. The House is not dealing here simply with the jus publicum of the Crown: it is a case of jus privatum of the Crown, and the Crown cannot in such a case be placed in a worse situation than a subject would be under similar circumstances. This demurrer, therefore, cannot be maintained, more especially in the face of an admission of the possession of the documents which are to be used on the trial of an issue, of nuisance or no nuisance, between the Crown and the grantees of the Crown.

[Lord Campbell.—The Corporation may be indicted for a nuisance, if one has been committed.]

Not here; for the Mayor and Commonalty are not alleged to be in possession, or to have committed the nuisance. Suppose that this case had taken the course of a motion in Chancery for an injunction, surely the production of the documents, which are admitted to be in the possession of the defendant, would be most material in such a [456] motion; and if material, the production of them would be ordered. So that in point of form this demurrer goes a great deal too far in resisting the production of them.

Then, is it not clear, that on the face of this information, there is an equitable case stated; entitling the Crown to a decree? The general rule as to demurrer to a bill is this, that when the facts stated in the bill are admitted, the question is whether those facts do not establish a sufficient ground for interference? Here the facts admitted show that the Crown is entitled to the bed of the river, and that the defendants held the office of conservators, and therefore were in a situation of confidence in relation to the Crown, being in fact the bailiffs of the Crown; then that the mayor did not in virtue of his office take any interest in the soil of the river; then that the mayor and commonalty had set up a claim not only to exercise the right of conservancy, but to be seised in fee of the ground, bed, and soil of the river; and, finally, that they took on themselves to make grants which were not in accordance with their rights or duties of conservators. The prayer is, that the grantees shall be restrained, and that the deeds of grant shall be given up, they being contrary to the fiduciary duty of those who made them. Is not such a case one for the interference of a court of equity? Can it be said that a land-lord cannot come into a court of equity and call on his bailiff to account for the rents and profits of the estate entrusted to his management? In this respect there is no distinction between the case of a private person and of a corporation as an agent of the Crown; nor can there be any difference on the ground that the defendants here are bailiffs by office, instead of being bailiffs by appointment, for a bailiff by office shall account, Comyn's Digest (Tit. Accompt (A 3) 2; citing 1 Rol. 118, l. 50). The declaration of right here prayed from the Crown, is for the purpose of preventing a multiplication of suits, and the [457] Crown has a right, as much as any individual, to come into a court of equity and ask a declaration of right for such a purpose. The Crown cannot be put to the necessity of proceeding by writ of intrusion against these grantees, when, the day after doing so, the appellants may grant a hundred other licences of the same sort. It is true that here they do not actually perform the acts complained of; but they grant licences to others to do them, and therefore a declaration of right is necessary. Proceedings may be taken in this way by a principal against an agent; the Mayor of York v. Pilkington (1 Atk. 282); that is an important case. A bill was there filed for a fishery; a demurrer was filed to the bill, on the ground that the bill was against several distinct parties, claiming different grounds of title. The court put the case that several defendants there claimed the same right, and after re-argument the demurrer was overruled. How does that case apply here? In this way, that all the licencees claim in a common right, and therefore this information, which is in the nature of a bill of peace, will lie. Then it is said that the mayor and commonalty did not do that which was here complained of, but that if done at all, it was done by those who had their lawful licence, but who neglected or violated that licence, and that this cannot make the act of granting the licence void. The answer is, that it is not necessary to file the information against those who actually do the act, nor perhaps could it be maintained against them without joining with them those under whose authority they acted. The mayor and commonalty here took fines for these licences, and therefore have a direct interest in the matter. The same equity is applicable here as in the cases of lords of manors, where questions arise as to reservations of privileges of particular mills, or as to rights of common, and where in a suit against the lord's grantee the lord himself must be joined.

The only doubt is on the question whether the Crown [458] was compellable to make the mayor and commonalty parties to the bill. On that point an important case was decided by Lord Eldon in 1819. That was a case of Fairman v. King (MS.), which related to the fishery at Milton. The bill was filed by the lessee of the Milton fishery against King and 130 other persons, calling themselves free fishermen, and the object was to prevent them entering on the fishery or disturbing the plaintiff's rights therein. An injunction was granted ex parte, and a motion afterwards made to dissolve it. Lord Eldon, in considering the question whether such an injunction could be granted, referred to the case of Lord Tenham v. Herbert (2 Atk. 483), and adopted the opinion there expressed by the Lord Chancellor, that there were cases in which a man might by a bill of this kind first go into equity, and others where he must first establish his right at law. That was a strong case, and is directly applicable to the present. The lessee there claimed title to the fishery under a grant from the lord; his rights were disputed by 130 persons, claiming to be free fishermen, or dredgers in the river. If the lessee's title was good, he might have maintained trespass against every one of them, and his legal rights must have been proved in order to show that he had a title to any damages. Without having tried his legal right, but asserting in equity a purely legal title, he asked the assistance of the court against these 130 persons, who claimed a right as free fishermen. The objection was taken that this was a question of title, properly determinable in a court of law; but the Court, treating the suit as a bill of peace, said it was impossible to drive him to maintain actions of trespass against 130 persons, and therefore it interfered for the purpose of quieting the possession and putting the legal rights in a course of legal trial between a small number of the parties interested. The same course must be followed here.

[459] Then it is said that ejectment might be maintained here; but that is not so, for nothing that has occurred would enable the Crown to maintain ejectment against the corporation.

[The Lord Chancellor.—Ejectment might not be maintained against the corporation, because it is not in possession; but might not ejectment be maintained against its lessee or licensee?]

Perhaps so; but the corporation might grant a new lease immediately, and the suits might therefore be endless. To prevent such a course, the Crown may come into equity (Mitf. Trea. on Pleading, 117, 3rd Edit.). On this subject, that of permitting this information on the principle of a bill of peace, the case of Ewelme Hospital v. The Corporation of Andover (1 Vern. 266) is important; for there the bill was allowed, after full consideration of all the difficulties which might be raised, and while proceedings were in fact going on at law. The rule as to such bills is well laid down in Mitford on Equity Pleading, where it is said (3 edit. 119—4 edit. 145), "It is not necessary to establish the right at law before filing a bill, where the right appears on record, as under letters patent for a new invention; in which case a demurrer to a bill for an injunction to restrain an infringement of the patent right has been overruled. . . . Where a right, prima facie, and of common right, is vested in the Crown, it will receive the same protection; and this principle may be applied to some of the cases mentioned in a preceding page." The cases of Lord Tenham v. Herbert, and the Mayor of York v. Pilkington, are among those referred to.

So that, if it was admitted that in the case of a private individual there must be a proceeding at law, it would not follow that the same course must be adopted in the case of the Crown. But the admission as to the private indi- [460]-vidual is not made; and it is not necessary, therefore, to consider whether the Crown is or not exempted from a similar liability.

Then as to the prayer for an account. It is admitted that the corporation has received different sums of money in respect of these licenses. These sums have been received in consequence of a breach of duty. In a case of that kind, the rights of the Crown are well stated by Sir Anthony Hart in the Attorney General v. The Corporation of Galway (1 Molloy, 95). It was insisted that the information which had been filed in that case could not be supported, because the matter in dispute was properly the subject of a legal demand; but Sir A. Hart said (id. 103), "It cannot be an objection to an information that there is a remedy at law. The Attorney General, acting on behalf of the public, has the right to sue in this court, even for a legal demand. . . . The Crown may call on the subject to come into any of the courts. Of course, I do not mean to say that trusts may be enforced in the King's Bench, or ejectments maintained in Chancery."

[The Lord Chancellor.—That is just the line where the distinction is drawn.]

It is so. The general principle of the Crown to sue in any of its courts is clear; but that principle may be subject in its application to the necessity of proceeding in a particular manner.

[The Lord Chancellor.—Then would you say that the Crown might bring a case of law into a court of equity, but not a case of equity into a court of law?]

Certainly; except in the instance of a proceeding under a statute.

[The Lord Chancellor.—No statute has much to do with this case. If the matter is matter of law, it is as objectionable in the Exchequer as in Chancery, unless [461] you can show that there is a peculiar jurisdiction in the Exchequer which would make such a proceeding correct. If the Attorney General might have filed this information in the Court of Chancery before the statute of Victoria, then that statute has no application to the question now.]

If the principles already submitted to the House are correct, then it is undoubted that an information of this nature could have been filed in the Exchequer antecedently to the statute, and by the statute all the equity jurisdiction of that court was transferred to Chancery. In the decisions of the Court of Exchequer, referred to on the other side, the judges must have confined their opinions to one clause of the statute.

[The Lord Chancellor.—If the Crown may still go to the Court of Exchequer as a court of equity, the statute requires amendment, for it has taken away all the machinery by which this sort of business was transacted in that court. There can be no doubt of the intention of the legislature to take away all jurisdiction from the Court of Exchequer in equity.]

Such seems to be the reasonable construction of the statute. The right to adjudicate in such matters is entirely transferred to the Court of Chancery; and this is a matter of a purely equitable nature, for it charges a duty on the defendants as bailiffs, and a breach of duty by them in that character, and asks for the interference of the Court in respect of that charge. That is clearly within the jurisdiction of equity, and the order of the Court below must be sustained.

Mr. Bethell, in reply.

The simple inquiry here is, whether, de facto, the embankments are nuisances! That is not a subject for relief in equity. It is said that an indictment for a nuisance would not lie against the Corporation, because the Corpo-[462]-ration is not a party to the nuisance. But, if not, then the Corporation ought not to have been subjected to this proceeding, which relates entirely to nuisance; the Attorney General v. Johnston (2 John Wilson's Rep. 87).

The information elaborately sets forth a question of title in the Crown, and an alleged usurpation by the Corporation by acts of ownership, and asks that the title of the Crown may be declared. The information is therefore distinctly addressed to the question of freehold, which is a legal, and not an equitable question.

There are two classes of bills of peace: one may be maintained before trial, where the same interest exists in different persons; the other is where one title has been tried at law, and the bill is brought to prevent further and useless litigation. But the principle of a bill of peace does not apply to the Crown, for the Crown may include as many persons as it pleases in one information for intrusion. This case therefore does not fall within that class in which, in order to prevent endless litigation upon the same legal rights, equity permits bills to be filed in respect of such rights. The distinction is perfectly laid down by the case of Adair v. The New River Company (11 Ves. 429). The case of Fairman v. King and Others (MS.) was an instance of a bill of peace after the legal title had been once tried. The case of Ewelme v. The Corporation of Andover (1 Vern. 266), was not a proceeding of this sort at all, but was a bill to quiet possession, where there was no dispute as to what had before been the rights of the parties, for there had been a trial at law.

This is not a case of purpresture, for that is a wrongful inclosure of a part of the freehold of the Crown; but this is a complaint of a nuisance, and, as such, must be sent to a court of law. The case of The Attorney General v. The [463] Mayor of Galway, is not in point here, for that related to the application of the borough funds, and was therefore in the nature of a public trust.

[Lord Campbell.—What are the allegations of this information? Referring to them, let me ask, whether, if a man is alleged to be the keeper of a royal forest, and is charged with cutting timber, or doing any other act of ownership, would not that be a breach of a fiduciary duty? and would not that entitle the Crown to maintain a suit in equity against him? Is it not the same thing here? If the Mayor of London is the conservator of the Thames, and he grants the soil of the river, is not that a breach of his fiduciary duty?]

Separate parts of the information may no doubt be selected, which will give an appearance of an equitable claim being raised by it; but, if the whole is properly taken together, it is clear that the question raised is one of title to freehold, and one therefore which gives good ground for demurrer to the jurisdiction. The facts stated in the information are not admitted, except so far as is necessary for the purpose of trying this question of jurisdiction. That question is fairly raised by this demurrer, and ought to be decided in favor of these appellants.

The Lord Chancellor (March 13).—My Lords, some important points have been raised in the arguments in this case, upon which, if it was at all necessary for your Lordships to express any opinion, I should, undoubtedly, think it right to desire time for more mature consideration: but so far from thinking it right to give an opinion upon points, which, though important, do not necessarily arise for decision, I think that it is my duty to abstain from such a course, because any opinion given under such circumstances can only have the effect of an obiter opinion expressed by an individual, and does not constitute the opinion of the whole House. The pleadings here are such as not to [464] call for a decision upon the more important points raised in argument; and the more important the points raised are, the more I consider it the duty of the House to confine itself to that which is before it, and to decide on the minor points alone, if they alone are properly raised for its consideration.

This case comes before the House upon demurrer. The rules of a court of equity, and in fact also of a court of law, upon matters of demurrer, are generally free from all doubt; although particular cases may occur which may raise a difficulty about their application. The general principle is clear. The proposition raised by the demurrer amounts to this: admitting all your facts to be true, you do not state a case that any court of equity can give relief upon. If there is any part of the case which would entitle the parties to a decree upon the facts stated, the demurrer cannot be supported. A demurrer to a bill or information, therefore, challenges the plaintiff to show that he is entitled to some portion of the relief prayed according to the facts stated.

This bill, which is filed by the Attorney General, asserts in terms the right of the Crown to the soil of the river Thames, between high and low water-marks. It alleges, indeed, that the defendants set up a claim to the freehold of that soil; but it alleges and charges that they have no such right, that the right is in the Crown; that the corporators of London, exercising their duty through the means of the Lord Mayor, are merely conservators or bailiffs of the Crown to protect the navigation of the river, but have no right to the soil and freehold of it, and that what they have done is not authorized by the powers belonging to them as conservators or bailiffs of the Crown. It is against this part of the information that the demurrer is directed. The information then goes on to allege certain grants made by the appellants in exercise of their supposed right to the soil or bed of the river, and [465] charges that the embankments made under those grants are nuisances; and it prays, that the rights of the Crown and of the appellants respectively may be ascertained; that issues, if necessary, may be granted; and that perpetual injunctions may also be granted against the persons who are making the said embankments, so as to prevent them from making any such, except under license of the Crown, and that those already made may be ordered to be abated. The defendants put in an answer and demurrer to this information. The answer of the appellant alleges that the particular acts which are charged as nuisances are not nuisances, and the appellants then demur generally as for want of equity. The appellants have adopted this course; they have endeavoured to take out of the information all those allegations which relate to nuisance, to which they answer, and they demur to all the rest.

The portion of the prayer of the bill which the appellants answer, prays, that the embankments on the river, or so much of them as have been executed, may be abated, and the river restored to the situation in which it was before the embankments were made. Singularly enough, they leave standing and unnoticed the prayer that the licensees of the Corporation may be restrained, by perpetual injunction, from making such of the embankments in question as have only been partly begun without the license and permission of her Majesty.

Now, according to the information and the case stated, although the injunction is not prayed for as against the Corporation or the Lord Mayor, it is prayed that parties not claiming a title to the property, but acting under a licence from the corporation, may not be permitted to proceed with their works. The effect therefore of this demurrer, if it should be allowed, would be, that so much of the information as is the subject of the demurrer, so far as the parties demurring are concerned, may be struck out [466] of the cause, and they would then go on upon those parts only to which the answer has been applied, and therefore without any prayer for injunction so far as the appellants are concerned, but with the prayer standing upon the injunction so far as the other defendants are concerned. They would go to a hearing upon that part of the prayer to which I have before alluded, namely, that the embankment made may be prevented from being made.

The information also alleges that the Corporation, as conservators and bailiffs, have violated their duty towards the Queen, as proprietor of the soil, in granting licenses for those embankments, and alleges that they have received fines and rents and other emoluments from the parties to whom these licenses have been granted, and prays an account of what they have so received.

If the rule is to prevail in the present case, which has prevailed in all other cases upon subjects of demurrer, that all the matters demurred to are true in fact, your Lordships are to assume, upon the matters demurred to, that the corporators of the city of London, acting through the Lord Mayor, in the exercise of their civil power, are only the conservators and bailiffs of the Thames, and have, in violation of their duty as such conservators, granted licenses which they were not authorised to grant, and have, in so doing, received profits, which, as bailiffs and conservators, they were not entitled to receive, but for which, being so received by them, they are answerable to the Crown for which they are acting.

It is said by the learned counsel for the appellants, that you must not pick out of the information a passage here and there, and put them together, but look to the main subjects of the information. Now, I conceive that a party is entitled to pick out particular parts of the information to make out his case; that, upon the information as it stands, admitting all the facts to be true as stated, when the party comes to a hearing of such allegation he may, [467] upon the face of the information, select such facts as are admitted, and as will entitle him to relief. It is quite immaterial in what part of the information you find this ground for relief, provided it is to be found there, the facts being so admitted, and the Court being called upon to give effect to the information.

If this information should be brought to a hearing, and all that which the demurrer admits should appear to be true, there cannot be a doubt as to the title of the Crown to the relief which the information prays. What does the information charge? That the Crown is proprietor of the soil; that the defendants are merely conservators, and have, in violation of their duty, granted licences, and have, by means of such violation of duty, taken fines and emoluments which they were not entitled to receive. It is perfectly true that the information shews a pretence of title, but the allegation of the pretence of title is no admission that such title really exists. If it was, the information alleging that the Crown is entitled, and that the defendants are not, those facts being taken to be true, the information would then present a case for relief, upon that admission of facts. I apprehend that to be so beyond all doubt.

The case has been argued, and necessarily argued, as if this was in substance an ejectment bill, a bill seeking to recover possession of land, and, so far, as an endeavour by a court of equity to assume a jurisdiction which properly belongs to a court of law. It is perfectly well known that very many ejectment bills, which, in point of fact, and in substance, are ejectment bills, are so framed as to be incapable of being met by demurrer, and in that way the jurisdiction of a court of equity has been sustained. Parties frequently, under the pretence of contesting the right to cut timber, have come into equity, and used title-deeds, which really raised the question of the title to the estate itself, and various other expedients have been resorted to for the purpose of endeavouring to bring such a matter [468] within the jurisdiction of a court of equity. If the bill be properly framed for that purpose, it precludes the opposing party from demurring, but it does not prevent the objection to the bill being raised when the case comes on for hearing, because then, when the facts are known, if it appears that the real question between the parties is the title to the freehold, the court of equity, notwithstanding the facts are true, as stated, may and does, and properly does, refuse to interfere, upon the ground of its being a matter of law only, and therefore not within the jurisdiction of a court of equity. That is not the case here. If the facts, as stated here, are true, there is no question of freehold raised; because, if the facts are true, the Crown is entitled to the freehold, the defendants hold under the Crown certain privileges only, and, having been guilty of an abuse of those privileges, are bound to answer to the Crown. How is it possible that the rule which applies to cases of this class can be so construed as to make the demurrer tenable? Is it possible, the facts being true, to say that a case has not been made out for the interposition of a court of equity? I take the whole general scope of the statement of the information into my consideration when I put this question. Here is an allegation of title in the Crown, and there is an allegation also of abuse of privileges granted by the Crown to the appellants, and then comes the general charge of the possession of documents which are alleged to relate to matters herein before mentioned—"all the matters herein before mentioned,"—and you cannot take them otherwise. The language is clear and distinct, and therefore the demurrer admits that the papers and documents (the production of which is refused by the demurrer), do relate, or may relate—it is the same thing—to those matters amongst others; some of these matters being denied by the answer, and others being admitted by the demurrer.

Upon these grounds it appears to me that this House [469] would not be doing its duty, and would very much tend to relax the rules of pleading (which rules, if they are to be relaxed, are not to be relaxed by decision in a particular case), if it overruled the pleadings in this case, by expressing an opinion upon points which in my opinion do not arise in this case, upon matters of very high importance, which ought only to be decided where there is no doubt at all as to the mode and form in which they are brought forward for decision. I therefore move your Lordships to affirm the judgment of the Master of the Rolls.

Lord Campbell.—My Lords, I take exactly the same view of this case with my noble and learned friend who has just addressed the House. If it was necessary to decide that great question of the construction of the Act, 5 Vict., as to the transfer of the jurisdiction exercised by the Court of Exchequer in revenue causes, in what may be called the equity side of the Court of Exchequer, to the Court of Chancery, I should certainly wish to have time to consider it, and I should probably request that we might have the assistance of the judges in considering it; but I think that question is not at all necessary for us to decide, and therefore I give no opinion upon it.

I proceed upon the second reason given in the respondent's case, "because the facts stated by the information, and covered by the demurrer, furnish a proper and sufficient case to entitle the Crown to the relief prayed by the information, and demurred to, on some part thereof in the Court of Chancery in the ordinary exercise of its equitable jurisdiction, and independently of the jurisdiction transferred to that court by the above statute." It seems to me to be quite clear, that if this information had been filed in the Court of Chancery before the act of Parliament referred to had been passed, the demurrer could not have been sustained. Is there not a case for the equitable jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery that is not covered by the demurrer? Whatever other question there may be that [470] may be raised with respect to the soil of the river, is there not enough raised to show that this is a case for equitable relief? It is expressly averred that the bed and soil of the river Thames belong to the Crown. It is expressly alleged that the mayor and corporation of London are conservators of the river, and that they are, as such and for that purpose, the agents and bailiffs of the Crown. It is expressly alleged, that in violation of their duty as agents of the Crown, they have granted licences to embank the soil of the river, and that they have received money for so doing.

These are the facts, and I entertain no doubt that they establish a clear case for the interference of the Court of Chancery. It seems to me that the Crown has as good a right to relief in this case, as in the case, which I believe has occurred more than once, where the keeper of a royal forest has granted a power to depasture upon it, or to cut timber upon it, or has even made a grant of part of the soil of the forest. Can there be any doubt that, in such a case, he would be liable to an information in the Court of Chancery?—and would have been liable before this statute of the 5th of Victoria was passed, to account for what he had received through a breach of his duty as agent for the Crown. It seems to me that these conservators of the river Thames stand exactly in the same relation to the Crown? If these facts are alleged, which we must now take to be true, I think there is enough to support the jurisdiction in equity. The facts as alleged may be wholly unfounded; hereafter it may turn out that the Crown is not so entitled, for that the soil and freehold of the bed of the river Thames do belong to the Corporation and City of London; but at present, and on these pleadings, we must suppose that the Crown is seised of them, and that the Mayor and Corporation have held them only as bailiffs, and have been guilty of a breach of duty by granting these licenses, and receiving money for the licenses. Under these circumstances it appears to me quite clear that this is a case in which the information [471] may be maintained by the Crown in the Court of Chancery without any transfer of any new power to the Court of Chancery from the Court of Exchequer, and, that therefore, this demurrer must be overruled.

Mr. Bethell.—In the Court below, the Master of the Rolls held, what I humbly submit to be the universal principle, that the Crown neither receives nor pays any costs. Therefore, after discussion there, the demurrer was overruled without costs.

Mr. Maule.—There is no such rule as that the Attorney General never pays costs. One of the last cases which was decided upon the subject was that of the Attorney General v. Lord Ashburnham (1 Si. and St. 394), where Sir John Leach, in a case where a charity information had been filed, without a relator, under the 59 Geo. 3, c. 91, held that the Court had jurisdiction to order the defendant to pay costs to the Attorney General. In the course of his judgment there he expressly stated that there was no such general principle in Equity, as that the Crown cannot receive costs.

The Lord Chancellor.—That case does not apply here, where the Attorney General sues as an officer of the Crown in right of the Crown. As such he does not pay costs. I do not mean to say that a case may not occur in which the Attorney General would be liable to pay costs, but then where private parties have no chance of getting costs, and they have none here, the Court is cautious how it makes them pay costs. I think the judgment must be affirmed, without costs.

Order affirmed, without costs.

Heir-at-law—Evidence—Issue—Will.

It is the ordinary rule of a court of equity, in cases where an heir disputes the will, to grant an issue to try that question; but where he does not dispute it, but acts under it, merely denying that certain portions of the land pass under the description used in it, a court of equity has full jurisdiction to determine the question thus raised, without granting an issue, or may grant such issue at its discretion.

In such a case parol evidence of what was considered, in the lifetime of the testator, to be the extent of the lands constituting the estate, is receivable.

A testator, who describes himself as of "Ashford Hall, in the county of Salop," devised "all my estate in Shropshire, called Ashford Hall," to trustees, for sale:

Held, that this description was not confined to the mansion-house so called, and the lands immediately adjoining, but extended to such other lands in Shropshire as he possessed at the time of making his will:

Held also, that the court of equity, in a suit to enforce the trusts of the will, might receive parol evidence to shew what the testator had been accustomed to consider the Ashford Hall Estate.

This was an appeal against a decree of the Master of the Rolls in a suit brought by the assignees of one John B. Ricketts, under the following circumstances:—

In the year 1802, George Crawford Ricketts, Esquire, [473] purchased an estate in Shropshire. The conveyance of this estate, effected by deeds of lease and release, of the 1st and 2nd of October in that year, thus described the premises purchased:—"All that capital messuage or mansion house, with the gardens, shrubberies, stables, fish pools, coach-house, out-buildings, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, called Ashford Hall, heretofore the residence of Jonathan Green, deceased, and afterwards of Thomas Stokes, lately of Charles Edward Nugent, and now or late of William Henry Worthington; and also all that piece or parcel of meadow land, or ground adjoining to the said mansion-house, called the Lawn, and all that meadow adjacent to the said lawn, and containing, with the said lawn, twenty-eight acres, two roods, fourteen perches, and occupied with the said mansion-house; and also all those three several pieces of meadow or pasture land, lying together, now called the Team-side Meadow, the Marl Brook, the Gravel-pit Piece, and the Gaul Meadow, and containing in the whole, by estimation, forty-one acres, and now or late in the possession of Richard Hodnet; and also all that newly-erected barn, with the fold-yards, sheds, and appurtenances, and all those several pieces or parcels of meadow ground, pasture land, orchard and arable land, all lying together, and containing in the whole, by admeasurements, eighty-one acres and twenty-one perches, and called by the names of Stoneybridge Meadow, the New Tending Orchard, the Barn-close Meadow, the Brick-kiln Field, the Shaw, the Fish-pool Field or Meadow, the Upper and Lower Hollyditch, Young Woodfield, and the Upper and Lower Lawrence Furlongs; and also all that messuage in the village of Ashford Bowdler, with the barn, out-buildings, and several pieces or parcels of meadow or pasture land and orcharding, containing five acres; and also all that piece called the Little Meadow, containing one acre; and also all that orchard, piece or parcel of land or ground, heretofore called Hollyditch Orchard, [474] and now or lately called Wheatal's Field, or Wheatal's Orchard, containing one acre and one rood, or thereabouts; and also all that croft or piece of meadow land formerly called Twist Oakfield, and heretofore lying open with the Gravel-pit Piece aforesaid, containing one acre or thereabouts: all which said hereditaments and premises (except the said piece called the Fish-pool Field or Meadow, containing four acres and two roods, which lies in the parish of Richard's Castle, in the said county of Salop), are situate, lying, and being in the parish of Ashford Bowdley, in the said county of Salop; and also all that piece or parcel of arable land, now or lately known by the name of the Church Land, formerly part of the estate of Henry Jordan, and situate at Overton, in the parish of Richard's Castle aforesaid, and also the tithes," etc.

The appellant, the eldest son of Mr. G. C. Ricketts, married in 1804, and on occasion of that marriage, a settlement to the amount of £4000 was made by Mr. G. C. Ricketts on his son and the intended wife, and this sum was charged on the purchased property, by deeds, dated on the 19th and 20th July, 1804, in which the estate was described in the same manner as before, omitting, however, the references to "Team-side Meadow, Marl-brook, Gravel-pit Piece, and Gaul Meadow," and also the references to the messuage in "Ashford Bowdler, and the Little Meadow," and also to the "Church Land in the parish of Richard's Castle."

In 1808 G. C. Ricketts made his will, in which he described himself as "of Ashford Hall, in the county of Salop," and by which, among other things, he devised as follows:—"As it is my wish and desire that all my estate in Shropshire, called Ashford Hall, should be sold, I do therefore give and devise the same unto my son, Thomas Bourke Ricketts, and my son-in-law, Rev. R. D. Hallifax, and the survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor, in trust to sell and dispose of the same, for the most [475] money that can be got for the same. The proceeds of such sale, after deducting what may be due on the mortgage given on my eldest son's marriage, I give and bequeath unto my sons, John B. Ricketts, G. W. Ricketts, and my daughters, M. B. Anderson, E. B. Hallifax, and L. F. Ricketts, in equal proportions, share and share alike." The testator appointed Mr. Hallifax and T. B. Ricketts his executors.

The testator died in 1811, and the executors some time afterwards advertised for sale in five lots the estate comprised in the indentures of October 1802, and the printed particulars described it as consisting of "a substantial mansion called Ashford Hall, a walled garden, hothouse, pleasure grounds, lawn, and sundry rich inclosures, the whole including about 166 acres." As no sale was effected on this occasion, the two executors, in July 1812, employed Mr. Christie of London to sell the estate, and, with their knowledge, particulars were circulated, in which it was described as "a most desirable freehold estate, consisting of a substantial convenient mansion, called Ashford Hall, in excellent repair and neat condition, with stabling and offices of every description for the complete accommodation of a family, walled kitchen gardens, lawn, pleasure ground, and rich inclosures, altogether 121 acres and upwards." No sale took place on this occasion.

In September 1823, the appellant, on behalf of himself and the other executor and trustee, contracted with Miss Harriet Buckley for the sale to her of the mansion-house and appurtenances, and thirty-three acres of land, for the sum of £3937 10s., and this purchase money was applied in part satisfaction of the mortgage of 1804.

In 1831 J. B. Ricketts, who on the death of his brother, G. W. Ricketts, had become entitled to that brother's share, became bankrupt, and the plaintiffs were appointed assignees of his estate. They then filed a bill, and afterwards an amended bill, against the trustees and children [476] of the testator, praying that the will might be declared well proved and established; that an account might be taken in respect of the monies received by the trustees from the sale of such part of the Shropshire estate as had been sold, and of the rents received by the same parties; that a rent might be fixed by the master, and paid by T. B. Ricketts in respect of his occupation of the mansion house and appurtenances previously to the sale thereof to H. Buckley; that the unsold part of the Shropshire estate might be sold, and two-sixth parts of the proceeds thereof paid to the plaintiffs, and a receiver appointed in the mean time.

The defendant, T. B. Ricketts, put in four consecutive answers to the original bill, and the like number of answers to the amended bill. By the former he alleged that the estate called Ashford Hall consisted of a capital messuage, with the garden, shrubberies, stables, fish pools, coach house, outbuildings, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, containing about ten acres; that the said capital messuages, without the said shrubberies and fish pools, was in common parlance called Ashford Hall, and was so called before part of the said shrubberies and fish pools conveyed therewith to the testator, under the same name, was purchased from an adjoining estate, and added thereto; that the testator was at the time of making his will, and thenceforward till the time of his death, seised in fee simple of the real estate in the county of Salop, containing altogether 154 acres or thereabouts, and which, according to the defendant's knowledge and belief, did not form any part of the testator's estate called Ashford Hall, but went and was known to the testator by the names and descriptions of "the Ashford Estate," "the Ashford Farm," "the Forty Acres," "the House in Village," and others mentioned in the mortgage security for £4000; and under such circumstances the defendant, as the heir at law of the testator, submitted that the words "all my estate in Shropshire, called [477] Ashford Hall," consisted of the premises comprised in the said ten acres, and did not include any other estate or property of the testator situate in Shropshire; that the estate called and distinguished as Ashford Hall, was, at the time when the testator made his will, of greater value than the amount of the mortgage debt of £4000; that to the best of the defendant's knowledge and belief, the testator never spoke of or called the other real estate of 154 acres, or any part thereof, "Ashford Hall," or his "Ashford Hall estate;" and the defendant, by the same answer, insisted that the hereditaments and premises containing 154 acres or thereabouts, descended to the defendant as the heir at law of the testator. The defendant, in his answers, likewise stated his belief that the estate and hereditaments, consisting of the particulars set forth in the bills, did not before the 28th of September 1798, belong to the same proprietor, and were not considered before that time as one estate, but that after that time they were called and known by the aggregate name of Ashford, or the Ashford estate, and continued to be so called and known to the testator up to the time of his death, and not called or known by the aggregate name or names of the Ashford Hall estate, or the estate of Ashford Hall.

The defendant admitted that he had principally acted in the execution of the trusts of the testator's will since the testator's death; that the estate and hereditaments in question, so purchased by and conveyed to the testator in the year 1802, were treated and considered by the defendant, up to the time of preparing his answers to the original bill, but not since, and by his co-trustee during his life, as one and the same devised estate and hereditaments; but he stated that they were not so devised, because the testator never did call the said estate and hereditaments Ashford Hall, but called them his Ashford estate; and that if the devise was not altogether invalid by reason of the uncertainty of the description of the property, still, nothing in law [478] passed under the words "all my estate in Shropshire called Ashford Hall," except that part of the purchased premises which was described and distinguished from the other parts of the estate and hereditaments, as being called Ashford Hall, in the several conveyances to and from the testator, that is to say, "all that capital messuage or mansion house, with the garden, shrubberies, stables, fish pools, coach-house, outbuildings and appurtenances thereunto belonging, called Ashford Hall;" that the conveyance to Miss Buckley, containing the recital of the testator's desire as expressed in his will, to the effect that all his estate in Shropshire called Ashford Hall, including the hereditaments thereafter described, should be sold, was inadvertently executed by the defendant, and that the words "including the hereditaments thereafter described," were artfully inserted by the purchaser who prepared the conveyance, to give an appearance of title; and that the conveyances to and from the testator were in favour of the defendant's claim as heir at law, by showing that the testator had an estate which in title, viz., "the capital messuage, with the gardens, shrubberies, fish pools, coach-house, outbuilding, and appurtenances, called Ashford Hall," completely answered the description in the will of "all my estate in Shropshire called Ashford Hall."

Evidence was adduced on the part of the plaintiffs to the following effect:—that T. B. Ricketts had, in a correspondence, declared that he considered himself as a trustee of the property in question for the benefit of himself and the other legatees named in the testator's will, and treated the property, up to the time of a sale of a part thereof to Miss Buckley, as one entire and undivided estate. It was also proved that the estate and premises were purchased as one entire estate by a person named Stokes in 1797; that Green was the sole proprietor thereof during several years before Stokes became the owner, and that before Green became the owner, the estate and premises belonged to one Hall, who devised them to Green; and [479] by the conveyance to Stokes as well as by deeds of prior date, the shrubberies and fish pools were mentioned amongst the parcels thereby conveyed, and by the evidence of numerous witnesses, several of whom had lived in the vicinity of the estate for very many years past, the estate was represented by them to have been known as one entire and undivided estate, and called by them and the testator, and those living in its vicinity, as the Ashford Hall estate, or the Ashford estate. There was also evidence adduced of a map having been made of the estate in 1811, by a witness named Evans, by the direction of the solicitor of the trustees, and of a lease which had been granted to a witness named Carter of a considerable portion of the estate by the trustees, T. B. Ricketts and Hallifax. There was also evidence adduced of the letters written by T. B. Ricketts to Miss Buckley, pending the treaty for purchase by her of part of the property, showing that he considered himself a trustee of the whole of the property, and also of the proposed agreement with Miss Buckley in 1828, wherein he was described as a trustee.

No evidence was offered to the court on the part of the defendant.

The cause came on to be heard before the Master of the Rolls, on the 20th, 21st, and 22d days of February, 1844, and by a decree then made, his Lordship declared that the will of George Crawford Ricketts, the testator, was well proved and ought to be established, and the trusts thereof performed and carried into execution, and that the whole of the testator's estates in Shropshire passed by his will. And he decreed that it should be referred to the Master to take an account of all sums of money which had been produced by the sale of the mansion house and lands to Miss Buckley, and received by the defendant (the appellant), and how much of such sum was properly applied by the defendant in paying off the mortgage for £4000; and further directions were reserved.

[480] Mr. Serjeant Manning and Mr. Warren for the appellant.

The decree of the Master of the Rolls is erroneous; he has given a greater effect to the words than they can legally bear. The whole estate did not pass by the will. The Master of the Rolls has said that the whole of the estates in Shropshire passed by the will, yet part of what the respondents call the Ashford Hall estate is not within the county, and if ejectment should be brought to recover the lands in Shropshire, it must be confined to those which were within the county. The decree directs that all the estates (not estate, but estates), in Shropshire shall be sold. Under that decree the trustees would be bound to sell all the tithes of the lands, and to account to all the devisees in trust.

[Lord Campbell.—Did you make that point before the Master of the Rolls, or make any objection to the minutes of the decree?]

No objection of that kind was made. But though that particular point was not taken, this House will not affirm a judgment which on the face of it is erroneous. Now, it is clear that the land tax and the tithes would not pass under this devise, and therefore a decree, declaring that all the estates passed, is erroneous.

The rule to be applied in this case is that which is stated in Wigram's Treatise on Extrinsic Evidence, where it is said, "The question of expounding a will is not to discover what the testator meant, as distinguished from what his words express, but simply what is the meaning of his words."

[The Lord Chancellor.—That merely intends that you are not to speculate on the meaning.]

It is clear, on the facts of this case, that the entirety of the property was not intended to be given, and it could not be so intended, for in 1799 three of the closes, which are [481] said to have passed, were exchanged for other closes. There is no ground for saying that this devise of "all my estate in Shropshire, called Ashford Hall," has any other application than to that particular property, which was originally conveyed to Mr. Ricketts by that name. This is clear, for several reasons. First, because there is property which never was held by the former proprietors of the estate; secondly, because the phrase will not cover the redeemed land tax, or the tithes, or the rent-charge created, in lieu thereof, by statute. In order to convey these, the party must have used very different language, and his not having done so must be taken as proof of what was his real intention.

It is curious enough that in no one part of the will does the testator use the phrase which alone would justify the argument on the other side. In no one part does he say "my Ashford Hall estate:" he invariably speaks of it as his estate called Ashford Hall, which plainly restricts his meaning to a particular portion of the property. In the settlement of July 1804 he so refers to it, and that mode of describing it he continued to the last. So that if evidence of his acts is to be given as evidence of his meaning, it is clear that he did not convey all the estates he was there possessed of, but only that part of them which had received the specific designation of Ashford Hall.

[The Lord Chancellor.—Your argument would go to shew that only the mansion-house and ten acres adjoining it would pass.]

That is so. The argument has a double aspect. The testator may not have said what he did intend to say, or he may have said what he did not intend to say, and in either case the heir-at-law would be entitled. There is no ground for any strained construction of the words of this will, in order to try to arrive at the intentions of the testator, for he knew well how to express himself; he was a lawyer; and when, as in another part of the [482] will, and with reference to another estate, he intended to pick out a particular portion of his estate, he knew how to do it.

[Lord Campbell.—Then you think that he intended to die intestate of the one hundred and fifty-four acres?]

He did. The rule which was laid down in the case of Doe d. Oxenden v. Chichester (4 Dow. 65, affirming the judgment of the Common Pleas, 3 Taunt. 147), must govern the present case, namely, that where there is a sufficient estate to satisfy a devise according to one meaning of the words employed, collateral evidence is not admissible to shew that the testator meant to use them in a more extensive sense. In this case the admission of such evidence is improper, because there exist a capital mansion-house and several acres of land exactly answering the description given in the will; besides which, there can be no doubt that the testator used the description in the sense in which it had been used when he purchased the estate four years before he made his will. He knew that he had other estates in Shropshire.

[Lord Campbell.—You must not forget that he uses the word "all" before "my estates."]

That does not affect the question. "All" would describe his interest in the property, and might not be employed with any other view. If he had said "all my Ashford Hall estate," that would have been sufficient; but he being a lawyer, and knowing the effect of restrictive words, has used them, and spoken only of all "my estate called Ashford Hall."

[Lord Campbell.—Does not that bring it to a question of evidence, namely, what was the estate which went by the name of the Ashford Hall Estate in 1808?]

It may do so.

[Lord Campbell.—Then, if it comes to the weight of evidence, is not that fatal to your argument?]

[483] It is not; for you must take the proof of what the testator called it, not what it was called by the tradesmen of any neighbouring village.

[The Lord Chancellor.—It must be the name by which it was generally known.]

Suppose he bought ten acres of bare ground without any name, and then disposed of it, calling it the Rookery; if what was meant by "the Rookery" should afterwards become a question, the best evidence of what the testator meant must be obtained, and the question then would, in fact, be parcel or no parcel. But here a specific estate, which had long had a specific name, was dealt with by that name, and no such question arises.

[The Lord Chancellor.—It is stated in the bill that all these lands "were treated by the testator as one individual estate, and called and known by the name of the Ashford Hall estate."]

That statement is utterly unsustained by the evidence.

[The Lord Chancellor.—That is another matter; but that statement strictly relates to the question which you now say is the question in the cause.]

The evidence of what other people called the estate is evidence of a dangerous class. It must indeed be assumed, that if all the world knows an estate by one particular name, the testator would use that name in the same way as all the rest of the world. But, in the first place, the evidence here is not conclusive to shew that all the world did know the whole of the testator's estates to be included in the term the estates of Ashford Hall; and, in the next place, there is not one scrap of paper to shew that he used the phrase in such a sense, while there are deeds in existence which shew the probability that he used the phrase in a much less extensive sense.

If this house should be satisfied that in fact the testator intended to dispose of only part of the estate in Shropshire, the decision of the case would be thereby affected. [484] Now there is a doubt upon this subject; and if there is a doubt upon it, then the legal proposition arises that the heir at law is entitled. In Jarman on Wills it is said (page 315), "Conjecture is not permitted to supply what the testator has failed to indicate; for as the law has provided a definite successor in the absence of disposition, it would be unjust to allow the rights of this ascertained object to be superseded by the claim of any one not pointed out by the testator with equal distinctness. The principle of construction here referred to has found expression in the familiar phrase, that the heir is not to be disinherited unless by express words or necessary implication." The doctrine thus stated is supported by the cases of Thomas v. Thomas (3 Barn. and Cres. 825), Doe d. Ashforth v. Bower (3 Barn. and Ad. 453).

If the devisee has hitherto acted under an erroneous impression as to the extent of his rights, that will not affect them, or change the authority of the devise itself. Here the devisee was in the army and with his regiment, and the mortgage deeds, which might have informed him of the real nature of his rights, were with the mortgagee, so that he was without the means of forming a correct opinion; he cannot therefore be bound by anything that he has said or done under such circumstances.

Under the circumstances which exist in this case, the proper course of proceeding was not by bill. In a case of Strickland v. Strickland, which was recently before the Court of Chancery, the Lord Chancellor said that equity was not the proper place in which to try a question of partly legal title.

The Lord Chancellor.—We think that we need only trouble the respondent's counsel on the difficulty occasioned by the words of the decree, as to their effect on the tithes and the land tax. The testator devises "all my [485] estates in Shropshire called Ashford Hall." Now it appears by the conveyance that there are tithes there. The decree is peculiar; it declares that the whole of the "testator's estates in Shropshire" passed. That would include the rent charge and the land tax. Unless the respondents can make out that they are properly included, the decree would on the face of it appear to go beyond the words of the will. That would create some difficulty, though it would not affect the ultimate disposal of the appeal. If the words were altered in this way, that the whole of the "testator's lands in Shropshire" passed, and it was referred to the master to inquire what were those lands, then it might be directed that such lands should be declared to pass by the will.

Mr. Turner (Mr. Parker, Mr. Hallett, and Mr. Heathfield, were with him) for the respondents.—The difficulty as to the land tax can be easily removed. When the testator purchased the land tax he was the owner of the fee, and consequently the land tax would pass under the term “land,” for the land tax is merged in the land. As to the tithes, it is clear, on the appellant’s own showing, that no claim to them has been set up by the respondent. [He was stopped.]

The Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, this appears to be a very clear case, and one which ought not to have been brought here for reconsideration. The Master of the Rolls was clearly of opinion, upon grounds which appear to be perfectly unshaken by any observations that have been made by the counsel who have addressed the House, that this was the proper decree to be made. In the first place, it has been argued as if a Court of Equity has no jurisdiction to adopt the course which the Master of the Rolls had adopted; but nothing can be more erroneous than that supposition. The bill is filed for the purpose of executing a trust. Reference has been made to some observations which I am supposed to have made in Strickland v. [486] Strickland, and an interpretation has been attempted to be put upon them, which those observations do not warrant. They were not then made for the first time, because it is the established doctrine of a court of equity, that the court will not entertain a suit for trying an adverse title to land; but here the party could not try the question at law. This is the case of a trust; the assignees are calling on the devisees under the will, the trustees, to account for property in which the bankrupt is interested under the will. Now, if the heir at law had disputed the will, as in the ordinary cases, if there had been no special circumstances, such as exist in this case, he might have said, “I do not admit the will, and there must be an issue to try it.” But his right to do that is gone by; he does not ask to have an issue devisavit vel non to try the validity of the will; but he says there are certain portions of the lands which do not pass by the description the testator has used in the will. The plaintiff says, “You are trustees for me of all the testator gave to you in trust;” and the question arises as to whether a particular description of the lands sought to be taken out of the devise did or did not pass by it; that is a question which a court of equity must try, unless there should appear to be a difficulty on the evidence, in which case the court, in order to ascertain what the fact may be, is in the habit of sending it for trial by issue. It is a question strictly within the jurisdiction of the court to ascertain to what extent the trust goes; and there are no means of ascertaining that, otherwise than by coming to a court of equity. The Master of the Rolls has so treated it, and beyond all doubt that is the rule of a court of equity.

Then how does the case stand? It stands thus: that the bill, in very distinct terms, twice over in the course of the statement, says, “That before and up to the time of the date and execution of the last-mentioned indenture of release, the hereditaments and premises thereby conveyed and therein comprised, had been, and the same were [487] considered as one estate, and were called and known by the name of the Ashford Hall estate, or the Estate of Ashford Hall, and that they continued to be called and known by such name or names, by the said George Crawford Ricketts, after he had become, in manner aforesaid, the purchaser thereof, and up to the time of his death;” and in a subsequent part it contains a passage, which, having before read, I will not again refer to, and in which the same proposition is repeated, and the same allegation made, that it was called by the testator his Ashford Hall estate. The plaintiff, therefore, put directly in issue the ground on which he considered the words of the will passed the whole of the property; of course, having put that in issue, and the defendant having put in the last of his eight answers, the cause went to issue in Chancery, and the proposition which the plaintiff contended for, being, that this property did pass by that description, he proceeded in the regular course to prove the proposition which he had stated, namely, that the estate was used as one estate, and acquired the name from the former proprietor of the Ashford Hall estate, or the Estate of Ashford Hall, and that the testator had himself occupied it as one estate, and had himself called it or described it as the Ashford Hall estate, and that he was in the habit of so doing. Various instances are brought to prove this proposition, and, beyond all doubt they do prove it. Whether on cross-examination of the witnesses who supply this proof, it could have been shown that they had no sufficient means of knowledge, is a matter which does not appear on their depositions. Over and again they say the testator did so call it, and that is the appellation they give it, and they prove all that the allegations in the bill assert as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim. Now the party interested in meeting these allegations and contradicting what those witnesses were called to prove, enters into no evidence at all. Of all persons he was [488] the best able to know what the testator's views were with regard to his own property. He was the eldest son; his father was in possession, and nobody could be more capable of establishing the fact of his father's intention in not describing, or intending not to describe the property, as alleged in the bill; but no witnesses of any kind are called. It remains, therefore, on the evidence, such as it is, which is produced by the plaintiff, and not upon any other. There are various witnesses—very many in point of number—all of whom speak positively to the fact; and in that state of the evidence is a court of equity to say that there is a doubt? A doubt can only be raised on a conflict of evidence or by cross-examination, which will show that the parties who speak to facts have no means of knowing the facts they depose to. But to neither the one nor the other has the defendant had recourse: he has not attempted to shake the evidence produced by the plaintiff, nor has he, by bringing evidence on his own part, done that which was necessary to contradict the allegations in the bill. Therefore, whatever the real facts are, we can only judge of them by that which is put in issue and proved in the cause; and by those facts, so put in issue and so proved, it appears that the testator was in the occupation of this property as one estate, and that he did describe and call it the "Ashford Hall estate," or "the Estate of Ashford Hall," and I have been unable to discover the difference between the one and the other; they both mean to describe the same thing. Whether the word "estate" is put after or before "Hall," cannot, in my opinion, make any difference as to the meaning which the person who uttered those words, when he described the estates, meant to attach to the words so used.

It is very true that, in the deeds under which the testator derived title, part of the estate is described as the Ashford Hall estate, and then the deed goes on to describe other parts of the lands according to names or descriptions, not [489] necessarily including those other pieces of land in the description of Ashford Hall, describing Ashford Hall as the mansion-house. No doubt that must originally have been the name of the mansion-house, but how common is it for an estate to get the name of the mansion-house? First of all, it is such and such a Hall; then it is the Hall estate. It is by no means inconsistent with strong probability that the testator, even if he had obtained the lands from different quarters, was anxious to get them into one estate, and that he called the whole by one name; that is sufficient to shew what he meant by the terms used in his will. Here he procured it all from one source, except that one portion of land which he gained by exchange, and that part would well fall within the description of the original property. It is not unnatural that those parts so taken in exchange for other parts of the estate would fall within the same description, and be considered as a part of the estate to which they were added, and then the evidence is that such was the mode in which the testator dealt with the property, and such the appellation he gave to it; and that directly meets the allegation contained in the bill.

Then we have what I consider the most potent evidence of all; the heir being disinherited as far as this property goes, he being most interested in finding out that the property did not pass from him as heir; we have the extraordinary fact that from 1811, when the testator died, down to I do not know how long ago, he knew of this devise, acquiesced in it, dealt with the estate as trustee, conveyed part of it to another person, and then described all the lands as passing under this appellation contained in this recital:—"And whereas the said George Ricketts, by his last will, duly executed, and bearing date the 26th of April, 1808, expressed his wish and desire that his estate in Shropshire, called Ashford Hall, including hereditaments hereinafter described, should be sold." We have therefore this, which I use as evidence; it is not an estoppel if it [490] turns out that he was in error; but as matter of evidence, we have the heir-at-law acting in this way. This deed bears date in 1824, the death having been in 1811. Many years, therefore, after the testator's death, during the whole of which time the appellant had ample opportunity for considering what his rights as heir-at-law were, we have him reciting the fact that the devise was intended to include all the lands, and that it was not confined to the mansion-house. Who could know better what the testator meant to describe by the terms that he used in the will than the heir-at-law himself? If, my Lords, we had had the heir-at-law himself personally examined, and he had said that his father had always called these lands "the Ashford Hall estate," and had so dealt with them that he intended by the terms used in his will to include all that property which, in his lifetime, he always considered as included in that appellation, would there have been any difference? All we are in search of are the terms by which the testator was in the habit of describing the property. It is proved, beyond all doubt as to the real history of the facts of the case, that the testator did so consider it, and that the terms which are used in his will are the correct terms, and, therefore, that the property is described in a manner so as to pass the whole by that description.

We have nothing whatever to do with the case that has been referred to, where there was clearly a contradiction, and where you could go into evidence to show what the testator meant, without contradicting the terms of the will. If he describes lands in a particular parish by a particular name, or in a particular locality, you cannot go into evidence to show he meant by the general appellation to include something out of it; you cannot do that without contradicting the express terms used. Here is a term which included more or less land according to what was meant by the term used, and all we are in search of is the [491] particular meaning of the expression which is used. It does appear to me that we have found that upon this will, and that there is not the least doubt that the Master of the Rolls has come to a right conclusion.

I therefore move your Lordships to affirm the decree of the Master of the Rolls, with costs, because, although as a matter of precaution, there is to be the inquiry which I have mentioned and shall propose to direct, the absence of direction that there shall be such an inquiry is not the ground of the appeal. After all it may turn out that the inquiry may be nugatory, and there seems reason to believe it will be so at least as to the land tax, but that is a matter which will be evident on the report, and it certainly is not an objection to the decree, which ought to protect the party appealing from paying the costs of the appeal.

Lord Campbell.—My Lords, I think the Master of the Rolls did quite right in stopping the reply when the case was heard before him, for it would have been a great waste of the public time further to hear the case debated at the bar. I believe it would likewise have been a waste of the public time if we had called upon the respondent's counsel to argue the questions which have been submitted to us by the appellants. I regret that such a case should have been so debated in the court below, and I deeply regret that it should have been brought by appeal before your Lordships.

The first question, my Lords, which we are called upon to determine, is this, whether the bill should be dismissed? for I find the reasons conclude with this, "For the above reasons the appellant humbly submits that he is entitled to a reversal of the said decree, and to a dismissal of the plaintiff's bill." The plaintiff's bill is to be dismissed for these reasons, that it is uncertain whether, under the will, a house and twelve acres of land, or a house and 166 acres of land, passed, and on account of [492] this uncertainty, we are gravely told that the will is void, that there is no question to be determined, and that, therefore, the bill should be dismissed. That is an argument which the learned Serjeant who argued it must have been, by great importunity and against his own better judgment, induced to offer to your Lordships.

The question is, whether in this case the appellant, as heir-at-law, is ex debito justitiæ, entitled to an issue. Now there is nothing more certain than that it is the rule of a court of equity, where the factum of a will is disputed, where the heir-at-law says that the testator was non compos, or that he was imposed upon; or that the formalities requisite for executing a valid will have not been observed, and without the assistance of a jury, to require the heir-at-law to renounce all his property, or to declare the will established, so as to disinherit him; but no authority has been cited to show that that applies to a case where the question is, as to the boundaries or the parcels of the property. There cannot be any such rule in such a case; because in many cases where, in a valid will, the question is as to the extent of the property which is enjoyed under it, that may be made as clear as the sun at noon-day, and it would be very inconvenient if there was a rule that, under such circumstances, the heir-at-law, admitting the competency of the testator—admitting that the will was well made according to the Statute of Frauds, or the Statute of Wills, which has since been passed, that in all cases with such testimony, there must be the delay and expense of a trial at law. There has been no authority cited to prove such a position, and in my opinion the Master of the Rolls, in this case, was fully justified in refusing the application for a trial.

Then we come to the question as to the merits, and it is difficult, upon this record, to insist that the 154 acres did not pass under the will; and the question is, whether, upon the evidence before the Master of the Rolls, as Mr. [493] Warren most legitimately argued, these lands did or did not pass.

It is quite clear that the case of Doe d. Oxenden v. Chichester (3 Taunt. 147; 4 Dow. 65), does not at all apply here; for there the question arose as to the admissibility of parol evidence with regard to the construction of a will, but here parol evidence must inevitably have been admitted. The words of the devise are these, "As it is my wish and desire that all my estate in Shropshire, called Ashford Hall, should be sold, I do therefore give and devise the same unto my son Thomas Bourke Ricketts, and my son-in-law, the Rev. R. F. Hallifax, and the survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor, in trust, to sell or dispose of the same." What is there devised, is, all the testator's estate in Shropshire, called Ashford Hall, and evidence must be admitted to show what the estate in Shropshire is, which the testator called "Ashford Hall." This then is not a case in which the question arises whether evidence shall be admitted to show the natural meaning of words which are in the will. We have here to consider what was the estate which the testator had in Shropshire, called Ashford Hall, and on that question evidence must be given. The question was, did the 153 acres or not belong to, and were they to be considered a parcel of the estate called Ashford Hall, or not? The evidence on that subject is so clear and satisfactory, that it would have been much to be regretted if the Master of the Rolls had granted an issue to try it. He had jurisdiction himself to decide it on the depositions before him, without granting an issue. If there had been any reasonable doubt about it, he would have done well to grant an issue, but as there was none, he did much better to take it on himself to decide on the evidence before him, which is all on one side; for there is not a particle of evidence on the other side to show that [494] the whole of this estate was not called Ashford Hall, except the description in the conveyance some years before. But the question is, what was called the estate of Ashford Hall at the time the will was made? What was called the estate of Ashford Hall one hundred years before, or any number of years before, is not the question. On that point, however, I must say, notwithstanding the observations made upon the evidence, that I cannot see that there is any discrepancy among the witnesses, because, whether the estate was sometimes called "Ashford Hall," or "the Estate of Ashford Hall," or the "Ashford Hall estate," they were all terms used without discrimination, for describing the thing, by those in the neighbourhood, and by those who knew the property.

Then, my Lords, the question of what passed by the description of "the estate called Ashford Hall" being expressly put in issue, there is no evidence at all given by the appellant to contradict the evidence which is brought forward on the part of the respondents. The best evidence that could have been given was that of the appellant himself: he had been, for a course of years, conversant with the property; he knew what it was his father possessed; he knew what name it went by when the will was made; and we find him, by the usage of a course of years, giving evidence that the whole of this was what was to be considered as the Ashford Hall estate. It is true that that is not an estoppel; it is nothing which, in point of law, estops him from setting up his claim, but it is evidence: he is an important witness against himself; and he, giving evidence in this manner for a long series of years, joining in the solemn act of conveying the estate, as well as advertizing it in the terms which the Lord Chancellor has read from the documents in evidence, it appears to me, must be taken to have proved what the estate was. It is much too late for him now to deny that which he has himself so strongly admitted to be the case.

[495] Under these circumstances, I think that the Master of the Rolls was fully justified in coming to the opinion he pronounced, and in decreeing that all the lands of the testator, in the county of Salop, passed to the trustees under the will.

I agree, my Lords, that it is much better, ex abundanti cautela, to introduce the words into the decree which have been suggested. I should be exceedingly sorry if such a variation had at all affected the right of the respondents to costs; and I entirely concur in the motion which has been made, that the decree should be affirmed, and with costs.

The Lord Chancellor then put the motion, and declared the appeal to be dismissed, with costs.

On the application of Mr. Turner, and by the consent of Mr. Serjeant Manning, the words "mansion-house and lands" were substituted for the word "lands," in the declaration.

Mr. Serjeant Manning applied that the order for costs should be restricted to the costs of one set of appellants; but the House directed that the order should be general.

Mr. Serjeant Manning.—The appellant was bound to come here, my Lords, on account of these tithes.

Lord Campbell.—No; if that had been pointed out when the minutes were settled, it would have been immediately corrected.

Decree affirmed, with a variation, and with costs.

HENEAGE'S DIVORCE BILL [March 28, 1848].

The enforcement of the Standing Order of the House (No. 142), requiring the petitioner in a divorce bill to present himself for examination at the bar, may be dispensed with on account of the state of his health.

The acceptance, by the petitioner in a divorce bill, of an offer of a certain sum upon a writ of inquiry to assess the damages, after judgment by default, in an action of crim. con. against the wife's paramour: Held, under the circumstances, not to be a bar to the bill.

[Mews' Dig. vii. 952.]

Damages by Consent.

Two points only, worth noticing, occurred in this case.

1st. The petitioner's personal attendance on the second reading of his bill, in compliance of the standing order of the House, No. 142, was dispensed with, upon proof that his domestic affliction affected his health so much that he was obliged to go to a warm climate, and he was then in the south of Europe.
